THE PREFACE TO THE READER.

It is the Genuine Character of an Historian to be bold and honest; not timorous to speak the Truth, and to be veracious in what he says. I have lived to see (though I never was engaged on either side) and had the Leisure and Advantage of an Academick and Sedentary Life, and thereby a good opportunity to consider of the Causes and Beginnings of our late most unnatural Commotions. It hath been well observed that it is very difficult to be of a Party and not to be partial; and therefore perhaps I may have reason, as well as some others, who have before labour'd in such Undertakings, to expect I may have a fair and candid Reception and Construction of these my Collections, which begin in the Tenth Year of King James, and end at the Beginning of the Year 1642. in which space of time, I think are comprized all those Matters of Debate, in which I hope I may safely and modestly say, Pari sunt plus nimis incaluit. I am very sorry that the necessity of this Province wherein I am engaged, should extort from me any Reflections or Observations upon either Party; but Truth must and ought to be spoke by an Historian, or else he cannot truly be called such: it would not (I think) become any ingenious Person to say he will not in his History reflect upon any Party, and yet throughout the whole Contecture thereof to do it. If any such Collections have been made, and lately emitted, I hope this Remark may not in any measure reflect either upon the Ingenuity, Honesty or Industry of the Undertaker; for that 'tis very difficult (as before is intimated) to have once engaged in a Cause, and not to retain some Kindness for it.

We have begun our Annals somewhat before the midst of King James his Reign, and think good to give our Reader the Reason why we set our no sooner, which is, that from that Era or Term of Time, we may commence the first and most considerable Grounds and Reasons, at least the Pretences, of the following reputed Grievances; such were,

1. The Divorce of the Earl of Essex from his Countess, the Lady Frances Howard; which Juridical Process we faithfully have given our Reader from the Original Proceedings of that Court.

2. The Disgrace of Archbishop Abbot with his Majesty thereupon, and other unfortunate Accidents which involved afterwards that great Prelate in the Concerns of a Party.

3. Which is coincident herewith, and coherent thereto, The undutiful Behaviour of some Ministers in the Church of Scotland, and others here at home, who afterwards embarked with them in the same Engagements, to the Ruin both of Church and State, towards their Natural Princes and Sovereigns: and what was a Consequence hereof, their departure hence of some of them into Holland or America, whilst others here remained in the Two Kingdoms, engaging the Commonalty of both to Commotions and Innovations.

4. The Encouragement which some of these received in their Opinions from some Foreign Divines [Protestant] but not having Episcopal Order amongst them, endeavouring the Subversion of the very Order of Bishops themselves in these Churches; and for that, Pretences of Innovations, or Popery, or some such like were then on foot, they endeavoured to bring in the five Controverted Points in the Low Countries, as a Shibboleth here into the two Churches of England and Scotland, to discriminate themselves from other true Members of these Churches, which were not in their Original Constitution of either Party, pretending themselves to be the only Orthodox and True Protestants, whilst they esteemed and called others Papish, Arminian, and what not?

5. The Spanish Match, with its Dependencies, here greatly feared and complained of, and the Power of the Count Gondomar with King James, &c. The breaking off of that Match, and another made with France, though at first well liked by the Commonalty, yet afterwards, as much as the former, found fault with.

6. The Power of the Duke of Buckingham with our Two last Monarchs, much complained of in several Parliaments of those Times, with the Parliamentary Debates thereon, and the divers events thereof.

7. Divers Expeditions and publick Undertakings of War, as that to the Isle of Rhee, to Cales, for the Recovery of the Palatinate, &c. Impartially Related; which proving not successful in themselves, became afterwards the Matters of publick Grievances and Complaints in future and succeeding Parliaments.

8. The many wants and diversion of Money and Treasure in the Commonwealth, together with the Methods and Ways made use of both heretofore and of latter times, by our Princes, for the Raising thereof, and more particularly of Ship-money; its Rise, the Debates thereof, the Case at large and particularly Argued, and now compleatly Published according to the Arguments of the Judges themselves had in the Exchequer-Chamber, which heretofore had been done only imperfectly and in part; which thing was thought unequal in an Historian, who pretends to be impartial, as it is in it self derogatory to the Truth of the Case, which will appear quite another thing, when all Parties do at large speak their own Sentiments, and have that equal and just Liberty which ought to be allowed them.

The

9. The Proceedings of his Late Majesty with those of Scotland, from the first of the Tumults by them raised against him by those his Natural Subjects, July 23. 1637. all at large, and without any considerable interruption, and in due Order; which Tumults having so great and considerable an Influence upon these in our own Country, did require a more particular and exact Enquiry into, and Relation of, than formerly (I think) hath yet been given; wherein our Reader may (perhaps) find a thing not hitherto made clear and apparent: viz. The Confederation of the English Presbyterians with those of Scotland, publickly owned and acknowledged by each of them; as also the Transactions of the Lord Lowdon, and of others, the Scotch Noblemen with the French King for Aid and Assistance for their invading the Kingdom of England; and what influence the Papists, and in particular, the late great Cardinal Richlieu, the Great Minister of State in France, had upon those Commotions; having his Chaplain and Almoner here in London, in the Year 1639, and who was afterwards dispatched into Scotland for that end, to foment and carry on the Scotch Rebellion in that Year: A Matter (I hope) as it is in Fact true, so it cannot seem improbable to any who hath observed the Jesuit, that expert Angler, Fishing in every Water, well understanding, and as truly practising the old Lesson---Semper tibi pendeat Hamus, Quo non sperasti gurgite piscis erit. And it is no way to be doubted by his Practices and Attempts upon divers late our great Statesmen (though all in vain,) as upon Arch-Bishop Laud, to whom he made Offer of a Cardinals Hat, which that great Prelate as soon reveals to his Majesty, and was countermined in that his Attempt; who, to revenge himself both upon his Majesty and of the Arch-Bishop, contrives both their Destruction in the Year 1640. as will plainly appear by a discovery thereof made by Andreas ab Habernfield, to his Majesties Ambassador, at the Hague then residing, and by him communicated to the Arch-Bishop, who transmitted it to his Majesty, then at York in his Expedition against the Scots, Sept. 13. 1640. This Plot though thus discovered and made known to the King, he afterwards accomplished on that Fatal 30th. of January 1648. as will, I think, be made appear in the End of these Annals; to which our Reader is referred in the Perusal thereof; and that these sort of men have put on the Disguises of Protestant Dissenters, nay particularly preached against the established Religion of our Church, as well as of the Church of Scotland; Dr. Oates gives us Testimony, That several of the Society were of late sent into Scotland, to preach in the Field-Conventicles there; some whereof he particularly names in his Narrative; and that this is no new Artifice of the Romanists, but hath been formerly practised, will farther be made appear by an Extract out of the Memorials of Secretary Cecil, communicated from thence to the late Lord Primate of Ireland, Archbishop Usher; and is now in the hands of Mr. Ware, Son to Sir Robert Ware, late one of his Majesties Privy Council in Ireland. The Matter of Fact in short, is as followeth; In the Year 1567. one Faithful Commish. a Dominican Friar, who had been Ordained by Cardinal Pool, had been seized, and committed to Prison, and thence had before the Council, Queen Elizabeth herself present, he was there examined by his Grace Mabew Parker Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, why he did Preach, and what Calling he had thereto? He freely confessed he was Ordained by Cardinal Pool; And being farther interrogated by the Archbishop, why he had not obtain'd a Licence of Permission from some Bishop for his Preaching, that thereby (saith he) we may be assured you are not of the Romish Church? He presently replied, Those who usually hear me, know that I speak as much against Rome and her Pope, as any of the Clergy, and therefore am not to be suspected. Yet Mr. Commyn (saith the Archbishop.) By your way of Arguing, any person may Preach, if he but speak against the Pope. Not so, replied Commyn, he may not preach, except he hath the Spirit, which is the Spirit of Grace and Truth. That Spirit (saith the Archbishop) will surely comply with the Orders of the Church, lately purged from Idolatry and Schism. But I, (saith Commyn) endeavour to make it purer. Why then (saith the Archbishop) do you not Communicate with her in the Sacraments and Prayer? This (saith he) I endeavour to do, and have both given and taken the Body of Christ from those of Tender Consciences, who have Assembled with me in the fear of the Lord. Then (saith the Archbishop) You have a Congregation; Pray of what Parish, and of what Diocess? Not, saith he, of any certain Parish, or of any certain Diocess, but in the wide World, amongst the Flock of Christ, scattered throughout the wide World. Then, said the Queen, Your Diocess, Mr. Commyn is very large; and commanded him to withdraw; the witnesses against him, being called before the Board, deposed, That in Maidstone in Kent, he had publickly Preach't to a Select Congregation, and that he seemed, being in Prayer, as a distracted man, though his Hearers said, He was a heavenly man, and that it was God's Spirit that made him weep for the Sins of the World; and that he did continue in Extempore Prayer sometimes by the space of two hours. Her Majesty commanded him to be called, and spake thus; Mr. Commyn, will you receive Orders, and become of the Church of England so you may be permitted to Preach and to Pray with my Subjects; otherwise you may not: and though it appears by several Witnesses you have preached against Sixtus Quintus the Pope, yet you have usurped over the power both of Church and State, in doing contrary to the Orders that We, Our Council and Parliament have unanimously agreed on, by and with the Consent of the Clergy of the whole Land. He desiring Time to consider hereof, was made give Bail for his Appearance; which he having done, appeared again with his Bail, on the 12th. of April following, when her Majesty and the Council being busied in the Affair of the Spanish Ambassador, could not attend his Matter, hereupon he came forth to his Followers, and told them that he was acquitted by Her Majesty and the Council; but knowing himself not safe, he immediately that Night took Ship, (having prevailed upon the weaker Sex, who were most his Followers, to furnish him with 130 l. which he took along with him.) Before his departure, he made a Preachment to them, wherein he especially commended to them Spiritual Prayer as the chief Character of a True and Good Protestant, telling them, that the Set Forms in England (meaning our Common-Prayer) was but the Mass-Book Translated; and thus he made his Escape: Strict Search being afterwards made after him, it was known he was fled into the Low Countries; whence Information being given of him to Sixtus Quintus then Pope, he was seized in Rome (where he then was) by the Popes Order, and imprisoned; for he had left the Low Countries for fear of the Queen. Upon his Imprisonment, he writes immediatly to the Pope, acquainting him who he was; and upon what Account it was, what he had so preached; hoping and believing he had done his Holiness and the Catholick Cause good Service; for that he had always preached against Set Forms of Prayer; and that he had call'd the Common-Prayer the English Mass; and thereby had made the Church of England odious to the common sort of people; and that this would prove a Stumbling Block to that Church whilst it is a Church; for which he is commended by his Holiness, and dismiss'd with a Reward of 2000 Ducats.

The like Account we have on Record in the Register of the See of Rochester, of one Heth a Jesuit, who had preach'd in that Cathedral against Set Forms of Prayer; and being therefore suspected, was Cited before Dr. Gess, then Bishop of that See; who examining him, he said, he had left the Church of Rome; but confessed, he was not wholly of the Episcopal party in England; for that he had laboured to refine the Protestants, and to take off all smacks of Ceremonies that in the least tend to the Romish Faith. And he being told, That it was the Queens Highness, and the High Court of Parliament that had established the Forms and Manner of those prayers, and therefore it did not become any particular or private man to meddle any farther therein. He replied, It was then only my good will to make the Church of England purer. But finding that he was detected by a Letter which he dropt in the Pulpit of the said Cathedral, whilst in his Sermon, which was wrote to him from one Malt, a Superior of his Order, from Madrid, he openly said, Seeing my Vocation is now known, I shall not however acknowledge my self in any Fault, for I have fought a good Fight for Christ, whose Cause I have taken in hand, and have tried this Experiment amongst my Countrymen, that the World may see, that all those who term themselves Protestants, are not of the Church of England; though they speak against Rome,

The Letter, which I am confident our Reader will think Material, was as followeth:

Brother,

THE Council of our Fraternity have thought fit to send you David George, Theodorus Sartor, and John Huts their Collections, which you may distribute Where-ever you may see it may be for your purpose; according to the peoples inclinations. These Mixtures with your own, will not only puzzle the Understandings of your Auditors, but make your self Famous. We suppose your Wants are not considerable at present, by what we have heard; how your Flock do admire you every day more and more. Be not over-zealous in your proceedings in the beginning, but gradually win on them as you Visit them; and as you find their Inclinations bend to your Design, let us hear how you have proceeded; for it will satisfy your Brethren much, and enable them to instruct you for the Future. Hallingbam, Coleman and Benson have set a Faction amongst the German Hereticks, so that several who turned from us, have now denied their Baptism, which we hope will soon turn the Scale; and bring them back to their old Principles. This we have certified to the Council and Cardinals, That there is no way to prevent the People from turning Hereticks, and for the recalling others back again to their Mother-Church, than by the Diversity of Doctrines.

We wish you to Prosper.

The

The PREFACE.

The whole of this short Narrative may be seen in the Register-Book of the See of Rochester, beginning Anno 2, & 3. Phil. & Mar. and continueth to the 15th. of Queen Elizabeth.

We all know the severe Laws here in force in England against Romish Priests and Jesuits, and also that they are very prudent men, and therefore may rationally be supposed not willing to adventure their Lives, except they had a fair Prospect of succeeding in their Attempts upon the established Religion of this and our Neighbour Kingdoms. One of the Order of the Jesuits, and he an eminent person amongst them, assures us in his Dedicatory Epistle [after his Conversion] to the States General of the United Netherlands, That his Order had an established Council of fifty persons here in London, in order to their great Design, and that they were in diverse Ranks and Habits as best befitted them, and that from hence they sent intelligence of their Affairs to the Superiors at Rome. Nay more, I find the late Usurper Cromwel, in one of his Speeches to a Parliament of his, Summoned to meet, Sept. 4. 1654. affirming, 'That he could prove by good Witnesses, That they had at that very time a Consistory and Council, that had very great influence on the Affairs of these Nations, and that moreover, he had that particular Instrument then in his own power, &c. Mr. Prynne's Relation is well known of the Queens Confessor's Action in Brandishing his Sword amongst the other Souldiers, at the murdering of the late Blessed King, and his telling Mr. Henry Spotswood, who much admired to see him there, that there were at least Forty or more Priests and Jesuits then present with himself on Horseback on that occasion; vid. Prynne's Brief Necessary Vindication, p. 45

These Relations being out of the Series of the Times whereof these Annals treat, I thought good here to mention; remitting our Reader to several other Observations of this Nature throughout the whole Body of these Annals, hoping they may be of use to some Dissenters from our Communion amongst us; letting them see that these very sort of men whom they so much declaim against, have been great Actors in our late Troubles, and that possibly they may now have more influence, than they desire they should have again to inflame us, and pray and hope that this may make us all careful to avoid their sly and subtil Insinuations, especially considering what a vast Treasure, and what Blood, more precious than the former, the late Bloody War hath cost us. I cannot stand to enumerate or calculate the numbers of persons slain, or sufficiently to aggravate the miseries during the continuance thereof; only give me leave to acquaint our Reader in short of what may be given an account of, as to the publick Moneys raised by Ordinances of Parliament, &c. for the carrying on of that miserable and unfortunate War: 1. Plate-Money upon certain Propositions, an incredible sum. 2. Money advanced on the Irish Rebels Lands, and Loan-Money upon several Ordinances of Parliament, by some call'd Publick Faith Money. 3. Sequestrations of the Kings, Queens, Bishops, Deans, Deans and Chapters, the Nobility and Gentries Lands [such as were by that Party esteemed Delinquents.] 4. The Monthly Taxes of 60000 l. for the Associated Counties, and at the same time 120000 l. or 100000 l. for all England. 5. The Excize, continuing near twenty years, now esteemed at 400000 l. per annum. 6. The Customs for the same space of time, now esteemed at 700000 l. per annum. 7. Composition Money, and for the sale of Delinquents Estates, which hath been esteemed at 8000000 l. nor to mention Plunder, Free-Quarter, and Decimations, the twenty and twenty fifth part of Lands and Goods,

The P R E F A C E.

Goods, a vast and prodigious sum : By the Intrado of which sums, as are, as above, accountable some, and they rationally enough have computed the late Civil War to have stood the Kingdom in above 40000000 l. Sterling ; whereas since the Restitution of his Majesty, though the Kingdom hath been ingaged in two Bloody and Expensive Wars, for the maintainance of the Kings Just Rights to the Dominion of the Narrow Seas, it hath not yet (as some do compute) stood the Nation in one fourth part of that sum ; and yet our Fleet, the VValls of this Nation, now superiour in strength and number, at least not inferiour to that of our Neighbours.

It will now remain that we give our Reader an account (in regard he will find these Collections in very many things, and those very considerable, to differ from some lately made publick) in whose hands the chief Manuscript Copies, we have here made use of, are, and where they still remain, if any person have the curiosity to see them. It hath lately by some persons, and upon a point of very high import been questioned, who are the Three Estates in Parliament, and some use hath been made of Mr. Rushworth's Authority in the debate of this matter, who in his first Volum of his Collections hath publish'd somewhat relating to a Speech made by King James of happy memory, to a Parliament by him assembled in the Eighteenth year of his Reign, which in truth is not his Majesties Speech (as I am credibly informed by an Ear-witness, who was present when the King made that Speech) the person is Mr. Munday, who is Actuary of the Convocation, a very aged person, and yet alive, to attest the truth thereof, having the Copy thereof [now in my keeping] always in his Custody, and whereof he hath delivered several Transcripts to several persons of Eminency above 40 years ago, who desired the same. Who did impose on the Credulity of Mr. Rushworth, I here enquire not, only give the Reader to take notice hereof, that for the future no evil use may be made thereof. As to the Transactions of that great Affair of State, the Spanish Match, in the latter end of King James his Reign, I made use of a very fair Manuscript Copy now in the hands of Mr. Dunning : And as to the Speeches, Resolutions and Debates of that Parliament which sate in the third and fourth years of King Charles the Martyr, of ever blessed memory ; wherein the great Points of the Subjects Liberty and Property in his Estate were under the greatest height of Debate and Contest, I was herein very much assisted by a Manuscript Journal of that Parliament, wherein all the Speeches and Resolutions of that Parliament, and its most Eminent Members, are fairly related, and by me as truly communicated to the world : The Book it self is in the hands of my good Friend Dr. Bernard, Physitian to S. Bartholomews Hospital London, whose favour and kindness I must needs here publickly own for the use I have made of it : And in regard that Grand Affair of the Ship-Money, which was so learnedly argued by all the Judges of the Land, and Sages of the Law, then Councel on both sides, may perhaps prove a matter very acceptable to the Gentlemen of the Long Robe, for that the Ardua Regis & Regni were in those Debates most narrowly lookt into, I thought it not altogether unreasonable to give the world an exact account (for so indeed it is) thereof, the like being never yet extant ; the Manuscript Collection herein, by me made use of, was that of the Learned Counsellor Mr. Doughty of Graves-Lane, who was very exact in his Relation of that great and difficult matter, upon whose Credit the Arguments, as well as the Quotations of the Law-Books and Records, mentioned in that great Affair, is here made publick, hoping

our Reader may not be disappointed by his References to the Authors and Books themselves, whose Testimonies and Authorities are there alledged. And lastly, to give the Reader a general account of the remaining matter of these Collections, he may know that we have not spared to consult the Publick Offices, in relation to Impeachments and Articles, &c. of Persons accused in Parliament; and more particularly those against the Earl of Bristol, and Duke of Buckingham, in the forementioned Parliament of the Third and Fourth of King Charles the Martyr, with their respective Answers to the matters objected against them; the Publick Prints, Proclamations, Acts and Orders of Council, &c. are every where extant, and are not the Propriety, I hope, of any second-hand Publisher, so as to exclude others from making use thereof: our Reader, I presume, will excuse us, if we do not pretend here to mention every minute Affair or inconsiderable passage which happened in the Times, whereof we have in these Annals discoursed, such are the Mutinies of disorderly Souldiers in their Marches, Orders of the Justices to suppress their Insolencies at their Sessions of the Peace, the Books for disciplining the Souldiers, by Authority made publick, or any other such like of less import, which perhaps to some men may commend an Authors industry, with the hazard of his Prudence or Discretion; such then as these we have omitted, remembering the Remarque of the Historian hereupon, that they are the proper Subject for a Diurnal, rather than an History. Nerone secundo Lucio Pisone Coss. pauca memoria digna evenere, nisi cui libeat laudandis fundamentis & trabibus volumina implere, cum ex dignitate populi Rom. repertum sit, res illustres Annalibus, talia Diurnis Urbis actis mandare. And so we pass them, and hope for the Readers pardon herein, and acquaint him, that in lieu thereof, we have given him the posture of Affairs in Foreign, and our Neighbour Kingdoms and States, especially when they might have any influence upon the Affairs of our own Kingdom, and accordingly as they fell under the Times herein discoursed of: We have brought down the Series of our History to the beginning of the year 1642. where we shall see a once flourishing and famous Kingdom, lately the Envy of other Nations, to have become the Object of their Pity, and of all the World, except themselves, whose Natives (as though they had clipt the Wings of Peace and Plenty, that they could not possibly escape them, and made these Blessings, once the happiness of the common world, their Propriety and Inclosure) became surfeited with their own happiness and prosperity, plunging themselves into the miseries of a most bitter, cruel, and expensive VVar, which their greatest Plenty could then only uphold; and which by the Mercy of God, more than of our own Deserts, after the expence of so much Blood and Treasure, at the Restitution of his now Majesty, our lawful Prince, together with the Laws of the Kingdom, and Liberties of Parliament, we were again restored; the Causes of which VVar being the Subject of this History, are very fit for every English-man to be thoroughly acquainted with, that he may truly know and understand, what in all likelihood may happen to be (which God forbid should ever happen) the evil consequences (to say no worse) of a rashly undertaken VVar, that so he may never again be brought to squander away his share of the blessings of peace and plenty, which we now (God be thanked) in the midst of our Neighbours VVars enjoy, for a Mess of Pottage, which we all by sad experience know had Death in the Pot.

King JAMES:

Anno 1612.

The Extraction of the Countess of Essex, and of her Divorce.

Here was, amongst other Persons of Honour and Quality in the Court, a young Lady of great Birth and Beauty, Frances, Daughter of Thomas Howard Earl of Suffolk, Married in her Minority unto Robert Earl of Essex; with whom she co-habited for several years: She was Two and Twenty, and He Three and Twenty years of Age; and of him there was a common Fame (grounded indeed upon his own Suspicion) of his Insufficiency to content a Wife: The Effect of this Fame is very Notorious, and doth involve in it the Story of Sir Thomas Overbury, now imprisoned in the Tower of London, for refusing to go Ambassador, when appointed by the King. He was a Creature of the Lord Viscount Rochester, and a Person who had a very good Esteem of his own Parts and Abilities; and as he said of himself, that the Viscount Rochester was the fair Lady Essex by Letters of his own Penning; for which, some stick not to charge him of Ambition and Vanity, not to mention an old Grudge he alwayes had for the whole House of the Howards. When these young Persons were of Age to expect the Blessing of the Marriage Bed, the Earl was observed alwayes to avoid the Company of the Ladies; for which, he was much talked of in Court as a Person unable for his Ladies Bed, which begat the Bruit in Court, Fac. 16. and this afterward private Disputation amongst Divines and Civilians of the Validity of the Marriage.

Accordingly the King being Petitioned by the Father the Earl of Suffolk, and the Daughter the Countess of Essex, he granted a Commission Delegative to four Bishops, two Privy Counsellors Learned in the Law, and to four other Civil Lawyers, with Clause to proceed cum omni qua poterant celeritate & expeditione summarie ac de plano, sine strepitu & figura Judicii, sola Rei & Facti veritate inspecta & mera equitate attenta; and with this farther Clause, Quorum vos prefat. Reverendissimi Patrem Cantuariensem Archiepiscopum, Reverend. Patrem Lond. Episcopum, & Jul. Cesar. Militem, aut duos vestrum in ferenda Sententia interesse volumus. But for some Exceptions about the Quorum arising amongst the Commissioners, and the Words Sententia esse, not interesse, a second Commission was granted, and two Bishops more adjoynd with this Quorum: Quorum ex vobis prefat. Reverend. Patrem Georgium Cantuar. Archiepiscopum, Joannem Lond. Episc. Tho. Wint. Episc. Lancelot Eliens. Episc. Ricard. Coventr. & Lichfeld. Episc. Jo. Rossens. Episc. Jul. Cesar Milite. Tho. Parry Milite. in ferenda Sententia nos esse volumus.

Her Father the Earl of Suffolk & she petition the King. He appoints Commissioners, four Bishops, &c.

Upon

Anno 1613. Upon which the Countess of Essex takes out Process against the Earl her Husband, to Answer her in a Cause of Nullity of Marriage.

The Earl he appears by his Proctor, and she gives in her Libel, (viz.)

That the Earl and the Lady six years since, in January, Anno Dom. 1606. were married; her Age then thirteen, and his fourteen; now she is two and twenty, and he three and twenty years old.

That for three years since the Marriage, and he then eighteen years old, they did both cohabit as Married Folk in one Bed naked and alone, endeavouring to have Carnal Knowledge of each others Body.

Notwithstanding the Earl neither did nor could ever know her carnally, he being before and since with a perpetual incurable Impediment and Impotency, at least in respect of her.

That the Lady was and is apt and fit, without any defect, and is yet a Virgin, and Carnally unknown by any man.

That the Earl hath confessed oftentimes to persons of great Credit, and his nearest Friends, that he never was able Carnally to know her, though he had often attempted and used his utmost Endeavours.

And therefore she prayeth the Commissioners, upon due proof hereof, to pronounce for the Invalidity and Nullity of the said Marriage.

The Earl by his Proctor denying the Contents, his Answer is required by Oath in a second Process; where in open Court his Oath was administered with so great care and effectual words, to wind off all Circumstances, as the like hath been seldom observed.

The Earl viva voce confesseth the Marriage and Circumstances as in the Libel; that they were not absent above three Months the one from the other in any of the said three years.

That for one whole year of the Three years, he did attempt divers times to know her, but the other two years he lay in Bed with her Nightly, but found no motion to Copulation with her.

That in the first year she shewed Readiness and Willingness thereto,

That he did never Carnally know her, but not find any Impediment in her self, but was not able to penetrate or enjoy her.

And believeth that both before and after the Marriage, he found in himself Ability to know Women, and hath sometimes felt motion that way.

But being asked whether he found in himself a perpetual and incurable Impediment? He answered, That in two or three years last past he hath had no Motion to her, and believes he never shall: now that she is apt as other Women, and that she is Virgo integra & incorrupta; and confesseth, That he hath often before Persons of Credit, confessed thus much.

Notwithstanding his said Oath, the Countess produced several Witnesses of the Marriage, Time, Age, Cohabitation and Codormition for Consummation, as before in the Libel; and that notwithstanding she was still Virgo integra, incorrupta; but because the Earl did not believe his Lady to be fit and apt for Copulation, therefore the Council desired Matronas aliquas probas & honestas, fide dignas, & in ea parte peritas Domina assignari ad inspiciendum corpus dicta Domina. Whereupon it was Decreed by the Court, that six Midwives of the best Note, and ten other Noble Matrons fearing God, and Mothers of Children, out of which they themselves would chuse two Midwives and three Matrons; out of which the Delegates did select five, ut sequitur;

Tunc Domini (viz.) Arch. Cant. Lond. Eliens. Covent. & Lichf. Cesar, Parry, Dunn, Benet, Edwards, habita inter eos privata deliberatione ex numero matronar. predict. elegerunt

The Lady Mary Terwhite, Wife of Sir Philip Terwhite, Baronet.

Lady Alice Carew, Wife of Sir Matthew Carew.

Lady Dalisan, Wife of Sir Roger.

The Lady Anne Waller, Widow.

Et ex Obstericum numero, &c. Margaretam Mercer & Christianam Chest. Et assignarunt Procuratorem dicta Domina Francisca ad sistendum hujusmodi Inspectrices, coram Reverendo Patre Episc. Lond. Cesar, Dun, &c. inter ceteros nominat. isto die inter horas quintam & sextam post meridiem Juramentum in hac parte subituras, atq; inspectione facta fideliter relaturas earum judicium, juxta earum scientiam & experientiam, &c. coram dictis Dominis Delegatis sicut prefertur assignatis, quam cito fieri possit, ante horam quartam & sextam post meridiem diei Jovis proxima; alioquin ad comparend. hoc in loco coram Commissariis dicto die Jovis inter horas quartam & sextam post meridiem ejusdem diei earum Judicium hac in parte tunc relaturas; & ad interessendum hora & loco respective predictis, ad videndum inspectrices predictas juramento in hac parte onerari, necnon quibuscunque aliis diebus hora & loco per dictos Dominos Commissarios nominat. dictis inspectricibus ad referendum earum Judicium assignat.

Accordingly, between the Hours of that Day aforesaid, were presented before the Delegates aforesaid the said Ladies sworn ad inquirend. & inspiciend.

1. Whether the Lady Frances were a Woman fit and apt for Carnal Copulation, without any Defect that might disable her for that purpose?

2. Whether she were a Virgin carnally unknown by any man?

Whereupon, they went from the presence of the Commissioners, into the next Room, where the Countess was, accompanied by the Counsel of both sides; into which Room was no Entrance but at one Door, whereat the Counsel presently came forth, and only the Countess was left with the Ladies; who, after some convenient time, returned their Report under their Hands, the Commissioners having first sequestered from their presence the Counsel on both sides (who had been present in all these Passages) and all other Persons except the Register, that so the Ladies and Midwives might more freely deliver their secret Reasons, &c. though it was not fit to insert them into the Record. And this is in sum their Relation.

1. That they believe the Lady fitted with Abilities to have Carnal Copulation, and apt to have Children.

2. That she is a Virgin incorrupt.

And to corroborate all this, the Countess in open Court produced seven Women of her Consanguinity; That inasmuch as the Truth of all was best known to her self, she might by virtue of her Oath discover the same, and her Oath should be no further regarded than as it was confirmed by the Oaths of her Kinswomen; the Law presuming that such Kindred should be best acquainted with the inward Secrets of their Kinswoman. In order the Countess had an Oath administered

Anno 1613. ministred to her, with all the like grave admonition as before to the Earl her Husband; and so she affirmed,

That since the Earl was eighteen years old, for three years he and she had lain in bed, &c. as in her Libel.

And then the Seven Noble Women, viz. Katherine, the Countess of Suffolk, Frances, Countess of Kildare, Elizabeth, Lady Walden, Elizabeth, Lady Knevet, Lady Katharine Thinne, Mrs. Katharine Fiennes, Mrs. Dorothy Neale, her Kinswomen, being charged to speak without partiality, they did all depose, That they believed the same was true.

1. And in particular, That post plenam pubertatem utriusque they both endeavoured Copulation.
2. That notwithstanding Ability on her part, per inspectrices she remained a Virgin incorrupted.
3. That the Earl had judicially sworn that he never had, nor could, nor should know ever her Carnally.

The Law then being, That Impotentia coeundi in Viro whatsoever, whether by natural Defect, or accidental Means, whether absolute towards all, or respective to his Wife alone, if it precede Matrimony, and be perpetual, as by Law is presumed, when by three years continuance, after the mans Age of eighteen years, there having been nil ad copulam, the Marriage not consummated, and the Law allowing the said Proofs, &c. it was abundantly sufficient to convince the said Earl of Impotency; and therefore the Judges Delegates gave this Sentence.

Sentence. Idcirco Nos, &c. in dicta causa Judices, Delegati & Commissarii, & Christi nomine primitus invocato, & ipsum solum Deum oculis nostris proponentes & habentes, deque & cum consilio Jurisperitorum, cum quibus in hac parte communicavimus, matureque deliberavimus prefatum Dominum Com. Pronunciamus, decernimus & declaramus prefatum pretensum Matrimonium sic inter predictum Virum Robertum Devereux Com. quod fecimus & promulgamus in his Scriptis.

And the Records yet extant do mention the Proceedings (as our Reader will see) modest and legal, parallel to any former of like kind, wherein the Civil Laws are plentiful, and in this strict form had no room for corruption. The Commissioners who agreed to the Sentence, were four Bishops, Winchester, Lichfield and Coventry, Rochester, and Ely. The Civilians were three Knights; Caesar, Parry, Dunn. And yet though these were men beyond all exception, and the proceedings regular, yet were both they, and this Judgment, by a discontented sort of people then growing up in this our Kingdom, branded for [Men fit for the purpose, and that the Kings Will never wanted such Ministers in corrupted Times, both in Church and State.]

The Common People were offended with the Canons, and wish'd, that Essex might have as many Women to aspect him for his sufficiency, that he might have Justified himself upon others, or have Physicians (by Art) to certify his Natural impediment; or whether impedimentum maleficii (being accidental) presumatur precessisse, vel potius subsecutum fuisse matrimonium contractum & solemnizatum, whether they ought not post preceptum Judicis, to cohabit together, saltem per aliquod temporis spatium arbitrio Judicis moderandum, for further trial. Indeed the Archbishop Abbot took upon him the Quarrel, who (in truth) in the Civil Law was not so able: his doubts and queries were dispersed, and got some credit with the Clergy, whilst the Civilians (with much civility, if not fear of his authority amongst them) forbore to give him Answer, till the King himself took the pains to confute his Opinion.

The Common People offended.

The Archbishop's Arguments were six.

The Archbishop's Arguments.

1. That all Controversies concerning the Church are comprehended in the Scriptures, and Marriage is there accounted Sacred.

2. What Text doth warrant a nullity after Marriage, propter maleficium versus hanc? The Scripture indeed makes nullity, propter frigiditatem, Matt. 19. 12. some born chaste, some made Eunuchs, some made so by Grace.

3. 4. What Councils, or Fathers, or Histories, either Greek, or Latine, have ever mentioned maleficium versus hanc, until Hircanus Rhemensis Episcopus, four hundred Years after Christ?

5. 6. Essex is found defective, for whom we are bound to use two remedies, Eternal and Temporal.

For the first, Non ejicietur, nisi per orationem & jejunium.

For the second, Corporeal Medicines; but the Earl hath had none of these.

The Answer.

To the first, It is a preposterous Puritan Argument, without some better distinction or explanation; for the Orthodox say of all Controversies in points of Faith and Salvation, nullity of Marriage cannot be one, and therefore the consequence fails.

Secondly, If the Scriptures want a nullity, propter frigiditatem, then all the means which may make him frigidus versus hanc, must be comprehended; for why doth our Church condemn Marriage of a Man with his Sisters Daughter, or of two Sisters, but a paritate rationis, for none of them anno 513. them are in terminis prohibited in Scripture; and so all the other unlawful Matches, for ascending or descending in points of consanguinity, quia par est ratio.

The like is in this Case, for although Christ spake only to three sorts of Eunuchs, yet, ratio est quia non potest esse copulatio inter Eunuchum & mulierem; and therefore Saint Paul tells us, it is not conjugium sine copulatione: I conclude therefore à paritate rationis, that Christ did comprehend under these three sorts all inability, which doth perpetually hinder copulationem versus hanc, whether Natural or Accidental; for what difference is there between the cutting off the Hand, and being made impotent therefore? amputatio & mutilatio membri, being the same in the Civil Law; it being sufficient unto moderate Christians to believe out of Gods Word; that marriage is null sine copulatione, and those words, quos Deus conjunxit, are never found in Scripture, where & erunt eis, doth not preceed, viz. and they shall be made one flesh.

But how ever the impediment be, whether universal, or versus hanc, or born so, or by Violence, or by Disease, or Inaptitude, that is ever par ratio, he is an Eunuch versus hanc, & omnes alias, seeing to him only she was Married.

To the third and fourth, there may be something to this purpose, or aliquid analogum with à paritate rationis.

Besides it is an ill Argument to say, that therefore it is not lawful, because Fathers nor Councils do not mention it.

The same Answer to the fifth: for till four hundred Years after Christ (perhaps) that Devilish trick was not discovered, and we know, ex malis moribus bona leges, &c.

And this in dispute, is only a question of order and policy, for the essential point of Matrimony cannot be accomplished sine copula.

Sixthly, The Devils have power over the flesh, and to exempt us from the power of witchcraft, was never maintained by any Learned Men, and why not of Protestants as well as of Papists?

And so to satisfy his Conscience, this pains was taken with the Archbishop, ut cum conversus fuerit, confirmet fratres suos.

In fine, Both parties freed to their second choice, the Countess the fifth of December Marries the Viscount, lately made Baron of Brandspesk and Earl of Somerset, the tenth Earl; the first being made by Maud the Empress: and Overbury in the Tower hears of this jollity, and himself in durance, threatens Somerset (no faith one, writes to him humbly imploring;) another (such like) pens the Letters thus,

Right Noble and Worthy Sir,

Sir Thomas Overbury's Letter.

YOur former accustomed favours, and also late promise concerning my present deliverance, hath caused me, at this time, by these lines, to sollicite your Lordship, and to put you in remembrance of the same, not doubting your Honour is at all forgetful of me, but only (by reason of my imprisonment) being posselt of divers Diseases, I would for my Bodies health and safety, taste of the felicity of the open Air, in which cause, if your Lordship please to commiserate my present necessities and procure me my speedy deliverance, I shall not only stand much the more obliged to you, but also acknowledge you the preserver of my life.

Such stuff as this makes up the matter, as they would make us believe, but in truth he threatened Somerset with some discovery, which was construed to be secrets of Love, or State, or both, not without monstrous defaming her honour, by message and writing (filthy base Woman, they were best look to stand fast) which begat fury in her, and subtilty in Somerset, least Overburys malice should break forth, to both their sufferings, and so trouble their whole fortunes. To prevent mischief to the one, and continual defamation to the other; combining with the rest, it was resolved by her to destroy him, which she first intended by Assassination, and dealt with one Sir David Wood (an ill look'd red bearded Scot) whom Overbury had prevented of a Suit valued at 2000 l. but his Cowardize, not Conscience, fearing to engage, she and they plotted the poisoning of him in prison, as the Story intends to discover in particular.

This Spring seizes Northampton for Death, he was a Brother unto the late Duke of Norfolk, who suffered for his attempts of Marriage with the Queen of Scots (as before remembred) then a prisoner here in England, which might be some motive for the King to consider the advance of this Man, and that Family, which he did, by preferring the Dukes second Son to be Earl of Suffolk 1603. and by restoring the Dukes grandchild Thomas Earl of Arundel 1604. as aforesaid, and by particular preferments of this Henry, who was more wedded to his Book than to his Bed, for he died a Bachelor; he was accompted Wise and Learned, a cunning States-man; and for all these abilities, out of the Kings great affection to Letters, especially being centered in a Noble person; at his first accession hither, he the rather advanced him in succeeding Creations, as Baron of Marnhill, Earl of Northampton, then Privy Councillor, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Lord Privy-Seal, and Knight of the Garter, and elected Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; he had plenty for his single Life, and to spare for his Friends in his expence, not over frugal, maintaining his Port the most remarkable (like the ancient Nobility) in his Family and dependance, of any Lord then and since his time.

He assisted his Nephew the Earl of Suffolk by his designing and large contribution to that excellent Fabrick Awdley End.

He built that Noble Structure at Charing-Cross, Northampton-House, and presented it a new Years gift to his Cousin German the Lord Walden, Suffolks eldest Son, and yet left his other Cousin the Earl of Arundel, the rest of his Estate, so to make to appear to the World his equal distribution to such even kindred.

He was Pious, and gave good Testimony thereof in his Life, built that handfom Covent at Greenwich, and indowed it with Revenue for ever; for maintenance of decayed Gentlemen Bachelours, a competent number, and for Widdows also considerable.

He died in April, Anno 1614. full of Years and Honour, and suspected more Catholick than some will think reasonable, though in the form of a Church Papist, (as some do lately Publish) and to be a setter in the monstrous Murther of Sir Thomas Overbury, though the Lieutenant of the Tower, Telus, in his Examinations and Confessions, cleared him; which suspicion is since grounded upon the interpretation of his familiar Epistles to the Earl of Somerset, and indeed bruited bruited since his death, and where so proofs precede, we may be sparing to note him, so Noble a person, with that or any other injury.

About these times, the humors of young Gallants not brooking the peaceable conditions of our Kingdoms, and neighbour Nations, took upon themselves to quarrel with each other, and to fight it out in Duels upon slight occasions, and very frequent; which induced his Majesty to publish a severe Edict against private Combates and Combatants, their Seconds, Accomplices and Adherents; for prevention of those heavy events where to so worthy Families become obnoxious, by the odious and enormous impieties inevitably subsequent thereupon.

Intending by that time, that the most proper remedies have qualified the distemper of ill disposed minds, and that audacious Spirits have imarted for incompetent desires; the false colours and pretences of erring Custom have both been counterpleaded and corrected by reforming severity; by that time, I say, the passion hath been put into the right course of submitting to discretion, and Caution hath wrought it self at leisure into as constant a form and habit of conforming to obedience, as Selfwill took in former times to plant false Principles; the greater part will easily discern, that there is greater reason to reproach those that offer challenges of madness, than to tax those of cowardice that abstain out of duty.

And therefore those that should conceive themselves to be behind in the least respect or point of Honour, should repair to the Marshals Court, who were instructed and prepared as well for the cleansing of all green Wounds, as the healing of old Ulcers that shall appear to them.

A Duel

Hereupon occasion was soon given and taken in a Duel of Priest and Wright, for writing and carrying the challenge; and an information against them in Star-chamber, by a charge of Sir Francis Bacon Attorney General, and though the persons were but mean, yet they served for example to the Great, the Dog to be beaten before the Lion, the one a Barber Surgeon, the other a Butcher.

Sir Francis Bacon Atturny General his speech against Duels.

This eloquent Orator divideth his charge into four branches.

1. The nature and greatness of the mischief.
2. The causes and remedies.
3. The Justice of the Law of England, which (saith he) some think defective herein.
4. The capacity of this Court where the remedy is best to be found.

1. For the first, When revenge is extorted out of the Magistrates hands into private men, presuming to give Laws to themselves, it may grow from Quarrels to Banding, so to Trooping, then to Tumults and Commotions, from private Persons to Families and Alliances, and so to National quarrels, and subject the State to Inflammations and Convulsions; and herein offences of presumption are the greatest, and this to be done by the Aurora filii, Sons of the morning, young men full of hope and towardness.

2. The causes no doubt a false imagination of honour and credit, bewitching Duels, species falsa, against Religion, Law and Virtue, that men now adays had lost the true notion of Fortitude and Valor; the one, Fortitude, distinguishing the grounds of quarrels, whether they be Just and Worthy a mans Life, being to be sacrificed to honourable Services, good Causes, and noble Adventures; expence of Blood is as the expence of Money, not to be profuse in either upon vain occasions.

Fac. 12.

For the remedies four things may be effectual for repressing the depraved customs of Combates.

First, The State to abolish it; for then every particular person thinks himself thereby acquitted in his reputation, when he sees it an insult against Sovereign power; like unto the Edict of Charles the ninth of France against Duels, that the King himself took upon him the honour of all that were grieved or interested for not having performed the Combate, when he shall see the rule of State dis-interest him of a vain and unnecessary hazard.

Secondly, This evil must not be cockered, the compounding of quarrels is taken into the Hands by private Noble-men and Gentlemen; they tell men who is before hand and who behind hand; this countenances Duels, as if therein there was some what of right.

Thirdly, The most prudent and best remedy may be learned out of the Kings Proclamation, the false concealed humor must be punished in the same kind, in eo quis rectissime plectitur in quo peccat, such men to be banished the Kings presence and excluded the Court for certain Years, to be cast into that darkness, not to behold his Sovereigns face.

Lastly, We see the root of this offence is stubborn, for it despiseth Death, the utmost of punishments, and therefore these Men to be executed by Law without all remission. The severity of France had been more, where, by a kind of Marshal Law established by the King, the party surviving was instantly hanged, their wounds though bleeding, least a natural Death should prevent the example of Justice; or if not so to do, but with greater Lenity, yet of no less efficacy, which is to punish by fines in Star-Chamber, the middle acts and proceedings which tend to Duels.

3. Now for the Law of England, it is excepted against in two Points.

Not to difference between an insidious and foul Murder, and killing upon fair Terms, as they term it.

The other, not providing sufficient punishment for Contumely of Words, as The Lie, and the like.

These Novelties are thus answered; The Law of God makes no difference, but between Homicide voluntary and involuntary, which we term Misadventure, and for which there were Cities of Refuge.

Our Law hath a more subtil Distinction, The Will inflamed, and The Will advised; Man-slaughter in Heat, and Murder upon Malice or cold Blood. The Romans had restrained this Privilege of Passion, but only where the Husband took the Adulterer in the Fact; yet Cain enticed his Brother into the Field, and slew him treacherously; but Lamech vaunted of his Murder to kill a young man, and if it were but in his hurt; so as the difference is between insidious and presumptuous Murder, these of Cain and Lamech.

Greece and Rome had not this practice of Duels; It is said, Fas est & ab hoste doceri.

There was a Duel between two eminent persons of the Turks, and one slain; the Council of Bashaws reprehended the other: How durst you undertake to fight one with another? Are there not Christians enough to kill? Did you not know know, that whether of you were slain, the loss would be the Great Seigniors?

Anno 1614. 'Tis true, we find Combates before an Army amongst the Romans, which they called Pugna per provocationem, between Generals themselves, or by their Licence to others.

So David asked leave, when he fought with Goliath, and Joab, when the Armies met, gave leave, Let the young men Play before us.

And of this kind was that famous Example in the Wars of Naples, between the Spaniards and Italians, where the Italians prevailed.

The Second Combat is a Judicial Trial of Right, introduced by the Gothes and the Northern Nations, and more ancient in Spain.

But yet a wise Writer says, Taliter pugnantem videtur tentare Deum, quia hoc volunt, ut Deus ostendat & faciat Miraculum, ut justam causam habens Victor efficiatur, quod saepe contra accidit. Nay the French Folly in this kind had it in toleration, never Authorized by Law, but of late punished with severe rigour. As for the supposed Defect in our Law for Lies and Fillips, words of Denial and Flea-bites to murder a man, Solon's Answer satisfies, That he had not ordained Punishments for it, not imagining the World so phantastical to take it so highly.

The Civilians say, That an Action of Injury does not lie for it; indeed Francis the first of France gave the Lie to the Emperor, and in a solemn Assembly said, That he was no honest man that would bear the Lie.

The Laws of England had only these Degrees of Injury; Slander, Battery, Maim, and Death, but as for a Fillip, Gonsalvo said, A Gentlemans Honour should be de tela crassiori, of a stronger warp.

Now for the power of this Court to censure, Presidents have been in the Minor Wharton's Case Plaintiff, where Acklam, Defendant, Servant to Ellesbarys, was Fined for carrying his Masters Challenge but by word of Mouth.

And it was concluded to prosecute in these Cases against such,

As shall appoint the Field, though the Fight be not acted.

Send Challenge in Writing or Message.

Shall deliver either of them.

To accept or return them..

To be a Second.

To depart beyond Seas to Combat.

To revive a Quarrel by Scandalous Bruits or Pasquils, Counsels, or Quarrels.

And that a man may in those Cases be as well Fur de se, as Felo de se; If he steal out of the Realm to fight, he doth, Machinari contra Coronam.

Patrick Earl of Orkney rises in Scots land.

But let us remember Scotland: we have before heard of the Earl of Orkney's Mis-behaviour in Scotland, which of late so increased, as he was again sent for, and committed; having rioted most of his Estate, the Remainder was Mortgaged to Sir John Arnott, of whom the King purchases his Interest, by which means he might the better give Relief to the Distressed Tenants from oppression.

The Earl now in Dumburton-Castle, with a Noble a day Pension, for his Maintenance, had Information how his Estate, with Castles, Kirkwall, Birsay, and other his Houses and Lands in the Isles, were rendered to the Kings Sheriffs, he endeavouring first to escape; but not effecting, sends his Base Son to get Forces, and to expel the Possessors.

He does so, and with some loose People assaults Birsay, and takes it, wherein he puts a Garrison of thirty Men, and hastens to Kirkwall, and seizes that also.

This Intrection comes to the Kings Knowledge and he hastens a Commission to the Earl of Caithness, Lieutenant of those Bounds; who, with his Cannon recovers the Castles in six weeks, and there within he made Prisoners; Robert Stewart, the Earl's Base Son, and four more Principal Actors were Arraigned at Edinburgh, Convicted, and hanged.

The Earl as Accessary, came to Trial, being Indicted for causing his Base Son to surprize Kirkwall and Birsay, inciting the People to Rebellion, and detaining the Castles Treasonably against the Kings Forces.

His Trial and Sentence.

He was allowed Prolocutors (Lawyers) of the best esteem, who deny the Libel (as they call it); but the Confession of his Base Son and others, with his Missive Letters written to one John Sharp, for detaining those Castles, and a Charter of certain Lands Assigned by him to one Patrick Halore, for assisting the Rebels, the Assize of Jury being his Peers, Earls and Lords, found him guilty of Treason; and he was presently Executed at Edinburgh.

This was the end of Patrick Earl of Orkney, Son to Robert Stewart, one of the Base Sons of King James the Fifth (for he had others) this Robert was at first Abbot of Holy-Rood-House for divers years after the forfeiture of Hepburn Earl of Bothwell, and obtaining those Isles, he exchanged the Abbacy, with the Bishoprick of Orkney, and so became sole Lord of the County. Patrick succeeding to an Elder Brother, and grown a Courtier, involved himself in great Debts, which made him the more Tyrannous over the People to recover his Wants.

At Glasgow was apprehended Ogleby a Jesuite, lately come from Gratts, by Command of his Superiors in that Colledge: he answered peremptorily to the Commissioners Questions, professing not to prejudice others by any Confession: their Torture to enforce him to impeach others, was to debar him Sleep for some time, until he was forced falsely to accuse any Body; which he, after Repose, would deny again.

The King was displeased with such Force to Men of his Profession; and if no Crime could be proved but his Calling, and saying Mass, they should banish him, not to return upon pain of Death; but if his Practise had been to induce the People to Rebellion, and had maintain'd the Popes Power transcendent over Kings, and refused the Oath of Allegiance, they should leave him to the Law; but withal they were to urge his Answer to these Questions.

1. Whether the Pope be Judge in Spiritualibus over his Majesty, and whether in Temporalibus, if it be in ordine ad Spiritualia?
2. Whether the Pope hath power to excommunicate Kings (such as are not of his Church) as His Majesty?
3. Whether he hath power to depose Kings after his Excommunication, and in particular, His Majesty?
4. Whether it be no Murder to kill the King so deposed?
5. Whether he hath power to absolve Subjects from the Oath of their Native Allegiance to His Majesty?

He Answers in Writing.

To the First affirmatively, in Spiritualibus; but Anno 1614. but whether in Temporalibus, he is not obliged to answer to any but a Judge of Controversies in Religion, the Pope, or one of his Authority.

To the Second Affirmatively; and that all persons Baptized are under the Popes Power.

To the Third he will not declare but to a Lawful Judge of Religion.

To the rest ut supra.

He could not be moved by Threats, but rather railed at the Oath of Allegiance, as damnable and treasonable against God; and so came to Trial of Life: but was told over-night, that he was not to be tried concerning his Profession, but for his former Answers to the Questions, which he may recall, and crave Mercy; but this he utterly refused.

And so was impanelled, grounded upon the Acts of Parliament, against such as declined the Kings Authority, or maintained other Jurisdiction, and upon his former Answers.

He protests not to acknowledge the Judges nor Judgment lawful; for if it be Treason here, it should be so in all other Kingdoms, which is not; your Acts of Parliament are made by partial men, and of Matter not subject to their Forum, for which I will not give a Fig. The King hath no Authority, but derivative from his Predecessors, who acknowledged the Popes Jurisdiction; if the King will be to me, as they were to mine, he shall be my King; if otherwise, I value him not; and for the Reverence I do to you bare-headed, it is ad redemptionem vexationis, not ad agnitionem Judicii.

That the Jury were either his Enemies; or his Friends; if Enemies, they could not sit upon his Trial; if Friends, they ought to assist him at the Bar; That what he suffered, was injurious, and not Justice; he had not offended, nor would crave Mercy. My Commission (said he) was by Command of my Superiors, and if I were abroad, I would return hither again, and repent only that I have not been so busy as I should, in that which you call perverting of Subjects, and I call saving of Souls; I do decline the Kings Authority, and will do it still in matter of Religion: the most of your Ministers maintain it, and if they be wise, will continue in that mind.

As for that Question, Whether the King being Deposed by the Pope, may be lawfully killed? Doctors of the Church hold the Affirmative, not improbably; and as it is not yet determined, so if it should be concluded, I will die in the Defence; and (now) to say it were unlawful, I will not to save my Life.

His insolent Speech was shortned by the Juries quick Return, who found him Guilty, and he had Sentence of Treason; and to stop his Railings, he was after Noon the same day Hanged at Glasgow.

He was a desperate second Ravilliack, and ready in that Devilish Doctrine of Deposing and Dethroning Kings; which he urged the more (he said) as consonant to the Kirk-Ministers Tenents, and that nothing troubled him, but to be taken away ere he had done that which all Scotland and England should not have prevented; and had it been performed, no Torments would have been by him refused.

So then we see the Cause of his Execution; for the King professed never to hang a Priest for his Religion.

The opening of the Spring gave opportunity to sundry Families of England to prepare themselves for Planting in America, upon no great encouragement of Profit or Pleasure, by any former Voyages of the English into those parts; but People and Trade increasing there, they would unburden this State with Foreign Adventures. The Design was for New England, a part of America, in the Ocean Sea; opposite to that part of America in the South-Sea, which Sir Francis Drake discovered in his Voyage about the World, and named it Nova Albion: But he was never employed thither as a Discoverer or Planter upon this part of America. Taking the Coast from Cape Florida, in Twenty Degrees (North-Latitude) North-Eastward to Cape Britain, between the Degrees of Latitude, from 20, to 45, King James granted Letters Patents, being about fifteen hundred Miles; but to follow it abroad, near two thousand Miles.

And all this Coast, from Cape Florida, of 20 Degrees, to 45, was first Discovered by John Cabot, with six Sail of Ships, who had his patent from Henry 7. Anno 1442, about the time that Columbus discovered the middle part of America for Ferdinand and Isabel of Spain, and is called the West-Indies.

The first Colony from England, was with Sir Walter Rawleigh, assisted in Company of Sir Ralph Lane, and Thomas Heriot, that Learned Mathematician, Anno 1584. who, in Honour of Queen Elizabeth, named it Virginia; leaving there sixteen Men, which were brought home by Sir Francis Drake, in his Return from his West-India Voyage a year after; and this part is contained from Florida, to the Chesapeake Bay.

The next Northward, is a part of Land, to which Sir John Popham Lord Chief Justice was sent, for Discovery and Trade, Anno 1606. but having no Success returned; and since it is called New-England.

Then the Land adjoining Northward, was discovered by Captain Gosnold, all that Coast being studded with broken Lands, and called by him Elizabeth's Isles.

Then you come to Cape Cod, and to the Discovery of Captain Weymouth's Land and Large River, and so forward, to other Plantations liethence of the English, so far as Cape Britain.

Then to Nova Francia, the Colonies of the French; which Land, in truth, they have engrossed, as being Elbow-room for all; and which ends at Cape Race, the Lands spreading from thence directly Northwards, and named New-found-England, until you sail into the Frozen Sea; where Davis, Bafin, and Hudson made large Discoveries many thousand Miles.

But to our Business: This Year, 1614. Capt. Smith intended for New-England, with two Ships; not to Plant, but to take Whales, and other Fish, and to Trade for Furs, and so returned.

And presently from Plymouth, he went out again with one Ship; and Michael Cooper with five from London, accompanied with four more from Plymouth, partly to Trade and Plant.

And indeed these People, for Planters, were suspected Notorious Schismatics, Brownists, Anabaptists, Families of Love, and the like, under such Notions, so together, and here and there strewed over with a Spice of Protestantism, but by the general Name of Puritans, which term included good and bad in their distinct Kinds, truly and ingeniously distinguished into the Puritan Knaave, and the Knaaves Puritan; but in truth, all of them (of the first Rank especially) Enemies to the Hierarchy of our Protestant Profession in the Church of England.

And

Anno 1614. And away they would go, for Elbowroom, to model a new Church Government, such as hereafter should happen, for (God knows) they were so diversly affected, that as yet they could conclude of none, nor ever would agree to any.

It was not impossible also, but those factions there might breed into extremes, and become hereafter Nurseries for all Nonconformants of Church or State, with some prejudice to this Government at home.

And therefore then there was a restraint for the present only, until by examination of some of their Principals remaining behind, a better account might be assured, concerning those that are sent before, for whose good behaviour there these were responsible here, and so they had leave to go.

And in a word at that time, and until these later days, most of the violent pretenders for Plantations either Governors or Assistants, here in their several Courts were a company of cunning contrivers, who abused the honest Adventurers, and of long time came loss to them in all their returns.

The King in debt consults for raising of monies by new Honours. Knight Baronets. † Salith a good Author.

The Kings bounty had stretched beyond the liberty of his Treasure, which he timely took up, and was free in rewarding merit by Honour of Knighthood, upon such whose estates were not answerable in value to other Gentry, before whom they were to take place of precedency, and therefore it was designed (twelve months since) by the late Treasurer Salisbury, to create a degree of Knight Baronets to precede all Knight Bachelors, being the earnest suit of themselves, ninety persons in all of good Birth and Estates, and each of them (except two and twenty) were then Knight Bachelors, and was done † to my knowledge, for I copied the list of them before it was presented to Salisbury; and as true, that his exception thereto was, that it would discontent the Gentry; to which themselves replied, that it would rather satisfy them in advance of Dignity before others, who now came behind those meaner men, who indeed the King was forced to Dub, for his honour and some merits of theirs; having no other reward or money to spare, and therein not much to blame, to oblige them that way; and Salisbury dying, it was now established: the design having Martial reference to Honour and Arms, the Prerogative of every Sovereign; as in former presidents of all Christian Princes, and States Monarchical and Republicks; especially upon distress of any Province or Place, for support or defence thereof.

And herein other Princes exceed in Example, and were never quarrelled at by any, as in Germany, Spain, France, Italy, Venice; and must it now be a crime in this King, in the settlement of his Inheritance here, to take leave to advance the Creation of one single Order? A new erect distinct Title, with those privileges to them and their heirs for ever; place before all Knights Bachelours and of the Bath, and all Bannerets (but they are not in being), to be impleaded by addition Baronet, and the Title Sir, and their Wives Lady; the King shall not Create any Degree under the Dignity of a Baron, that shall be Superior or Equal to them; no more to be made, but the full number of Two hundred, until some of these dye; but the younger Sons of Viscounts and Barons, (by Decree of the King and Council upon controversy) were adjudged to take place before them, and that their heirs males at One and twenty shall be Knighted, and shall have either in a Canton in their Coat of Arms, or in a Scutcheon, at their Election, the Arms of Ulster, Argent, a Hand Gules; their place in the Kings Armies to be in the gross, near the Kings Standard, for Arms. Defence thereof.

Nor was this done, but in the like Example or Noble way, for each Baronet to maintain thirty Foot-men for three Years at eight pence per diem, each Souldier in Service of the Kings Forces, for the establishment of the Province of Ulster in Ireland, not as yet emptied of Rebels, which came unto One thousand nine hundred and five pounds a piece; and it was their own humble suit afterwards to compound the expence at a certain value, and to put the charge in general upon the King; and he lost by the Bargain; the Composition came but to Ninety eight thousand five hundred and fifty pounds, and cost the King much more.

And for the Honour of their Degree and Memory, it may not be amiss to insert them in order of precedency in their Roll, Threescore and eight of them being Knights already, and Two and twenty Esquires.

Diab. Thomas Blaxton Esq;

Norff. Roger Townsend Esq;

The King considers how to get out of Debt, &c. It is well known that Queen Elizabeth left her Coffers empty, and her Revenue not ample, for in Treasurer Burghleys time, the profit of the Kingdom (besides Wards and Duchy of Lancaster) was One hundred eighty eight thousand one hundred ninety and seven pounds per annum; and the Payments were One hundred and ten thousand six hundred and twelve pounds per annum, in which these were constant per annum.

The Household Forty thousand pounds ordinary, and now increased necessarily almost treble.

The Privy Purse Two thousand pounds.

The Admiralty Thirty thousand pounds.

1. For support, this King was to proportion his Issues with his Revenues, both certain and casual.

2. By abating or reforming the excess of his Household.

3. By raising moneys, and improving the Crown Revenues.

For the first, He could not well tell how to begin that Lesson, for coming in hither with an increment of expence, Himself, Wife, and Children, and a large Train of old Servants to be new rewarded, the Marriage of his Daughter very lately; which expence in that amounted unto near One hundred thousand pounds, and her Aid-mony came but to Twenty thousand and five hundred pounds; and that we may see the charge and expence of this Mariage in particular, I shall set it down.

For the Palsgraves Diet at his standing-House, Six thousand pounds. Charge of the Palsgraves Marriage.

For his Diet at his Instalment of the Garter, Four thousand pounds.

For Diet at his Marriage, Two thousand pounds.

For Lodging for his Servants, Eight hundred and thirty pounds.

To the Wardrobe for Apparel for the Princess Elizabeth, Six thousand two hundred fifty two pounds.

For furnishing her Chamber, Three thousand twenty three pounds.

Apparel and necessaries for her to my L. Harringtons, One thousand eight hundred twenty nine pounds.

Jewels and Apparels for her Servants, Three thousand nine hundred and fourteen pounds.

To divers Merchants for Silks, &c. Nine hundred ninety five pounds.

The Lords Mask at her Marriage, Four hundred pounds.

For the Naval fight of Fire Works on the Thames at her Marriage, Four thousand eight hundred pounds.

More Fire Works on the Thames at her Marriage, Two thousand eight hundred and eighty pounds.

To Sir Edward Cecil as Treasurer for her Journey from hence to Heidlebergh, and for her Purse, Two thousand pounds.

For settling her Jointure, and charges to some of the Gentry to go thither and to take the Assurance, Eight hundred pounds.

For her Transport to Flushing, Five thousand five hundred fifty five pounds.

Total 53294 l.

Paid over to the Palsgraves Agent for her Portion, Forty thousand pounds.

The Total is, Ninety three thousand two hundred ninety and four pounds.

These expences put the King to consider of the best means of Recovery, so that several ways were proposed to make up his Disbursements answerable to his incomes; and the way was, the first work of ordinary good Husbandry, and might well be expected from a Paterfamilias, yet it would not for the present, Rebus sic stantibus, become this King, whose Fame and Honour (as all other Sovereignities, so his in particular) stood more upon reputation than profit; and therefore he (according to the magnificence of Royalty) left that consideration; and he had done reasonable well, if not too much, for satisfying his Train.

His second way was, To consider of his great expence of Household, now enlarged into several Courts, King, Queen, Prince, and Nursery; and these being look'd into, he was forc'd (contrary to the Royal and largest Heart of any of his Progenitors) to come to Retrenchments, and truly in this, he was advised to use the means of mean people, and others subordinate; Ingram and others.

And first, He removed by Proclamation a number of useless persons of his own Nation, that unnecessarily depended upon the bounty of his Court, and returned them home again.

Anno 1614. Then he proportioned to each Court their expence, particularly rated for personal Diet and dependance, Livery and Wages, Charge and Salary.

And this was done without publick complaint of any pressure upon the people (as hath been usual heretofore to Parliaments, and by them redressed) but prudently considered, and so referred to the Council Table.

The anti-ent way of the Household.

In ancient time the Household was regulated by Book order, and continued so to Henry 8. when Cardinal Wolsey (for more Honour to that Christmas King of immoderate expence) settled it, and so remained a ground work to this present time, being now so corrupt as that new ways were proposed, in effect to put down Tables, and to allow Attendance money, as France does; or else by setting up Hall again, to the best, first, and most magnificent order; that so being spent in publick to the Kings honour, the secret waste of Chamber Diet, and purloining out of the Court by back Doors prevented, most of the meaner Houses at Westminster, were maintained with Food and Firing, the stealth of under Chamberers.

We all know what excess was usual in our ancient Retinue and Servants, with blew Coats and Badges, especially respecting the Garter of St. George, who were now ordered to lessen their number, and afterwards to fifty Gentlemen, and no more, to each Knight of that Order, heretofore an excessive number, to vie it out who should bring most.

And to reform himself from the excess of his Royal Heart in gifts and rewards, he published Orders and Articles in print, in what manner his pleasure restrained his bounty, and in what natures he was willing to grant. Having been liberal to the Scots, whom he brought with him, Men of the greatest eminency at home, thereby to bind them here with Freehold Lands, as also with English Titles. For what held the great Gascoign Jean de Foix, firm to the Crown of England, but his Earldom of Kendall here? A neglect in Queen Elizabeth, to draw the chief Nobles in Ireland into England. By exchange or gift of Lands to have made them Freeholders here, she might then have spared Two millions in her Wars.

Scots sell the Lands
the King
gave them

But indeed the Kings gifts in Land to the Scots, unthankfully and unfittingly they sold, conveying that Treasure into Scotland, and so his great design of uniting them here became frustrate; and we find how many of them so engaged, have turned Adversaries to his Posterity.

The English repine at the Kings gratifying the Scots.

And it may be remembered well, that not a penny was given then freely to the Scots, but gave alarm to every part of England, Discourse, Notes, Copies of all Privy Seals for money given, and so shewed them in Parliaments; yet no noise of what the English had, though ten times more.

Benevolence.

But his free Hand having stretch'd his Purse-strings, then was a free Benevolence considered of, from such good Subjects, as in hearty affection to their Sovereign, were willing to contribute; as did the Lords and others: by which he might have experience how they would serve him, that served themselves so well. The building up of their own Fortunes and Factions, had been their diligent Studies, and his Service but the exercise of their pleasures; and his benevolence came but to Fifty two thousand nine hundred and nine pounds out of their purses, which yet madded the ill-minded men (Pillars (so some men called them) to the Kingdoms Liberties) always plotters to the Kingdoms miseries, who being ashamed to be out done in honesty and honour, they justly drew upon themselves a Mark of Malignancy, and so needed not otherwise to be noted (by giving in their names) as is pretended; and yet they would be meddling, devising poor Arguments, to pretend it was against the Subjects Liberties, though accustomed evermore by examples of all former Sovereigns.

Fac. 12.

But to tell your Historian how ancient the Custom of Benevolence hath been, ever since the Statute of 20 Hen. 8. that united Wales and England together, and to send their Members to Sit in our Parliament; where a Motion being made in the House of Commons for a Benevolence to be freely given to that King, an honest Knight (for a Welch County) made Answer, Mr. Speaker, This Word Benevolence, is a pretty Word, but I understand it not: yet sure it is something his Highness should have; if it be so, in Gods Name let him have it; the sooner the better, and so it may deserve Thanks, else it will not.

Benevolence its Antiquity

Thus it was then; but now it is held to be against Law, Reason and Religion; and Injustice and Impiety to be accepted.

And because his whole Reign was necessitous, and the want of Money for him to be liberal, was his Disease; I think fit to say somewhat here in excuse to all the future aims and ends which he took to get Money, which answers the third way of Improvement.

There was much ado in Council to advance the Crown by several wayes of improvement, by Grants in Parliament, wherein the King made some Trial: so be it examined from former examples, whether or no their Bounties exceeded his Merits. Some advised him to fall upon Acts of Resumption of Lands, Offices and Annuities, unadvisedly or profusely bestowed by his Predecessors, or himself, upon undeserving persons, which have been usually done by former Precedents of Princes, ubi necessitas Regis cogit; but this his Noble Heart disdained. Indeed it was called by some wicked counsel to work upon his Necessity, thereby to make him odious to his meritorious Servants, and good Friends.

vours to advance the Kings revenue.

Did he ever do as others, Hen. 3. to his Subjects? of whom one sayes, Quicquid habuerunt in esculentis & poculentis; rusticorum enim equos, bigas, vina, victualia ad libitum cepit.

He made trial of voluntary Lones, or Benevolence by Privy Seal, which was neither burdensome, nor dishonourable; being so petit in the Purses of the ablest Subjects.

But Compulsion I know of none, unless you call in the Star-Chamber to the Accompt, the Muilt and Fines of great offenders, and perhaps adjudged by that Court to some value as the Crime deserved, which might be suspected in favour or support of the Kings Occasions; yet you will find, when such happened, it was in the excess of unparalleld Crimes, not in other Courts of Justice liable to Examination or Punishment, which as it was in Terrorem populi, so now in these our latter dayes being suppressed, in favour and liberty of the Nation, the wickedness of sinful man takes freedom to offend in such horrid wayes, that nought but some such extraordinary course of Justice can possibly reform.

Pawn-

Anno 1614. Pawning of Jewels and Plate had been frequent by all former Princes, and that not in ordinary wayes; Aurum & Focalia Fœnetri Sancti Edwardi Confessoris vasa aurea, & diversa Focalia.

The manner of raising Money formerly.

Nay, Magnam Coronam Anglia. Yes, and Queen Elizabeth did it, and had no more need than he; but he did not.

To assign Customes, and pawn the next Subsidies to be granted, hath been a Device to draw on Supplies the sooner; which he refused.

The Privy Seal indeed he made use of, but very moderately in comparison of former Presidents, if you examine the Records and Rolls of willing Subjects bountiful Assistance.

Compulsory wayes have been Presidents to Necessitated Princes, exacted from Merchants, Strangers, or be committed to Prison, and the English Subject little better favoured.

What will you say of Hen. 8? Ten per Cent. of all Goods, Jewels, Utensils, and land extremely rated per Sacramentum suorum. In that Rank may be remembered a Custom called Liberalitas Populi, &c. but in the gathering by Commissioners, such Threats were used, as was little better than violence, and was customarily reduced down to Queen Mary. Indeed Queen Elizabeth had a little better way; She returning their Bounty back again sometimes, whereupon they doubled the Sum to her Majesty.

There is a Statute to compel Subjects to attend the Kings Service; which was repealed by Queen Mary, and that again repealed by Parliament of this King; of which truly he made no other advantage, than to send half a dozen refractory Puritans, that troubled the State, on his Errand into Ireland, and yet paid them good Salary for their pains, which had been usual heretofore in the like case, at their own cost.

Trading themselves, I could shew Presidents for this also, of other Princes engrossing Trade of Commodities; as one did with all the Wools, at a long day, and a narrow price, and sold them over Seas with great gain: the like of Tin, Corn; nay, bind all men to Trade their Staple to one certain place, and yet themselves Trade to places of more advantage, and this was the Glory that Queen Elizabeth stoop'd unto, and took occasion to Trade in, when the Gain was advantage, though but in Strong Beer.

Licensing others also. It was so ordinary heretofore to raise Monies by Licensing Trade, non obstante Statutes and Customs, as that those grew to high complaints; yet necessitated Kings continued these non obstantes, non obstante, and this King found them in Grants, for certain years in being, and made no further example of them, unless Transporting of a quantity of undrest White Cloaths to the Earl of Cumberland, and some others, and that upon good reason of State too.

Raising Rates of Merchandise. There will never want Will in the Merchant to abuse each other, and gain to themselves; and therefore as all Princes have occasion, and the increase of Commodities requiring, do raise the Rates; and this was done cum consensu Mercatorum: but of late the just Prerogative imposed it, where the Merchants gain might give way, if you could conceive it convenient to their Conscience, ever to acknowledge any gain sufficient.

Letting Customs to Farm. He did so: Some murmured, it grieving the Subject to pay Custom to the Subject; but do they serve the King for nought? Infinite Gain! It was then wished that they should declare their Benefit, and afterwards become Collectors for the King. Fac. 12.

Queen Elizabeth, after she had raised Custom-er Smith from 14000 l. per annum, to 42000 l. made him discount what he had got. This King did not so; yet he did better: borrowed Money, and never paid it them: Besides, they were alwayes at hand to be squeezed; and what his Successor failed in that way (being perhaps surprized by Death) the next long Parliament did to purpose, ruined them all upon old Scores.

And was it not time for King James to do so? We all know by the succeed, such Contractors lost not by their Farm: by which we may be assured how mightily Trade increased by the wise Government of this King; and no Text more certain to prove it, than the Inter and Overloping of Merchants to get in to be Farmers; so mighty was their gain, and so secret this their Trade, as (but by their pride, profuse and stately comportment since) could never otherwise have been imagined.

Liberties and Penalties. There have been Kings that have Proclaimed, Quod omnes Chartæ irritæ forent, nisi posteriori Sigillo roborentur. Nay, Qui suis volebant gaudere, innovarent Chartas suas de novo; and this was done by Commissioners, or by Quo Warranto against all.

And for Penal Laws, though I know, that many Projectors advised, yet former Examples of this kind have evermore been fatal to those of the Quorum; but this King declined it all.

Selling Offices had been done formerly; not a King scaped it to sell great Offices of the Crown and State, for Years, for Life, under the Kings Hand and Seal: they may be seen in the Records, thus, Chancellor, Chief Justice, all Keepers of Records, Clerks of Assize, Masters of Game and Parks, and what else of Profit and Repute.

In France it is common, not one escapes; and in Spain as usual, and defended as lawful; and there are some that have prescribed them amongst the best Rules of Reigning Sovereignty, both Ecclesiastical and Temporal. It may be, that Favourites and Courtiers made bold with their Interests in their Master to receive their Rewards; but his own hands were ever closed from such corruption.

Sale of Honours. It was the ancient Power, and that Legal, to call Landed men to Knight-hood or Fine; which he did by Favour and Grace which he gave: Truly I believe he was no Niggard in them too. But indeed, there being no Chivalry, or Deeds of Arms in this Time of Peace, to make men merit Honours; those that had it (Favourites excepted) I rank in Desert, and so of due reward. To others I confess, they paid for it, and they were those off-hand Lords as were made Earls together, that paid eight thousand pounds apiece, and the pride of their hearts never bogled at the purity of the Project, but swallowed down the Corruption, without check of Conscience; and yet (as some say) some of them set their Sons to beg again part of it for their private Expence.

The Baronets were Created upon a better Score, and both these without any Plot of State, as was feigned: and the Designs upon the Earl of Salisbury for the former, and upon Buckingham for the latter, when in truth, Pride and Ambition made the Project their own; and in Gods Name let such pay the price thereof; and I know as honest and discreet as our latter times can boast of, moulded other such Designs for degrees of Honour, to be hereditary in Tail, as under-Degrees to those already in use, which yet the King, for that present, declined.

Coin and Bullion. All men know that Coin and Bullion in any State, admit great wisdom in the management; and as many overtures were now offered, as could stand with Justice or customary Presidents. It was much urged to abate Money, which was never used by any but as a last shift, full of dishonour, as in Bankrupts, and a certain inconvenience to all Revenues of Rents, and so to the King in that particular, as the greatest Landlord, and so his disadvantage, which he declined; Monies being esteemed, quantum in massa, not altogether per sculptum, and so hold esteem by their true value; Queen Elizabeth held it up from abasement, which her great potent Enemy Spain would not do.

Then was advised Cambium Regis, an Office ancient, until of late the Goldsmiths have engrossed it; some thoughts there were to make the Exitus exceed the Introitus in Traffick, that the unnecessary, nay useless Commodities brought in, (in old time accompted, Wines, Spices, Silks and Fine Linnen) the Manufactures of Out-Lands, and sold to us to a great value, even in Babies and Rattles, being the said occasion then, the great want of Bullion, not sufficient in specie to pay the Lender in principal. At last it was concluded to get advantage in the Coinage, either Simple Metal, or Mixt; by which we see, that all Monarchs have Aere, Argentum & Auro, and so was Coined only Farthings, lest other Stamps of more Value should clog the Kingdom; and a proportion was (together) Coined, and do what his State could, was in few years counterfeited by our Neighbour Hollanders, and as many Firkins filled by them, that the Farthing-Office was not able to rechange upon the Rebate for Silver, which yet the King continued, till these late Times called in, examined the Inconvenience of Leaden and Copper Tokens, as great a Benefit now to Retailers, as formerly to the State, but with much more inconvenience to the Nation, being only utterable and current to each Retailer of his own Mint and Mart.

He was forced to adventure upon the use of Parliaments, and to begin with Money, but not to build long upon their Discusses, whereby came that Saying in common, as of no other Design, Subsidies granted, Parliament ended; and therein the disadvantages he found, might well distinguish him, and their less frequent Calling from his Predecessor, and her often Invitation, and indeed discourage any Prince that should next succeed her.

The Disposition and Spirit of the Times, considered, were not alike with him; her People ingenuous and un-inquisitive, wrapped in Innocency and humble obediee; but in his time, their Passions and Disaffections had got loose Reins, the Snaffle in their Teeth, contesting and capitulating.

The Reasons of her Actings were her own Will; for then she having just cause to complain of Oppressions (as they did) they only conveyed them to her notice, and left the Time and Order of Redress to her Princely Discretion; and yet when it was not altogether concerning them, she would bid them meddle to amend their own Manners; nor were her Messengers choaked by any Reproach, that came of such Errands. In his time, so much degenerate from the purity of the former, under pretence of Reforming and Freedom, that their very Enquiry extended to the Privacy of the King himself.

Nusquam Libertas gratior extat, Quam sub Rege pio.

Afflicting themselves to search for Mischiefs, and being found, to scandalize the State with them.

How these were nourished and afterwards formed, the Revolution of time hath made obvious to all men, and saves me the Labour to set down the Particulars.

It was no Novelty then to applaud the former times, and to vilifie the present; for indeed her Fame carried it current in a long continuance, to have lived and died Royally and Victoriously, without the disquiet of the Peoples affections, and being but a Sojourner in the World, in respect of her Maiden-hood, might be, and was a Blessing to her own times; the impression of her good Government, besides her happy Memory, is not without some effect, which doth survive her; but this King blessed already with Royal Issue, and whose fruitful Bed promised Increase, it was more proper & agreeable with him to be studious not only in the Transitory part of good Government, but in those Acts which are in their nature permanent and perpetual to his Posterity, rather to increase, than diminish the Advantages of Sovereignty, which he aimed at, and for his part and time did perform; but it is a tender Subject to discuss; I have done.

Yet I may add a Truth; That all the force and power of his Progenitors, and all their Merits and Policies to boot (for more than an Age before hers) could never borrow so much Credit upon their Privy Seals, as she did during her Time; and left them all for this King to discharge, great and vast Sums; which shews, that Necessity put her upon that piece of State, when neither her Exchequer could afford Relief, nor the urgency of her Affairs endure the delays of Parliaments assistance; for in truth, she had strained likewise from the People in that way of Subsidies, more than ever any Prince (I will not say many) that were before her.

She had the way to do it, by complaisance of a Princefs; and he a King, not affecting that course, fail'd of such effects.

The Qu. methods to get Money.

For he was by nature more reserved than popular, and had his Virtues fitter for estimation, than love, and did like a King; his Soul being planted higher, overhot such Matters as lay level to anothers eye.

And so (as I have said) some of these ways to get Money, were set afoot this year 1614. and upon several occasions in his Reign after proposed, but not effected.

In those times of Trade, the Merchant-Adventurer usually transported our English Cloaths, white, undress'd, and un-Died, and the Dutch had got the Art by the end, fitted and stretch'd them by their Knavery, and so return'd them to us at high Rates; of this the Cloth-workers of London complain; which was soon remedied by

Pro-

Anno 1614. Proclamation, forbidding the Transport; and to countenance that Corporation, the King was Feasted in their Hall, and made Free of their Company, the rather, because their Coat of Arms, The Thistle, is the Scots Embleme; and over went our Cloaths accordingly, Died and Dress'd; which the Hollanders forbid to be brought by them; and therefore dealt with our Fell-mongers, and got over our Wools, and the Mystery of making Cloth.

Whereupon, we Proclaim and forbid the Transport of our Wools: the Quarrel between those two Corporations, and their respective Gains is by the Merchant-Adventurers complain- ed of, and for mitigation of their mischief, several Warrants for some thousands of Cloaths were sparingly Licensed by wisdom of State, to be sent over; and so evenly moderating the Mystery of Merchants that cozen each other; and at their great Feast likewise the Prince was made Free.

K. of Den- mark in England. His Enter- tainment. The King of Denmark makes a Second Visit to see his Sister the Queen, for fourteen dayes, upon no Business of State, only his Affections to her, and Jollity to himself, with a Train of no more than half a hundred persons of Honour and Nobles, of his own breeding to the Dutch Diet and Drink, to which he was too much inclined, and oft-times had his Load; for we were not wanting of our Boon Companions that waited on him for that purpose.

E. of Suff. succeeds Salisbury in the Treasurer- ship. The Earl of Suffolk succeeding Salisbury in the Treasurership, yielded his Office of Lord Chamberlain of the Kings Household to his Son-in-Law Somerset, as aforesaid; and he the Place of Secretary unto Sir Ralph Winwood, lately returned from the Netherlands, where he had been Ambassador Lieger of a long time.

News of Overburys Death. The Summers Progress returns the King to London, where had been some muttering of Overburys Death in the Tower, Discovered beyond the Seas by the Apothecaries Boy that empoysoned the Clyster, and having his Reward, was sent out of the way to Flushing; where he told the Tale to Trimball, the Kings Agent there; by whom it came to Winwood's knowledge, and so to the King, and by degrees to particular Examinations, Confessions and Executions of all these; Weston an Apothecary, Mrs. Turner, a Doctor of Physick's Widow, Sir Jervis Yelvis, Lieutenant of the Tower, and Franklin, all Accessaries.

Accompli- ces. Trial of Weston. But Weston being the principal Actor, it was therefore his Turn first to come to the Bar, at the Hustings Court in Guild-Hall; where, beyond Judge Cooke's expectation, the man stood mute, notwithstanding all Allurements and Threats that could be used; and so was returned to Prison: Cooke informs the King, That unless the principal be Convict, the Accessaries could not be tried: But by continual Cunning, and some fair promises of Pardon, Weston put himself upon his Countrey, and was Cast, Condemned, and Hanged. Cooke not content with that, gets knowledge under-hand that Serjeant Yelverton, an Obliged Servant to the House of the Howards, had advised this Counsel for Weston, not to betray any parties; and this Tale was told by Sir Robert Cooke, from his Fathers Confession.

After all, comes Somerset and his Countess, and are both Condemned. Some that were then at their Trial, and not partial, conceived in Conscience, he might have been spared that Sentence, and as himself sayes to the King, That he fell rather for want of well defending, than by force of Proofs; for I so far (saies he) forsook my self and my Cause, as that I might be more Condemned for that, than for the Matter.

And because it was a Story of evil Fame, near and far off, I shall put it to the Test, in a brief Narratory, being pleaded before the Lord Elmore, Chancellor and High Steward for the Day, and most of the Peers at Westminster-Hall, May 1616. in this manner;

A Peer of the Land hath this Priviledge upon Treason or Felony Indicted, to be Tried by his Peers; the King by Letters Patents assigns some Sage Lord of the Parliament to be High Steward of England, for that day of his Arraignment; who, before that time, makes Precept to his Serjeant at Arms, to warn to appear before him a certain number of Lords of the Parliament, twelve at least, upon that day at Westminster; at which time the High Steward shall sit under the Cloth of State, and cause his Commission to be read; the same Searjeant returns his Precept, and calls the Lords; who appearing by Name, and Set, the Lieutenant of the Tower is called, and brings his Prisoner into the Court to the Bar. The High Steward then declares to the People the cause why the King hath Assembled those Lords and the Prisoner, and perswades him to Answer without fear freely, and commands the Clerk of the Crown to read the Indictment unto him, and to ask him if he be Guilty or not? To which he usually answers, Not Guilty, and to be Tried by God and his Peers; then the Kings Attorney and Serjeants at Law give Evidence against him; whereto, when he hath given Answer, the Lieutenant of the Tower is commanded to return with the Prisoner from the Bar, whilst the Lords do secretly confer in the Court together; and then the Lords rise up out of their Places, and consult among themselves; and what they affirm, shall be done upon their Honour without Oath.

And being so agreed (or the greatest number) they return and take their places again in Court, and the High Steward demands of the youngest Lord first, if he that is Arraigned be Guilty or not? and so the next in order, and the rest, each one answering Yea or No: Then the Prisoner is sent for to the Bar, to whom the High Steward recites the Verdict of the Peers, and doth give Judgment accordingly. Stanford Pleas del Corone, Lib. 3. Placit. 188.

The Antiquity of this kind of Trial, by Antiquity their Opinion is grounded upon Magna Charta, but others take it to be more ancient, though there inserted by Henry 3. but was brought in by the Conquerour, being answerable to the Norman and French Laws, and agreeable with the Customs Feudal; where almost all Controversies arising between the Sovereign and his Vassals are tried per Judicium Parium suorum.

And if a Peer upon his Arraignment of Treason, do stand Mute, Judgment shall be given upon his Indictment, and yet shall not be pressed to death, but saves the Forfeiture of his Lands. Stat. Westm. Edw. 4. Dier 205. but if upon Indictment of Felony, he may be mute.

The Reason of Magna Charta aforesaid, is there expressed, where he was Indicted at the Kings Suit of Treason or Felony; the words being (nec super eum ibimus, we will not pass or sit in Judgment upon him, but by his Peers) but if an Appeal of Murder or other Felony, be be sued by any common person against a Peer, Anno he shall be tried by common persons, and not by 1615. Peers. Stan. Pleas Lib. 3. Brooke Trial, 142. But yet this Priviledge hath some Restraint; for an Archbishop or Bishop, though Lords of Parliament, out of Parliament-time, in such cases shall be Tried by a Jury of Knights, and other substantial persons, upon their Oaths, because Ecclesiasticks cannot pass in like cases upon Trial of other Peers; for they are forbidden by the Canon and Ecclesiastick Laws to be Judges of Life and Death; though as Barons of the Land, they may have equal Right to Sit, as any other Lay-Peers, and may if they please, be present.

You see the great regard the Law hath to the Word of a Peer (heretofore) upon his Honour, and yet how many ordinarily break their Oaths in common?

And these premised, we come to the Case of Somerset and his Countess.

First, Therefore Sir Tho. Overbury for a time was known to have great interest and straight Friendship with the E. of Somerset, both in his meaner Fortunes, and after, inasmuch that he was a kind of Oracle of Direction unto him; and if you will believe his own Vaunt (being indeed of an insolent and Thraconical disposition) he took upon him, that the Fortunes, Reputation and Understanding of this Gentleman, who is well known to have had an abler Teacher, proceeded from his Company and Counsel; and this Friendship rested not only in Conversation, and Business at Court; but likewise in communication of State; for my Lord of Somerset exercising at that time, by his Majesties special Favour and Trust, the Office of Secretary, did not forbear to acquaint Overbury with the Packets and Dipatches from all Parts of France, Spain and the Low Countreys, and this not by Glimpses, or now and then rounding in the Ear for a Favour, but in a settled manner; Packets were sent, sometimes opened by my Lord, sometimes unbroken, unto Overbury, who perused them, Copied them, Registered them, made Table-Talk of them, as he thought good. So the time was, when Overbury knew more of the Secrets of State than the Council-Table did; nay, they were grown to such Inwardness, as they made a play of all the world besides themselves, so as they had Cyphers and Jargons for the King and Queen, and great Men of the Realm, things seldom used, but either by Princes, or their Confederates; or at the Court, or at the least by such as practise and work against, or (at least) upon Princes.

But as it is a Principle in Nature, that the best things are in their corruption the worst, and the sweetest Wine makes the fowrest Vinegar; so it fell out with them, that this excess, as I may say, of Friendship, ended in mortal Hatred on my Lord of Somerset's part.

It hath been said, that Frost and Frowd ends Fowl, and I may add a third, and that is, Friendship of ill Men, which is truly said to be Conspiracy, and not Friendship; for it happened, that the Earl of Somerset fell into an unlawful Love, towards that unfortunate Lady, the Countess of Essex, and to proceed to a Marriage with her; this Marriage and purpose did Overbury mainly impugn, under pretence to do the true part of a Friend, for that he accounted her an unworthy Woman; but the truth is, Overbury who (to speak plainly) had little that was solid for Religion or Moral v. but was wholly pos-sest with Ambition and Vain glory, was loath to have any partners in the favor of my Lord of Somerset, and especially not any of the House of Howards, against whom he had professed hatred and opposition. Fac. 13.

And that this is no sinister construction, will appear, when you shall hear that Overbury made his brags, that he had won him the love of the Lady by his Letters and industry: so far was he from being tender of Conscience in this point.

And certainly howsoever the Tragical misery of that poor Gentleman Overbury might somewhat obliterate his faults; yet because we are not upon point of civility, but to discover the face of truth; for that it is material to the true understanding of the state of this cause, Overbury was in many things to be blamed, and in his commendations the Ballads may be mended for that point, which paint him out otherwise; and partiality must be blamed, which now a days favours him, in malice to the memory of the Ministers of these times. Overbury in some things faulty.

But to proceed, when Overbury saw that he was like to be dispossessed of my Lords Grace, which he had possessed so long, and by whose greatness he had promised himself to do Wonders, and being a man of an unbounded and bold Spirit, he began not only to diswade but to deter him from the love of that Lady; and finding him fixed, thought to find a strong remedy, and supposing that he had my Lords Head under his Girdle, in respect of communication of secrets of State (as he calls them himself) secrets of Nature, and therefore dealt violently with him to make him desist, with menaces of Discovery and the like. Hereupon issued two streams of hatred upon Overbury, the one from the Lady, in respect that he crossed her Love, and abused her Name, (which are Furies in Women); the other of a more deep nature, from my Lord of Somerset himself, who was afraid of Overburys nature, and if he did break from him and fly out, he would wind into him, and trouble his whole Fortunes; so certainly it was resolved that Overbury must die. To accomplish his death there occurred two ways; the one of Assault, the other of Poyson.

For that of Assault, after some proposition and attempt, they passed from it, as a thing too open and subject to more variety of shame: that of Poyson likewise as an hazardous thing, and Subject to many preventions and cautions, especially to such a working and jealous Brain as Overbury had, except he was first in their Hands: therefore the way was first to get him over Seas, or into a trap, and lay him up, and then they could not miss the mark; and therefore in the execution of this Plot, it was concluded that his pride should be designed to some Honourable employment in Foreign parts, and should underhand by himself, my Lord of Somerset, be encouraged to refuse it, and so upon contempt he should be laid Prisoner in the Tower, and then they thought he should be close, and Death should be his Bail. The manner how they attempted his Life.

Yet were they not at their end, for they considered, that there must be a fit Lieutenant of the Tower for that purpose, and likewise a fit under-keeper of Overbury. They consulted about it.

First, They should meet with many impediments in the giving and exhibiting of the Poyson.

Secondly, They should be exposed to note and Their falling out, and the Consequence thereof.

Anno 1616. And thirdly, Overbury in the mean time might write clamorous and furious letters to his friends, and so all might be disappointed.

They agree upon the method.

And therefore the next link of the Chain was, to displace the then Lieutenant Wade, and to place Telvis, a principal abetter in the impoysonment; to displace Carew, that was under-keeper in Wades time, and to place Weston that was the actor in the impoysonment.

And this was done in such a while, that it may appear to be done as it were in a breath.

Then when they had this poor Gentleman in the Tower, where he could not escape nor stir, where he could not feed but by their Hands, where he could not Speak or Write but through their Trunks, then was the time to act the last day of this Tragedy.

Then must Franklin the Purveyor of the Poyson, in May 1613. procure five, six, seven several Poysons, to be sure to hit his Complexion; then must Mistress Turner, Doctress of the Poysons, advise what Works at present, and what at distance; then must Weston be their Tormentor, and chace him with Poyson after Poyson, Poyson in salt meats, Poyson in sweet meats, Poyson in Medicines and Vomits, until at last his Body was almost come by use of Poysons, to the state of Mithridates his Body, by the use of Treacle and Preservatives, that the force of the Poysons was blunted upon him, Weston confessing, when he was chid for not dispatching, that he had given him enough to Poyson twenty Men.

Impoyson him from March to September.

And because all this asked time, (impoysoning from March 9. to September 14.) courses were taken by Somerset both to divert all the true means of Overburys delivery; and to entertain him with continual Letters, partly with hopes and protestations for his delivery, and partly with other Fables and Negotiations; somewhat like some kind of persons which keep in a Tale of Fortune-telling, when they have a felonious intent to pick their Pockets and Purfes, until at last they hastened his destruction by an impoysoned Glyster; and this is the narration of this act which I have summarily recited.

Manner of the Countess her behaviour at her Tryal.

Then comes his Countess to her Trial, guilty of too much contrivance and practise, though in Murder it be crime enough, yet she confessed that which could not be proved; and at her Trial, she seemed drowned in a deluge of grief, being therein beholden to nature, that she should vent her self in Tears; seeing that sorrow which cannot bleed in the eyes, often festers in the heart; and so it appeared in her excess. Women can hardly do any thing without over-doing; feminine passions must either not be full or overflow. And indeed she could not utter one word in her own Defence, which begat relenting even in the Council that pleaded against her, who otherwise take pride to force Arguments, making their Tongues their Ware, and Eloquence their Trade: but her sorrowful silence needed the less Rhetorick in them, to urge her guilt; or in her Judges to consult the weight of her crime.

Their Reprieve.

These considerations moved the Lord Steward and Peers jointly, to move his Majesty for mercy, and for the present procured their Reprieve back to the Tower; but indeed she was dead whilst living, being almost drowned in despair, to work out her repentance, for which cause principally her life and his were enlarged; as conceiving it the worst of Justice to kill both Body and Soul;

and after long imprisonment and true and hearty penance nine or ten Years together, and no doubt Repentance also; they had liberty out of the Tower in January 1621. and confined to the Country, and at last their pardons were procured, which in truth, notwithstanding her great Family and deserving Friends, faith Sunder-son, got but by inches, four months before the Kings death, which was Anno 1624.

At last pardoned.

But in the whole Execution, where so many suffered, let the Prefacer to the Pamphlet of Fables, The Court and Character of King James, pick out a greater Precedent in any History more remarkable for exquisite Justice, than this of the King; wherein, by the way, he may be allowed his own even Conscience, for Justice and Mercy both, which no doubt hath found acceptance at God's Tribunal in his behalf, and his posterity in due time by our Saviours merit shall be gathered together in the the mystery of mans Redemption.

And for the other Historian, let his memory be blamed for recounting so many untruths, and yet Hypocritically he closes with this Gloss, Pardon (says he) the sharpness of these expressions, for they are for the glory of God.

Hist. of Great Brit.

I could say more in this and other unfortunate Stories of backward times, but I delight not in ambitious pains in an useless description of miseries; I had rather shew you what Somerset could say for himself, concerning his Land, much more in doubt for his life; it being a piece of charity to the distressed, and to the memory of the deceased. I shall not therefore conceal it, and the length thereof.

May it please your Majesty,

BY this Gentleman your Majesties Lieutenant, I understand of some halt you made, and the cause of it, at such time as he offered to your Majesty my Letters; but soon after your Majesty could resolve your self, and behold me nothing so diffident of you; but in humble Language petitioning your favour; for I am in hope that my condition is not capable of so much more misery, as I need to make my passage to you by such way of intercession.

Somerset Letter to the King.

This which follows after, I offer your Majesty, though not as to your self, for upon less motive you can find favour for me.

Now I need only move, not plead before your Majesty, as my case doth stand; for what I seek to have done, follows upon what you have already done, as a consequence and succeeding growth of your own act.

But to the effect, that your Majesty may see, that there is enough to answer those (if any such there be) as do go about to pervert the exercise of your Power, and to turn it from its own clear excellency, for to minister unto their passions; I have presumed to this end to awake your Majesties own conceit upon this subject, which can gather to it self better and more able defences in my behalf upon this view: For though the acts of your mercy, which are not communicable, nor the causes of them, with others; as derived from those secret motives which are only sensible and privy to your own Heart, and admit of no search or discovery to any general satisfaction; and that under this protection I might guard my particular sufficiently; yet my case needs not hide it self, but attend the dispute with any that would put upon it

Anno 1616. it a monstrous and heavy shape, though that I must acknowledge that both Life and Estate are forfeited to you by Law; yet so forfeited, that the same Law gives you the same Power to preserve as it doth to punish, whereby your Majesties higher Prerogative doth not wrestle with it, nor do you infringe those grounds by which you have ever Governed; so as the resistence is not great, that your Majesty hath for to give Life, and which is less in the gift of Estate; for that Law casts wholly upon your self, and yields it as fit matter for exercise of your goodness. Once it was your Majesties gift to me, so it may be better not taken, for to avoid to take that which hath been once their own; and I may say farther, that Law hath not been severe upon the ruine of innocent posterity, nor yet cancelled nor cut off the merits of Ancestors, before the Politick Hand of State had contrived it into these several forms, as fitted to their ends and Government.

To this I may add that whereupon I was Judged, even the Crime it self might have been none, if your Majesties Hand had not once touched upon it, by which all access unto your favour was quite taken from me. Yet as it did at length appear, I fell rather for want of well defending than by the violence or force of any proofs; for I so far forsook my Self, and my Cause, as that it may be a question whether I was more condemned for that, or for the matter it self, which was the subject of that days Controversie.

Then thus far nothing hath appeared wherein your Majesty hath extended for me your Power, beyond the reasonable bound; neither doth any thing stand so in the way of your future proceedings, but rather make easie your Majesties favour for my relief.

What may then be the cause that malice can pitch upon, wherefore your Majesty should not proceed to accomplish your own work? Aspersions are taken away by your Majesties letting me loose to the utmost power of Law, with the Lives of so many offenders, which yieldeth the World subjects of sorrow rather then appetite to more Blood. But truth and innocency protect themselves in poor men, much more in Kings; neither was there such aspersion (God knows) in any possibility towards your Majesty, but among those who would create those pretences to mislead your Majesty, and thereby make me miserable; if not this (whereof the vertue and use was in the former time and now determined) there is not any but your pleasure.

It is true, I am forfeited to your Majesty, but not against you by any treasonable or unfaithful act; besides there is to be yielded a distinction of men, as in faults; in which I am of both under the nearest degrees of exception.

Yet your Majesty hath pardoned Life and Estate to Traitors and Strangers, sometimes the one, sometimes the other; nay, to some concerned in this business, wherein I suffer, you have pardoned more unto them than I desire, who (as it is reputed) if they had come to the test, had proved Copper, and should have drunk of the bitter cup as well as others.

But I do not by this envy your favours to any persons, nor seek I to draw them into the Yoak with my self, but applaud your Majesties goodness, being in that respect in a near possibility to come at me; besides this to Etwish your Majesty hath given an Estate, which is a greater gift than Life, because it extends to posterity, who was the worst deserver in this business. An unoffended instrument might have prevented all after-mischief, who for his own ends suffered it, and by the like arts afterwards betrayed it.

To this I may add Tresham in the Powder Treason, upon whose Successors I do not cast any of his infamy, yet he preserved himself to posterity; so as what he, or others such as he, have defrauded by the arts of Law, and whom their own unfaithfulness made safe; I have much a do to hold my ingenuity and confidence how it may be, because I distrusted not your Majesty, or because it returned in your power from whom I had it. Is it in danger to be broken or dismembred? Let me hope that there is nothing which by favour may be excused, or by industry might have been avoided, that will fail me, where your Majesty is to determine. It is not I that put your Majesty in mind opportunely, it is he that was your Creature, it is Somerset with all your honours and envious greatness, that is now in question. Kings themselves are protected from the breach of Law, by being favourites and Gods Anointed; which gives your Majesty like priviledge over yours, as I took from Doctor Donne, his Sermon, That the goodness of God is not so much acknowledged by us in being our Creator, as in being our Redeemer; nor in that he hath chosen us, as that nothing can take us out of his Hand; which in your Majesties remembrance let me challenge and hope for: for the first accesses of favour they may be ascribed unto ones own pleasing themselves; but that appears to be for our sakes, and for our good, when the same forsakes not our civil desires.

This Redemption I crave, not as to my own person, but with your benefits once given; nor do I assume them very deep, for I have voluntarily departed from the hopes of my Pension, Place, Office: I only cleave to that which is so little as that it will suffer no parting or diminution.

And as in my former Letters, so by this, I humbly crave of your Majesty not to let the practices of Court work upon your Son the Prince, not fearing the sufferance of my loss in that particular, so much (for I cannot lose it, but willingly all with it) as for to take off the Stage, that which in the attempt may prove inconvenient.

But if your Majesty have any respects to move you to suspend your goodness towards me, let that which is mine rest in your own Hands, till that you find all opposite humors conformed to your purpose.

I have done wrong to my self, thus to entertain such a doubt of your Majesty; but the unrelenting of adversaries, which when you will have them will soon alter; and that all this while I have received nothing of present notice for direction or to comfort me from your Majesty, hath made me to expostulate with my self thus hardly; for God is my Judge, Sir, I can never be worthy of, if I have these marks put upon me of a Traitor, as that tumbling and disordering of that Estate, would declare. The divorce from your presence, lays too much upon me, and this would upon both.

I will say no further, neither in that which your Majesty doubted, my aptness to fall into, for Anno 1614. for my cause nor my confidence is not in that distress, as for to use that mean of intercession or any thing besides, but to remember your Majesty that I am the workmanship of your Hands, and bear your stamp deeply imprinted in all the characters of favour; that I was the first plant ingrafted by your Majesties Hand in this Place, therefore not to be unrooted by the same Hand, lest it should taint all the same kind with the touch of that fatalness, and that I was even the Son of a Father, whose Services are Registered in the first Honours and impressions I took of your Majesties favour, and laid there as a Foundation-stone of that building.

 These and your Majesties goodness for to receive them, is that I rely upon, praying for your Majesties prosperity; I am in all humbleness,

Your Majesties Loyal Servant and Creature

R. SOMERSET.

Marriage of the Lady Arabella Stuart and Sir William Seymour. Their pedigree.
 I should not trouble you with the Marriage of the Lady Arabella Stuart, and Sir William Seymour, both of kin to the Crown, she by the Earl of Lenox in Scotland as is well known, and he Grandchild to the third Son and the heir of the Earl of Hartford, created by Henry 8. whose Sister he married 1537. and by Edward 6. made Duke of Somerset, and his Protector, who stiled himself (Edward by the Grace of God Duke of Somerset, Earl of Hartford, Viscount Beauchamp, Lord Seymour, Uncle to the Kings Highness of England, Governor of the Kings Person, Protector of all his Realms, Dominions and Subjects, Lieutenant high Treasurer, and Earl Marshal of England, Governor of the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey, and Knight of the most Honourable Order of the Garter, and bears Gules two Wings conjoined in Fess Or.) Yet all these Honours rather helped him forwards to hop Headless for Felony.

His third Son Edward was restored to the Earldom 1 Eliz. and this William his heir, and those near the Crown, in all Sovereignities, are needful to be narrowly look'd into for Marriage.

Queen Elizabeth did so, at a farther distance of danger, and her Father made it Treason in his time; I say, I should forbear farther mention, but that a Detractor begins at her Death in the Tower, (where she was imprisoned, though her Husband escaped,) and says, (That it set Mens Tongues and fears a work, that she went the same way) having almost in his last words before told the story of Overbury impoisoned in the Tower; by which he now inforces belief, (that her death was so done for the Kings interest) when in truth she died a Year before, in September 1615.

There happened occasion at the Common Pleas, to dispute the Kings power in Commendams, the Church being void and in his Gift, whether he might give a Commendam to a Bishop (either before or after his Consecration) during life or for years?

It was argued by Serjant Chibborn against the King,

That the translation of Bishops was against the Common Law: his Text was the Canons of the Council of Sardis.

That the King had no power to grant Commendams, but necessity.

That there would be no necessary, because no need of augmentation of Livings, no man being bound to be more hospitable than his means afforded.

And much more Arguments tending to overthrow the Kings Prerogative in cases of Commendams.

This case was to be farther argued in the Kings absence by all the Judges, which he thought to protract until they consulted with him; and so commanded his Attorney General to signify by letters his pleasure to all the Judges.

The Judges notwithstanding, at the day argue the case, and return Answer by Letter to the King, that they held those Letters to be contrary to Law, and such as they could not obey by Oath, and therefore had proceeded at the day appointed; setting down the case to be upon construction of two Acts of Parliament, 25 Edward 3. and of the 25 Henry 8. and now between Subjects for private interest and inheritance; that their Oath is, That in case any Letter come to them contrary to Law, they are not to obey them, but to proceed to Justice; and so they did the last Term, 27 April 1616. The Judges subsign, Cook, Herbert, Tanfield, Warburton, Snig, Alsham, Bromley, Crook, Winch, Dodderidge, Nicols and Houghton.

The King returns them Answer by Letter, Reporting himself to their own knowledge, his Princely care for Justice to be duly administered to his Subjects with all expedition, and how far he was from crossing or delaying the interests of private persons; but on the otherside, where the case concerned the high Powers and Prerogatives of his Crown, he would not indure to have them wounded through the sides of a private person; admonishing them of an ordinary custom lately entertained, boldly to dispute the high points of his Prerogative in a popular and unlawful way of Argument, not heretofore usual, making them sensible how weak and impertinent the pretence of their Oath was in a case of this nature; as if the founders of their Oath, his Predecessors, were so intent in their zeal, to be uncharitable, to make a weapon to wound their Successors; being an ordinary course to put off Hearings and Determinings amongst private persons, Termly, and commands them peremptorily not to proceed further in the Plea, till his return to London, there to receive his further pleasure by himself; your Oath being only for avoiding importunities to the Prince of Suiters in their own particular.

The King came to London, convenes them all to the Council Table, and himself takes in sum the parts of the Judges Letter, and their Errors in proceeding both in matter and manner: in matter, by way of Omission, as well as Commission.

When the Counsellor shall presume to argue his Supremacy at the Bar, and they not reprove his insolency; himself observing since his coming to this Crown, the popular sort of Lawyers, most affrontingly in all Parliaments, have troden upon his Prerogative, though neither Law nor Lawyer can be respected, if the King be not revered; and therefore it became the Judges to bridle their impudencies in their several ral Benches, especially the Courts of Common Law, who had inroached upon all other Courts; High Commission, Councils in Wales, and at York, and Courts of Requests.

For the Commission in matter, whereas their Letter excepted against his Majesties command to be against the Law, and their Oath; he tells them, deferring upon just and necessary cause is not denying or delaying of Justice, but rather wisdom and maturity; nothing more proper than to consult with the King where it concerns the Crown.

As for the manner, the Kings absence, before the Argument, and yet is resolved to return speedily; and the case though argued could not receive Judgment till Easter Term after, as the Judges confessed.

And for them to say, that the case was private between party and party; one of them is a Bishop, that pleads for the Commendam only by vertue of his Majesties Prerogative; and that they could not prove any Solicitations of either Parties for expedition.

And for the form of the Letter, it was undecent; besides to proceed and to return a bare certificate without giving reasons.

Upon this all the Judges fell down upon their Knees, acknowledging their Error, and craving Pardon.

But for the matter, the Chief Justice Cook entered into a defence, that the stay of his Majesty was a delay of Justice, and therefore against Law and their Oath; that as they meant to handle the Pleading, it should not concern the Kings Prerogative.

To which the King told him, That for them to discern the concernment of his Prerogative, without consulting with him, was preposterous; and for those of Law and Oath, he had said sufficient before; therefore he required the Lord Chancellors opinion therein, whether against Law and their Oath.

The Chancellor excused himself as to that of Law, referring it to the opinion of the Kings Council, whereupon the Attorney General Bacon said, That to put off the day was no delay of Justice, nor endangered their Oath; for the Kings reasons were only that it concerned his Prerogative, and required therefore a stay for a small time, and advised the Judges, whether this refusal of theirs did not rather endanger their Oath, which was to counsel the King when they are called; but to counsel after the matter is past, was a simple refusal to give him Counsel at all, and all the rest of the Council concluded with him.

The Chief Justice Cook excepted, that the Kings Council should plead against the Judges, being their duties to plead before them, not against them.

Whereunto the Attorney replied, That the Kings Council were by Oath and Office not only to plead, proceed, and declare against the greatest Subject, but also against any Body of Subjects or Persons; nay, were the Judges, or Courts, or House of Commons in Parliament, and concluded that the Judges challenge was a wrong to their Places, and appealed to the King who was firm for them.

The Chief Justice replied, He would not dispute with His Majesty; the King replied, Nor with my Council: so then whether you do well or ill, it may not be disputed.

The Chancellor gave his opinion with the King, and his Council.

Hereupon the positive Question was put by all the Lords, Whether in a case depending, which the King might conceive himself concerned in Power or Profit, and requiring to consult with them, they ought not to stay proceedings? Fac. 14.

All the Judges submitted thereto, only the Chief Justice excepted, saying, When this case should be, then he would do his duty.

But the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas said, For his part he would always trust the Justice of the Kings Command.

But the day drawing nigh, the next Saturday, for Arguing the Commendams, the King desired the Judges to express, Whether they would then Argue upon the Kings general Power of granting Commendams, yea or no?

They all concluded not to draw into doubt his Power, but to insist upon the point of Lapse, which they conceived to be of a form different from former Commendams; and concluded to correct the insolencies of bold arguing the Prerogative.

Judge Doderidge concluded for the King, That the Church was void, and in his Gift, and he might give a Commendam to a Bishop, either before or after Consecration, during life or years.

The Judges being gone, the Privy Council resolved, That the Kings desire was not against the Judges Oath, nor against the Common Law to require; and all of them subscribed to the same.

This Dispute was publickly scanned, and censured in favour of the Judges, and on the contrary for the King; but the truth I have really extracted out of the Records of the Council Table, that you may thereby see the true scope of those times.

The State of Spain having little to do in Martial affairs, King Philip the third, now in Peace, thought to spend some time in Treaties, wherein he seldom failed of advantage. The late French King, Henry the fourth, had three Daughters, the one Married to the Duke of Savoy, which the Spaniards misliking to have those Neighbours lately so great Enemies, now to be link'd in love without his interest, conceived it good policy to indear the young King Lewis of France to a cross Match, to his Daughter Infanta Anna, and to Marry his Son Philip to the Princess Elizabeth, the second Daughter of Henry the fourth.

And thus those cross Nuptials might seem to cement the affections of the three States, lately so imbroiled in War, which no doubt either of them had good cause to accept; though it was said S. P. Q. R. Spain, Pope, Queen-Regent, had the chief hand to undo the young King.

For the Father Henry the Fourth had made Wars upon the Duke of Savoy, to recover the Marquisate of Saluses; and this King of Spain under colour to aid the Duke (his Brother-in-Law) sent him Horse and Foot of Spaniards; but the Peace concluded, by exchange of Saluses with the Countries of Bresse and Gex. The Spanish Auxiliaries being muzzled in warm Quarters, at Carboniers, Montemellion, Savillan and Pignorel, (the best places of Savoy and Piedmont) would not budge; no, though the Duke begg'd of them to be gone; but were absolutely commanded the contrary by Count Fuentes, Vice-Roy of Milan, and so staid until that Valiant Duke, in his danger very desperate, cut all their Throats. Spain, in policy to revenge, pieces with the French, to disjoyn Savoy, upon whom he had afterward many treacherous Designs; as that Plot

Spain and France match with Savoy.

Queen Regent.

Plot upon his Castle Nice (the Key of his Countries) when his Spanish Gallies lay at Villa Franca, to have seized all Savoy's Issue.

1616. And as it was usual with Princes in Peace and Amity to congratulate Nuptials, the Lord Hays was looked upon as the most proper for this Errand into France; in some measure he had the Kings Favour, his Affection not at all; for wise Kings know how to do the one, and yet hide the other; so Mystical things are Courts: This makes many men misjudge, That the Kings Friendship made everyone Favourite; and by often changing their Persons, was therefore held inconstant in his Passions.

This Lord, born a Gentleman in Scotland, by his bearing Coat-Arms, Argent three Escalloons Gules; Supported by two Country-Swains, Armed Plough-Tailes, the Crest a Dove volant proper; His Story was, That his Ancestors at Plough, with those Instruments their Geer, slew Malton, an High-Land Rebel, and discomfited his Train, for which Service they had so much Land (Barren Rocks) as a Pigeon, cast off the fist, flew over till she rested; and all this great Purchase would not keep him from seeking Livelihood in France, where he was bred no other than a Gens d'Arms to Henry the Fourth; but quitted that Service, in hopes of better preferment of his own Sovereign.

And over he comes to meet the King at his Entrance into England, upon recommendation of the French Liger in Scotland, who continued so here, and presented Hays upon former knowledge in France; this, and his other good parts (being well accomplished) hastened him higher in esteem than others of his Countrey, whose nearer attendance had merited more.

But to boot, he sought out a good Heir (the Lady Dorothy) sole Daughter to the Lord Denny, and to fit him forward, after Knighthood, he had honour, and was made a Lord; for reasonable Riches his Wife brought with her.

In grateful acknowledgment of his first Preferment, he Feasted the former Ambassador (being lately returned Extraordinary to this King) wherein he exceeded the Limits of an Entertainment, which for that time was excused, as a grateful Ceremony of a large Dinner.

The Scots were never very eminent with Neighbour Nations; what Credit they had, came by the French, to keep ballance with them and England; the increase might heretofore be hoped for, when the Union of these Crowns should afford the means to set them forth; and it was prudential in the King, to pick out one of his own, to give a Splendor to that Nation in our way of Peace and Courtship; especially, when all was done at the Masters cost; for Hays was ever reasonable poor, unless by repute of his first Match, which was not much while her Father lived; and by this, last he had less: the great Spirit of Piercy Earl of Northumberland, though a Prisoner then in the Tower, disdaining the Marriage, denied her a Groat to Beggarly Scot, as he called him.

This first Embassie was for no other end than to congratulate; for certainly he had no Commission nor Credential to make Scrutiny for Matching our Prince with the other Sister, she being then too young. Overtures were then thought on with Spain; and so it was advertised from Sir Dudley Charlton, Ambassador at the Hague, that there was a Fame spread of such as desire to weaken the Kings Correspondence with that State, That his Majesty was on near Terms of Matching our Prince with Spain; and by an Adviso out of Spain, That this Match had been there debated in the Inquisition, and judged necessary.

And in truth the Lord Roffe was sent Ambassador thither (partly for that purpose) at this time also, upon the like Errand, to give Joy to that King, for the Counter-Match of his Son, and had his Instructions to feel the Pulse of that Court concerning the same; and both these Ambassadors sent away at the same time. It was remarkable how each of them strove for the Prize, to out-vie in the Vanity of these Voyages: the Baron to his utter undoing, having no other Helps but his own, when the other had it from the Kings Purse; and in truth for this purpose to put down the English; as in that great Feast at Essex-House, and many his Masquerades afterwards at Court; for he meddled not with the Tilt, as being no Sword-man; but in the other, and such like, he never scaped to act his part.

Amongst many others that accompanied Haies in this Expedition, was Sir Henry Rich, Knight of the Bath, and Baron Kensington, afterwards Earl of Holland, Natural Son to the then Earl of Warwick; he took his initiation of Expence from this Journey, & continued the practice afterwards to the weakning of his (long time) unsettled Fortunes, being forced through Custom of the Court, to follow the other in all his Fashions; and which infection, by after-custom, became his Disease also, and almost (not over-mastering, yet) over-shadowing his Natural Eminent Parts, with which his Inside was habited, and perspicuous to such as afterwards knew him.

If we deduce him from his Cradle, we shall find him, as it were, begotten to an Inheritance of true Nobleness and Courtly Grace, in more real Splendor than others, that seemed to appear compatible with him, they being only made so by hand.

His Life indeed was intricate, sometime struggling with the by-paths of Sovereign Favour, and afterwards of State-Affairs, which at last (and at worst) infected him with the Disease of the Times, more malignant in his Counsellors, and other his Confidants, than in his own Conscience, or inclination, and so drew him on by various disguises of Subtilty, with the composition of his good Nature, till the Remain of his Life was involved into Engagements unstable; the Effects whereof smothered him in the uncouth Deluge of Destruction.

The Sword being sheathed up in Scabbard, Peace and Plenty brought the Law into Esteem, the only over-ruling power to set men (even) by the ears, and make them the more quiet ever after.

But then Cases increased so common, that Conscience was troubled to reconcile them, and made a Quarrel of Justice it self, between Sir Edward Cooke Chief Justice of Law, and the Lord Elsmore, Keeper of the Conscience, who had the better of the Cause, to the others Ruine.

The Case was thus:

Sundry Citizens got Judgment in the Court of Common Pleas by a Jugling Trick, that staved off an opposite Witness; the Plaintiff nevertheless exhibits his Bill in Chancery against the Defendants, who sit out Process in contempt, and refusing to answer, are committed to the Fleet, and for their Relief, exhibit their Bill in Star-Chamber against the Lord Chancellor Elsmore, Grounded upon the Statute of 4 Hen. 4. Cap. 23. That the Judgment given in the Kings Court shall not be examined in Chancery, Parliament, or elsewhere, until it be undone by Attaint or Error; and so thereby he had incurred Præmunire; and the Chief Justice Cooke interposed, and encouraged the Complainants.

The Chancellor acquaints the King, who sends to Bacon Attorney General, Sir Henry Montague, and Sir Randal Crewe, Serjeants at Law, and Sir Henry Felverton, Solicitor; These men Report back, That there hath been a strong Current of Practice and Proceedings in Chancery after Judgment at Common Law, and many times after Execution, continued since Henry the Seventh's time to this Day, in Cases where there is no other Remedy at Common Law, unto which the Judges are peremptorily sworn.

Court and Cares of
K. James.

And with this Sentence on Elsmore's Side, the aged Statesman leaves the Seat of Deciding, and sets down himself to his Devotions, leaving the Seal to be born by Bacon; but the manner of the Dispose is mistold by the Pamphlet (who makes it the Chancellor's Heart-Break to be rid of the Charge) when in truth the Term come, and Elsmore sick, the King sent for the Seal by Secretary Winwood, with a Gracious Message, That himself would be his Deputy, and not dispose it whilst Elsmore lived to bear the Title of Chancellor; nor did any one receive it out of the Kings sight till he was dead, nor long after.

And because we may be assured of the King's Gracious Favour to that Grave Chancellor, see what he says to him in two Letters following, writ every Word with the Kings own Hand.

My Lord,

These shall first congratulate and thank God with you, for your Recovery and growing to Health again; for which I protest to God, I prayed every Morning and Eve, since you was at the worst, as often as I prayed for my self: And next, you shall be hereby informed how sensible I am of that Disgrace offered to that Court of mine wherein you sit, especially at a time so unseasonable; it cannot but be a Comfort to you to know, how every man censured the Partiality and Barbarity of that Action: and for my part, you may assure your self, it shall only be in your default of not informing me, if I do not upon this occasion free my self from the infection of any such inconveniences hereafter; I mean, of such Jarring betwixt my Courts of Justice; for I will wholly rely upon your Information and Advice, what course to take in the handling of this Business; assuring my self, that your Conscience and Care for my Honour and Service, will set me in a Course for making such an Example in this Case, as may settle good Government in like Cases hereafter; and so I bid you heartily Farewel.

JAMES REX.

Thus the King writes then; and continued unto this Grave Statesman such Gracious Favours and Esteems to the last of his Days; for a Twelvemonth after this Letter, and not long before his Death he writes again.

Fac. 14.

To the Right Trusty and Right well Beloved, Our Chancellor of England.

My Lord,

The Letter I wrote the last year from the same Town unto you, proved so good a Cordial for your Health, as I am thereby encouraged to do the like at this time; and as I both hope and pray for with the like success: I cannot but be extremely sorry for your want of Health, but I confess I am more sorry for the evil conceit you have of your own strength, which makes me the more to presume upon the good Operation of this Physick of mine, since I am sure it cannot work more upon your mind than any other worldly thing. The Greatness of your Place, and the Ability which God hath given you to discharge it, to the Honour of God, and the great Benefit of the Commonwealth, it is a cause sufficient to stir you up to be careful of your own Health, and even to fight against Diseases as far as you can; but when you shall remember how ill I may want you, and what miss your Master shall have of you, I hope the Reason will be predominant to make you not strive with, but conquer your Disease, not for your own sake, but for his, of whom you may promise your self as much Love and hearty Affection, as might be expected from so thankful and kind a Master, to so honest and worthily deserving a Servant: And so praying God to bless this my Cure, I bid you heartily Farewel.

JAMES REX.

Hereupon, there was some appearance of his amendment, which the Prince congratulates under his own Hand.

My Lord Chancellor,

As I was very sorry, having understood of your Danger and Sickness, so I do much rejoice at the good appearance of your Recovery, which Thomas Murrey hath declared to me, and of the Affection and Care you have of my Person and of my Estate; for which you and yours shall ever find me most willing to give Testimony to the World, how much I respect those who are truly affected towards me; I hope by Gods Grace to give you particular by my self, and that God shall give you health and strength of Body and Mind, that the King, Queen, and I, with this whole Kingdom, may long enjoy the Fruit of your long, wise and religious Experience; which wishing from my heart, I end.

New-Market,

Febr. 18. 1616.

Yours,

CHARLES Pr.

These

These being the last Letters, and thus assured of the acknowledgment of his Masters Favour toward his Merit, he takes leave of this Life the fifteenth of March following, 14 Jac. 1616.

The Common Pleas, or Communia Placita, is the Kings Court; Bancus Communis, Anno 2. Edw. 3. cap. 11. so called, Quia Communia Placita inter Suos, or Controversies between common persons; it was now held in Westminster-Hall; but in ancient times moveable; as appears by Magna Charta, cap 11. and that upon grant of that Charter, the Court of Common Pleas was erected and settled, and at one place certain, viz. at Westminster, wheresoever the King lay; and that after that time all the Writs ran, Quod sit coram Justiciariis meis apud Westmonasterium.

Whereas before, the party was commanded by them to appear, coram me, vel Justiciariis meis, simply, without addition of Place: See Glanville and Bracton; the one writing in Henry the Seconds time, before this Court was erected; the other in Henry the Thirds time, who erected this Court. All Civil Causes, Real and Personal, are determinable (or were in former times) in this Court according to the strict Law of this Realm; and by Fortescue, cap. 50. it seemeth to have been the only Court for Real Causes. The Chief Judge thereof is called Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, accompanied with three or four Assistants or Associates, who are Created by Letters Patents from the King, and are installed (as it were) upon the Bench by the Chancellor, and Lord Chief Justice of that Court. See Fortescue, cap. 51. who sets down all the Circumstances of their Admission; the rest of the Officers are these; the Custos Brevium, three Proto-Notaries, or principal Notaries, called also Pregnotaries, Chirographer, Filazers, in number fourteen; Exigencers four, Clerk of the Warrants, Clerk of the Juries, or Jurate Writs, Clerk of the Treasury, Clerk of the Kings Silver, Clerk of the Essoin, Clerk of the Outlaws.

Of the Outlaws.
Common Law what

The Common Law is so Ancient, we know not the Commencement: Lex Anglia, peculiar only (so some say) to this Land, of long time following the Conquest, evermore quarrelling for enjoyment of ancient Liberties, until Henry the Third allowed English men English Laws; and in his Ninth year granted the great Charter; which himself infringed, and thereupon followed forty years Barons Wars, (as History styles them) until in his fifty second year, that Charter was again reviewed and compiled, and solemnly sworn unto by succeeding Sovereigns.

The Ground of which binds the King per legem terra; and what is this Lex terra? Leges Anglicanae fuerunt approbata consensu utentium, & Sacramento Regum confirmata. And Communis consuetudo Regni fuit Lex Terra.

But in practice (say some) the Chancery is above this Law, and yet duly examined, that also is allowed per Legem Terra.

The Reason thus;

The Common Law grounded upon General Maxims, they might be too severe, or too lax; and therefore necessarily requiring Equity, secundum & bonum, & sanam Conscientiam dirigenda.

And this Chancery notwithstanding limited by Law, and erected by Law, although it seems above Law.

For no Judge hath Jurisdiction without some Grant or Commission out of that Court under Fac. 14. the Great Seal, which is intrusted to the Chancellor.

No Judge can hold Plea without Original Writ framed in Chancery, and by his appointment returnable before the Judges, and yet all these considered, the King, the Law, the Chancery agree together.

The Chancery must needs be erected subsequent to the Common Law, to relieve and supply the Law in some Cases, where the simple Subject was cozened by Craft, Ignorance, or also may offend without Malice.

Moses, in his Law, in divers Cases Political and Ceremonial, he could not decide (uncleanliness by touching the dead) but referred it to God.

The Name of this Officer is, Dominus Cancellarius Anglia, a Chancellor, as some would have the Etymon: do but query what he might Cancel? Some say it is, Cancellare iniquam Legem communem; Judicare secundum Conscientiam; but this is an Errour; Will the Law give power to deface her self that made it?

The Chancellor cannot stay the Course of Law, but only enjoin the person not to follow the Law; nor to cancel the Law; for notwithstanding this Injunction, if the party will sit out of contempt, and proceed at Common Law, the Judges cannot deny him.

Indeed this Officer hath his Name of Cancelling the Kings Letters Patents, so much of Honour to the Law, as the other way hath been Dishonourable.

The Natures of Letters Patents bind the King and his Successors, and all Subjects, though unfit or unjust; the Judges of Law are to judge them void, but cannot deface them nor the Seal; but the Chancellor, as a Judge of Law, may; (but not by his absolute Authority) by his ordinary power and course of Common Law, he is to Judge of them, and to hold Plea of them, and to call the Party interested by Process of Law, and so to repeal them by Judgment, and then cancel them; which no person can do but himself.

And this was done, transversa linea circumducere vel conscindere aliquod Edictum, Decretum contra Principem, aut jus Reipublice impetratum; which Cancelling is made with Lines drawn across like Lattices; and it is said that Judgment-Seats were of old compassed with Lattices, or Bars cross ways, Cancells to defend the Judges and Officers from the press of People, and yet not to hinder their view. Chancels were so divided from the Body of the Churches, and thereupon so called.

And the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Keeper have one Power, by Stat. Anno 5. Eliz.

So then you see how, and for what he hath his Name.

And though his Authority be highest, yet it is given to him by the Law, and proceedeth in course of Law, not according to Conscience only, but Law.

That as all Justice runs from the Supream Power, so by the Chancellor to all other Jurisdictions.

A man complains of Wrong, or sues for Right in Chancery, from which Bill of Complaint issues a Precept commanding the Defendant to appear at a day; so then a man may not be sued before he have a Writ or Breve from the Chancellor, a singular regard to the meanest.

The

The very Writs of the Chancery are prescribed Anno by Law, and a Form Registered in Chancery, and 1616. a Form Registered in Chancery, and if not accordingly issued out, the Judges will reject them; Called in Law, Avoiding of the Writ.

His Authority to Judge, is of two sorts.

1. By Common Law, or Positive Law, Potentia ordinata, by Process, Pleading, Judgment, &c.

2. By Potentia absoluta, by Process according to the Law of Nature, viz. to send for the Party, to answer upon Oath, to examine; if he will not answer, yet the Chancellor cannot condemn him in the Cause for obstinacy.

In Potentia ordinata, Mispleading on either part may marr the Matter; and the Judgment must be according to Law, however the Equity of the Case fall out.

But if the Pleading be by Absolute Power, though the Party Misplead, if the Matter be good, the Judgment must be by Equity, and not as the Pleading; but either formally good or bad, or as the Law will in the Case.

The Question follows, Whether that Conscience whereby he is Chancellor, be to be Simplex Conscientia, or Regulata? viz. to be ordered by course of Court, and former Precedents; or, if no Precedents, whether Reason in codem respectu, may take cognizance of the Cause? viz.

A rich Father to suffer an honest Son to beg; or a rich Son contrario; the Chancellor cannot herein meddle.

Hereupon, we may conclude that his Authority Judicial, both ordinata, and absoluta Potestas, are limited by the Law of the Land.

For in the ordinary he is tied to the strict Rule of Law; and by the absolute; he is ruled (though not by the course of Law) yet he is to deal per regulatam Conscientiam; but in any Case, not to contradict what Law hath allowed.

But to conclude, his absoluta Potestas, by what means he should find out Truth, truly it is without limitation, only to be referred to his own Gifts, and the Grace of God that gives Wisdom.

Sir Francis Bacon succeeded Elsmore Lord Chancellor; though a wonder to some (so mean a man to so much preferment): he was then Attorney General; and as others by that place, and in the usual way of Preferment (time beyond memory) come to high Office of Judicature, either there, or to other Benches, so did he; but his misdeeds afterwards turned him out of all, and he died poor and private; see An. 1621.

And as his Genesis of Preferment came to the Chair of State, so the Exodus of Treasurer Suffolk in his Office, brought him to the Star-Chamber, and the Glory of the New Chancellor, Chairman there, to sit in censure upon him; and so, to set out himself in his Matchless Eloquence, which he did then by Sentence, as the Mouth of the Court, as all others had done; their Abilities affording them several ways and manners in that Court more particular, as their Qualities concern them to distinguish.

So here also the Chief Justice Cooke newly revived from the sad condition of his former Disgrace for his too narrow Inquisition into the Faults and Fall of Somerfet; he now finding the Fate of Court-policy final in this Lord, and his Tongue at liberty to speak what he lists, parallels this Lords Crimes with other such corrupt Treasurers, taking Precedents of all former Predecessors.

Even from Randolphus de Briton, who was Sentenced to lose all Lands and Goods; but they were restored to him, and he Fined 3000 l. for misusing K. H. 3. Treasure. Fac. 14.

Such another was Treasurer of Ireland, Petrus de Rivallos, and of great Command, also High Chamberlain of England to Edw. 1. His Offences were, Bribes of all men, poor and rich, Religiosis quam de Laicis: Fined and Ransomed.

The like did the Abbot and Monks at Westminster, took out of that Kings Treasury there, ad inestimabile damnum Regis & Regni; for which these privileged Pretenders could not be exempt from Trial, and the Temporalities of the Abbey seized for Satisfaction; till which time of Payment they suffered Imprisonment.

Nay Walter de Langton Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield escapes not, Edw. 3. This Treasurer took Bribes then, though small; but a hundred pound of the Earl of Montalto, ut amicus in agendis negotiis versus Dominum Regem; let him escape Prison to do his business, and what was given was of free will, and ex Curialitate sua; yet in those days it amounted to Extortion.

But he had Additionals, having indicted John de Engam of Trespass, for the Mannor of Fieby, to which the King had Title, and imprisoned him; and when another Mannor was conveyed to the Bishop for Courtesies done per diversas Curialitates, Engam was set at liberty; but it seems the Bishops Plea would not serve his turn, That the King would rather punish by Imprisonment than Fine.

And those good Times accounted it Bribery.

Again, The Bailiff of Oxford was committed for Arrears of one Hundred pound in his Account, and the Mannor of Caloot conveyed to the Bishop for satisfaction; yet because he was of pure Devotion discharged by the Bishop, these Cases all three were condemned of Extortion and Bribery, and the Bishop soundly paid for it, by his Purse and Imprisonment.

In Ed. 3. He imprisoned William Lord Latimer, with Punishment and Fine; being in Commission to pay off the Kings Debts, he compounded for eight per Cent. and 30. for 40. By which, says the Record, he turned it upon the King to be a Bankrupt Compounder.

So the Baron Nevil bought the Kings debts of the Army, and though he pleaded that they forgave him the remainder freely, yet was he Fined.

Such like Examples as these were brought to raise the Offence of this Lord Treasurer, of himself as of high Birth, so most Noble, and without doubt disdaining to commit base Crimes; but whether the Guilt of Sir John Dingly, one of the Tellers in the Exchequer, an intimate Servant to the Secresies of Suffolkes Countess, or some necessity to make bold to borrow such Sums as his Fabrick at Awdley-End had need of, or the vain and monstrous Expence heretofore of that Family, all that could be (besides the Necessity of Court-Fate) cast in his Dish, was the imbezling the Monies lately paid by the States of the Netherlands, for the Redemption of the Cautionary Towns Flushing and Brill, and he Fined thirty thousand Pounds, and Dingly two thousand Pounds, the man deserving to pay for all, it being of his Designing.

But the Treasury was from thenceforth for some time trusted to Commissioners.

At Midsummer after the King comes to the Star-Chamber, then intending to settle his home affairs for his resolved Journey into Scotland, which began the next Spring; and therefore now the more

Anno 1616. to exalt the Seat of Justice, of which this Court was most eminent, he discharges his duty to God and his People in a most excellent discourse, the Character of his inward inclination to Justice and Piety.

His Majesties Speech at his first coming to the Star-Chamber.

HE begins with Scripture, 'Give thy Judgment to the King, O God, and thy righteousness to the Kings Son; the literal sense, upon the Prophet David and his Son Solomon, Godly and Wise; the mystical sense, upon God and Christ his eternal Son; Just and Righteous; from which imitation all Governments, especially Monarchies, have been established. Kings are properly Judges, and sit in the Throne of God, and thence all Judgment is derived from the King to his Magistrates; not to them Privative, but Cumulative. So the Counsel of Jethro to Moses, the Judges were deputed for easier questions, the more profound left to Moses; so all Christian Kings govern, whereby appears the near conjunction, God and the King upwards, the King and his Judges downward; the King to settle the Law of God, and his Judges to interpret the Law of the King.

Thus a fore principium, he comes to his Exordium.

1. Why he came not speak here in fourteen Years, as his Predecessors have done often, especially Henry 7. from whom the King is descended doubly to this Crown, and so desires to follow him in his best actions.

2. Why he comes now?

For the first, Though he had been an old King, when he came hither, and well practised to Government, from twelve years of age, yet here he resolved with Pythagoras to keep silence for seven years: that apprenticeship ended, the impediment was the choice of some worthy cause, betwixt King and some Subject, or Subject and Subject: the one might seem partial as for himself; the other oblique, in favour of a party.

But twice seven Years his whole Reign here brings him only to speak now publicly, concerning the Reformation of Judicature in Westminster-Hall; which heretofore he had in part delivered on private occasions.

Dividing his Charge.

1. To Himself.

2. To the Judges.

3. To the Auditory.

First, He protests that as Confirmation follows Baptism, so now he renews his Oaths of Coronation, in Justice and Law; the Common Law of the Land he never pressed to alter, but (as in the union of his Person) so he indeavoured it really, to conform Scotland to England; not this to that, anent the Prophecy of his Grandfather, Henry 7. That the lesser Kingdom by Marriage would follow the greater, not the greater the less; and therefore Married his eldest Daughter Margaret to James the fourth, the Kings great Grandfather, and so blames that aice opinion, that the union of Great Britain would alter our Laws, which he ever declined, as a maxim in matters of State and Policy, innovation and alteration makes it worse; that he was sworn to these laws; and to alter them, had been perjury to him; Justice may be moderated by him, with mercy, but in matters of Justice he will be blind to partiality, to hasten Justice, never to delay.

He distinguishes the Law, the inheritance of King and Subject, to be determined by the common Law; set down by our fore-fathers and expounded by Learned Men in their Comments, and called Responsa Prudentum, or by Statute Law, and this is Law of Inheritance.

The other Law, Gods Law, governs all, Common and Municipal as dependents; and he complains of the neglect of Divine Laws, and disrespect to the Ministers of the Church, which is the most pure, and nearest the Primitive and Apostolical Church in Doctrine and Discipline of any in Christendom.

Next to this is the Civil Law, (the Law of Nations) it satisfies strangers, and his own Subjects in matters of Piracy, Marriage, Wills; which Law he divides, Civil and Canon, and complains of the contempt upon it; and concludes his own Charge, as to maintain, so to purge it from two corruptions, Incertainty and Novelty, to clear it to the people by advice of Judges, and to purge it of Niceties introduced by Judges themselves; and so as the Pastor takes the Sacrament himself, and then distributes; so he to them, least it be said, Turpe est doctori, cum culpa redarguit ipsum.

The Charge to the Judges consists of three parts, to do Justice, Generally, Indifferently, Fearfully; Generally, uprightly as to answer God and the King; and punishment from either; Indifferently, to all parties, King and Subject, Subject and Subject, without delay, partiality, clean and uncorrupt; Fearfully, not your own conceits, for you are no Law-makers, but Interpreters; Jus dicere, not Jus dare; for you have no Voice in Parliament, but to advise; and though some Laws are obscure and may be better known to you by Books and Presidents, yet their interpretations must be Subject to common Sense and Reason: Ratio est anima Legis, clear Law or solid Reason.

But where the formality hath no place, as in Denmark; the State is governed by written Law; no Advocate or Proctor, only the Parties plead, and Law is read, and so Sentence. They complain of our curious Wits, various Concepts, different Actions, and several Examples, which breed questions in Law; but if plain, it speaks it self, if otherwise (as inventions abound) they are to interpret and draw a good minor of natural Reason, out of a major of direct Law; and so will follow a true conclusion. Though common Law be a Mystery, and your interpretation be not understood, yet by reason of want of Logick and common Sense, it will be false: and as they are Judges and divided into Benches, so they must confer, debate, not single opinions, per emendata Suffragia; and thus in general to their Office.

As to their limits.

First, Not to inroach upon Prerogatives of the Crown; deal not in difficult questions ere you consult with the King and Council; otherwise it is to wound the King thorough the sides of private persons; and herein commends some of the Judges that of late rebuked and blunted the sharp edge, and vain popular humor of some pleaders at the bar for meddling therein. The mystery of the Kings power is not lawful to be disputed,

Anno 1614. disputed, which seems to wade into the weakness of Sovereigns, diminishes the mystical reverence of them that sit in the Throne of God.

Secondly, One Judicature not to invade upon others, as unfit and unlawful; and herein he enlarges himself, that besides Common Law there are Courts of Requests, Admiralty, President and Council of Wales, of the North, High Commission, and every Bishops Court, these shall keep their limits and bounds; so the Common Law shall not encroach upon them, nor they on that.

In Westminster-Hall, four Courts; two Civil, Common-Pleas, and Exchequer; two Criminal, Kings-Bench, and Star-Chamber: the Common-Pleas, is a branch of the Kings-Bench, being first in one Court, and after the Common-Pleas being extracted, it was so called, as Pleas of private Men; the other, the Exchequer for the Kings revenue, the principal institution thereof, and their chief study, and as other things come orderly thither, so to administer Justice.

Keep you within compass, give me my Right of private Prerogative, I shall acquiesce. As for the Prerogative of the Crown, it is not for a Lawyers Tongue, nor lawful to be disputed. It is Atheism to dispute what God can do, his revealed will ought to content us; so it is contempt in a Subject to dispute what a King can, or cannot do: the Law is his revealed will.

The Kings-Bench is the principal Court for Criminal Causes, and in some respects it deals with Civil Causes.

The Chancery a Court of Equity, and deals likewise in Civil; the dispenser of the Kings Conscience, following the intention of Law and Justice, not altering Law, nor converso; it exceeds all Courts, mixing Mercy with Justice: other Courts are only for Law, and where the strictness of Law might undo a Subject, there the Chancery tempers it with Equity, and preserves Men from destruction.

The Chancery, is independent of any other Court, only under the King, teste me ipso, from which no appeal; yet am I bound so to maintain others, as this, not to suffer wrong.

My Chancellor that now is, I found him Keeper of the Seal, the same in substance with the other stile: he is witness, my Warrant was to him to go on according to Precedents in time of the best Kings, and most Learned Chancellors.

The duty of Judges is to punish such as deprave Kings Courts, and therefore it was an inept Speech in Westminster-Hall, to say, that a premunire lay against the Court of Chancery; yet it should not be boundless, the King is to correct it and none else, and therefore the King was abused in that attempt, and now commands none presume to sue a premunire against it.

As all inundations are conceived prodigious by Astrologers, so overflowings of the banks of Jurisdiction is inconvenient and prodigious to the State; let there be a concordance and Musical accord amongst you, keep to your Presidents and Authenick, not controverted but approved by common usage of best Kings and most Learned Judges.

The Star-Chamber Court hath been shaken of late, and last Year had received a blow, if not prevented by a few Voices. He descants on the name Star, a glorious Creature, next in place to the Angels, the Court glorious in substance, compounded of four sorts of persons; the first Fac. 14 two, Privy Counsellors and Judges, Wisdom of State, Learning in Law; the other two sorts, Peers and Bishops, to give Greatness and Honour to the Court; the other of Learning in Divinity, and the interest of the good Government of the Church; so Divine and Humane Laws, Experience and Practise in Government are conjoined in the proceedings of this Court.

The Kingdom without a Court of Equity, either by it self, as in England, or mixed in their Office that are Judges of the Law, as in Scotland; and here in England, where the Law determines not clearly, there the Chancery does, having equity, which belongs to no other Court, punishing Attempts, other Courts only facts: and where the Law punishes facts lightly, as in Riots or Combates, the Star-Chamber punishes in a higher degree, as in Combinations, Practises, Conspiracies; so being instituted for good, gives it the more honour.

Keep your Courts in harmony, Judges are Brethren, the Courts Sisters; the Muses to differ, breeds contempt to either, and disputes against each other, turns Pleas from Court to Court in circular motion, Ixions wheel; the reason of Multitudes of prohibitions, causes are scourged from Court to Court, like Tantalus fruit, near the Suiters lip, never to his taste; a delay of Justice makes Causes endless.

He tells them how he hath laboured to gather Articles, an Index expurgatorius of novelties crept into the Law; look to Plowden's Cases, and the old Responsa Prudentum; if you find it not there, then (ab initio non fuit sic); away with it.

To the Auditory he hath but little to say: as he hath confirmed his resolution to maintain his Oath, the Law and Justice of the Land; so he expects their duty in observances of the Law, and divides their submission into three parts. First, In general to give due reverence to the Law: this general he divides also into three.

Not to sue but upon just Cause.

Be content with Judgment to acquiesce as he will do, equal with the meanest Subject.

Do not complain and importune the King against Judgment; it is better to maintain an unjust Decree, than to question every Judgment after Sentence. As you come gaping for Justice, be satisfied with the Judgment; but in Bribes complain boldly; if not true from you, expect lex talionis; to accuse an upright Judge deserves double punishment.

Secondly, In your Pleas presume not against the Kings Prerogative or Honour; if you do, the Judges will punish you; if they do not, I will them and you. Plead not new Puritanical strains, to make all things popular; keep the ancient limits of Pleas.

Thirdly, Change not your Courts, as if to mistrust the Justness of your Cause, but submit where you begin. So he sums up all, the charge to himself, Judges, and Auditory; his excuse; why he came not till now? Why now?

And because of his custom to deliver a Charge to the Judges of Circuits; he tells them now also as they are Judges with him in that Court; so Judges under him, and his Substitutes in Circuits Itinerant to his people; a laudable custom to go to the people in their Counties, as they come up to them at Westminster-Hall; that you go to punish as well as to prevent offences;

Anno 1616. fences; charge the Justices of Peace their duties; take an accompt of them, and report their Services to the King; for the King hath two Offices; 1. To Direct, 2. To take an Accompt from them to this Chancellor in writing, and so to him.

Of these two parts, the nisi prius is proper to them, and the other necessary for him; therefore as Christ said, hoc agite, yet & illud non omittite; and commends the Office of Justice of Peace of high honour and repute.

They are of two sorts, good and bad, the good he will reward and prefer, being as capable of his favour as any about him whomsoever; the farther off in distance of place, the more deferred, and his providence must reach to the end of his limits; the good are industrious, the bad idle, contemplative Justices are of no use; and for the number, as many hands made light work, so too many make slight work.

As to the Charge, he will repeat what he hath said heretofore, Lectio lecta placet, decies repetita placebit; anent Recusants and Papists, my grief when they increase; there are three sorts of Recusants.

The first, such as will not be themselves, but their Wives and Families shall be; and they shall appear at Church sometimes, enforced by Law, or for fashion; these are formal to the Law and false to God.

The second sort are Recusants whose Consciences are misled, and therefore refuse the Church, otherwise peaceable Subjects.

The third are practising recusants, they will force all persons under their Law, and infect others to be as they are Recusants; these are men of pride and presumption.

His opinion can bear with the person of a Papist so born and bred; but an Apostate Papist he hates, such deserve severe punishment.

He is loth to hang a Priest for Religion, and saying Mass; but if he refuse the Oath of Allegiance which is meerly Civil, he leaves them to the Law, against whom it is no persecution, but Justice; and the like against those Priests that return from banishment; such also as break prison, they can be no Martyrs that refuse to suffer for their Conscience; Saint Paul would not go forth when the doors were opened, and Saint Peter came not out till led by the Angel of God.

Then he concludes with the ordinary charge against the numbers of Ale-houses, too frequent buildings in and about London; and also the extreme resort of the Gentry to the City, bids them countenance the Religious Clergy against all Papists and Puritans, and God and the King will reward their service.

Affairs of Scotland. Let us remind Scotland. It was eight years since the Marquess of Huntley had been excommunicate, upon hopes from time to time of his conformity and reconciliation; but increasing insolencies were lately committed, and as soon enlarged by the Chancellor, underhand favouring too much the Papists; the Church complains hereof to the King, the Marquess posts to England, to palliate his displeasure; but a Messenger meets him at Huntington, with command to return him home to Justice; yet here he staid until he receives new Authority to appear at Court, where he humbly submits and offers to communicate; but being contrary to the Canons before Absolution, a great debate followed how to hazard him to the Church of Scotland, lest by the way he should recant; and indeed the King ever more endeavouring to rectifie his Conscience, and to recover him to be a Profelyte.

The adventure was thus pieced: the Bishop of Cathness now at Court, must consent in the name of the Scots Kirk, for the Archbishop of Canterbury to absolve him; and the form new devised so to do, in respect of the correspondency of that Church with England.

The Scottish Church hears of this, and interprets that act as an usurpation upon their Rites; which the King is fain to excuse in a long Letter to satisfy that curiosity; and lest he should seem to take upon him to palliate so great a presumption of himself only, the Archbishop also gave his Reasons in writing, without intrenching upon the independencies of so free, absolute, and intire Authority of Scotland.

And withal, Huntley come home, must supplicate that Assembly now convened at Aberdene, for their confirmation and his submission, which was solemnly performed.

And because it was about the end of the General Assembly; we shall shut it up with inserting such Articles as may enlighten the Reader to the knowledge of the Kings elaborate Care and Wisdom, in reducing a perverse Jurisdiction to this moderate issue, in conformity to the Discipline of the Church of England; by which we may conclude the evident signs and hopes of a full recovery in time from their peevish Hierarchy, which had been prosecuted in some measure; from the very time that this King took Government to himself, and brought it before his Death to a semblable conformity with England; and might so have prospered to perfection, had not their and our sins since set a period to us both.

1. For the more reverence of the holy Communion, the same should be celebrated kneeling, which always had been standing.

2. Not to be denied the Patient desperate sick in his bed, with three or four of Religious conversation to communicate with him.

3. The Sacrament of Baptism not to be longer deferred, than the next Sunday after the birth, and in necessity in a private House by the Minister, and publication thereof the next Sunday in the Church.

4. That the inestimable benefits received from God by our Lord Jesus Christ, his Birth, Passion, Resurrection, Ascension, and Sending down the Holy Ghost, having been commendably remembered at certain days and times by the whole Church of the World; every Minister upon these days should therefore commemorate the said benefits upon those set days, and to make choice of several pertinent Texts of Scripture to frame his Doctrine and Exhortations there-to.

And because Confirmation after Baptism stuck in their Stomachs, and indeed the King was unsatisfied therein, terming it a meer hotch-potch, and not clear to his apprehension; but yet thus much was concluded, that seeing the act of Confirmation of Children is for their good Education most necessary, being reduced to the Primitive integrity; the Minister shall Catechize them after eight years old, to rehearse the Lords Prayer, the Belief, and Ten Commandments, with Answers to Questions, in the small Catechism, used in the Church; and that the Bishops in their Visitations should bless them with Prayer for their increase of Grace and

So much was done indeed, and presented humbly to his Majesty, with some reasons why the same being novel to them, were not as yet inserted with the Canons; which the King did not then otherwise press, as resolving to effect his desire, at his coming personally into that Kingdom, when his presence should satisfy with reasons all scrupulous aversion.

About this time happened that difference in the family of Sir Thomas Lake, one of the Secretaries of the State, between his Wife and Daughter, and the Countess of Exeter, which involved him and his into ruine.

Sir Thomas Lake's Story. This Lake was a learned Gentleman, brought up under Sir Fr. Walsingham, (that subtle Secretary of State) as Amanuensis to him; and after good experience of his deserts was recommended to Queen Elizabeth, and read to her French and Latine, in which Tongues she would say, that he surpassed her Secretaries, and was so employed all her time; for he was reading (as to quiet her Spirits) when the Countess of Warwick told him, that the Queen was departed.

But not long before she received him Clerk of her Signet, and he was chosen by this State in that Place, to attend King James from Berwick; and so sufficient he was, that the King made use of his present service in some French dispatches, by the way that he came hither; which indeed Secretary Cecil had reason to resent, as too much trenching on his Office.

And therefore craved leave of the King, that he might not attend beyond his Month, to prejudice the other Clerks; which was excused, and he kept still at Court.

These sufficiencies of his enabled him in these times of gaining, with much repute and direct honesty to purchase large possessions.

And now the place of Secretary was joyned in two Principals, Sir Ralph Winwood and him: and so he continued with honourable esteem, until malice and revenge, two violent passions overruling the weaker sex, concerning his Wife and Daughter, involved him into their quarrel, the chief and only cause of his ruine.

He had by his Wife Sons and Daughters, his eldest Married unto Baron Rosse, (in right of a Grandmother) the Son of Thomas Earl of Exeter, by a former Venter; this Baron therefore, and upon Lakes credit, was sent Ambassador extraordinary into Spain, An. 1611. in a very gallant Equipage, with hopes of his own to continue Liege, to save charges of transmitting any other.

In his absence here fell out a deadly feud ('tis no matter for what) between the Lady Lake and her Daughters Stepmother the Countess of Exeter, which was particularly described in a Letter, and sent from England to Madrid in Spain, which was shewed by the Person to whom it was writ, to my Lord Ambassador there.

A youthful Widow this Countess had been and Virtuous, the Relict of Sir Thomas Smith Clerk of the Council and Register of the Parliament, and so she came bedfellow to this Gouty, Diseased but Noble Earl, and that preferment had made her subject to envy and malice.

Home comes the Lord Rosse from his Ambassie, when he fell into some neglect of his Wife and her kinned, upon refusing to increase allowance to her settlement of Jointure, which was promised to be compleated at his return. Fac. 14.

Not long he stays in England, but away he gets into Italy, turn'd a professed Roman Catholick; being cozened into that Religion here by his publick confident Gondamore.

In this his last absence, never to return, the Mother and Daughter accuse the Countess of former incontinency with the Lord Rosse, whiles he was here; and that therefore upon his Wives discovery he was fled from hence and from her Marriage-bed; with other devised Calumnies, by several designs and contrivements to have impoysoned the Mother and Daughter.

This quarrel blazened at Court, came to the Kings Ear, who as privately as could be, singly examined each Party; the Countess with tears and imprecations professes her innocency; which to oppose, the Mother and Daughter counterfeit her Hand to a whole sheet of paper, wherein they make her with much contrition to acknowledge her self guilty, crave pardon for attempting to impoyson them, and desire friendship for ever with them all.

The King gets sight of this, as in favour to them, and demands the time, place, and occasion when this should be writ; they tell him, 'That all the Parties met in a visit at Wimbleton, (the Earl of Exeter's House) where in dispute of their Differences she confessed her guilt; desirous of absolution and friendship, consents to set down all under her own Hand, which presently she writ at the Window, in the upper end of the great Chamber at Wimbleton; in presence of the Mother and Daughter, the Lord Rosse and one Diego a Spaniard, his confiding Servant.

But now they being gone, and at Rome, the King forthwith sends Mr. Dendy one of his Sergeants at Arms, (sometimes a Domestick of the Earl of Exeter, an honest and worthy Gentleman) post to Rome; who speedily returns with Ross and Diego's Hands, and other Testimonials, that all the said accusation, confession, suspicions and papers concerning the Countess, were notorious false and scandalous; and confirm it by receiving the Eucharist, in assurance of her Honour, and his Innocency; besides several Letters of her Hand, compared with this Writing, concluded it counterfeit.

Then the King tells the Mother and Daughter, that this Writing being denied by her, their Testimonies, as Parties, would not prevail, without additional witnesses.

They then adjoyn one Sarah Wharton, their Chamberers, who, they affirm, stood behind the Hangings, at the Entrance of the Room, and heard the Countess read over what she had writ; and to this she swears before the King.

But after a Hunting at New Park, the King entertained at Wimbleton, and in that Room, he observes the great distance from the Window to the lower end, and placing himself behind the Hangings (and so other Lords in turn) they could not hear a loud voice from the Window; besides, the Hangings wanted two foot of the ground, and might discover the Woman, if hidden behind: the King saying, Oaths cannot deceive my sight; and the Hangings had not been removed in that Room in thirty years before.

Nay more than all these, the Mother and Daughter counterfeit a Confession in Writing, of of one Luke Hutton, that for forty pounds the Countess should hire him to poyson them; which man, with wonderful providence was found out, and privately denies it to the King.

Anno 1616.

And thus prepared, the King sends for Lake, whom in truth he valued, tells him the danger to imbarque himself in this Quarrel; advising him to leave them to the Law (being ready for a Star-Chamber Business).

He humbly thanked his Majesty, but would not refuse to be a Father and Husband; and so puts his Name with theirs in a cross Bill; which at the hearing took up five several days, the King sitting in Judgment; but the former Testimonies and some private Confessions of the Lady Rosse and Sarah Wharton, which the King kept in secret, made the Cause for some days of Trial, appear doubtful to the Court, until the Kings discovery, which concluded the Sentence, pronounced upon several Censures, Lake and his Lady Fined ten Thousand pounds to the King, five Thousand pounds to the Countess, fifty pounds to Hutton, Sarah Wharton to be whipt at a Carts Tail, about the Streets, and to do penance at St. Martins Church; the Lady Rosse for confessing the Truth and Plot, in the midst of the Trial, was pardoned by the most voices, from Penal Sentence.

The King (I remember) compared their Crimes to the first Plot of the first Sin in Paradise, the Lady to the Serpent, her Daughter to Eve, and Sir Thomas to poor Adam, whose Love to his Wife (the old Sin of our Father) had beguiled him; I am sure he paid for all; which, as he told several, cost him thirty Thousand pounds, the loss of his Masters Favour, and Offices of Honour and Gain; but truly, with much pity and compassion at Court, he being held an honest man.

History of the A.B. of Spalato. Discontent among the Roman Prelates, put the Archbishop of Spalato, Mark Antonio de Dominis, to seek his Peace against that See, by sundry overtures unto several Princes in Italy, and other where, Spanish and French; at last he becomes tainted with some Opinions Heretical to them, which either he believed, or took up such Tenents for the present time, to prepare him a fitter Profelyte hereafter; and finding no sure footing from the Fury of the Pope and Conclave, he steals over into England; and to please the King, pretends Conversion by his Majesties Works of Controversie, and quarrels with Bellarmino; however, it was thought fit to bid him welcom, and to prefer him to the Deanery of Windsor; and for better Support, to the Mastership of the Savoy.

This next Count Gondamore, the Spanish Lieger, who intending to tempt him (as the Devil does his Creatures) with a bosom-sin, that which they love, had intelligence of his innate disposition to Avarice; with this he tampers afar off, and with leave of his Master, invites him to turn again, from this so mean Allowance, and take Preferment in the Conclave, to be Spains Pensioner there (as almost all are) with this assurance of a Cardinals Cap, he was cozened into the Court of Inquisition, and so to Gael, where he ends his Days with grief, and died a Protestant Professor, in malice, say some, to the Papists, or rather of no Religion at all, as others.

Marquefs d'Ancre murdered in France. The late sudden Murder aforefaid of Henry 4. of France, left the Sovereignty to Lewis his Son, and his Minority to be supported by his Mothers Regency; and she in miscarriage, through too much affection to her Favourite the Marquefs d'Ancre (a Mechanical Florentine, her Country-man) occasioned the Princes of the Blood to seek their Freedom by force, which lasted not long, after their several imprisonments; for the quarrel rising high, and D'Ancre busied abroad, they plotted there by a bold Captain of the Gens d'Armes de Vurry, and effected upon *D'Ancre*s Person with a single Pistol, at the instant when he returned to the Palace, the Louvre in Paris, and his Corps had no other Balm for their Burial than his own Blood, being dragg'd about the City by the Peoples rage, till the disjointed Limbs were left for Ravens.

King Lewis was young, and engaged before in his Mothers Quarrel; but this Accident taking fire, as the Princes would have it, soon won their weak Sovereign on their party, and in policy, perforce, he owned their Actions, as the most convenient Justice, for quieting the differences; and so the Government taking hold on this occasion, turn'd to the other side, and had the better of the Queens Faction; she being afterwards led up and down the Kings Army under oversight, as a Prisoner, but shewed to the People, as if reconciled to her Son, the chief Mover, having paid the Account upon the execution of his Person.

This for the present, which lasted by Fits for some years, as her Faction took breath, until that excellent Engineer of State-Policy, Cardinal Richelieu had put her into a Jealousie of her own safety at home, and so opened a Gap whereby (as in stealth) she might get loose out of the Kingdom; but Sovereigns leaving their Subjects, are seldom sent for again; and after much turmoil and tampering with several States and Italian Tricks, she ended her days very poor in Germany, in the City of Collen.

And Richelieu successful in all his Policies, settled that Nation to his Death in their due submission to Sovereignty, which broke out afterwards, Anno 1652. into like Examples of former Miseries.

The Blessing of Peace and Plenty enthroning this our King, resolved him for a leafurely Expedition into Scotland, in the opening of the last Spring, which was not performed this Summer-Season, partly to make good his Promise, when he took leave of his Native Countrey, to give them a Visit after some time of settlement in his New Inheritance; and in some policy it was hastened now to be out of the way of Address from the Emisaries of the French (that unstable State) now in the height of Dissention, whilst King James and his Court were thus refreshed from Affairs and Business here, in as much Prudence and Splendor as the consideration of this Journey was necessary to the Design, which an Historian (with his Pasquil-Observations) spends in Ridiculous Riot.

But it was indeed by his Presence to warm those cold Countreys with the Beams of Majesty, and with his Precepts to warn that Rebellious Nation of their Feuds, by example of their old French Friends fresh Miseries, to settle the Spirits of the Factionous Presbytery, in obedience to Episcopal Hierarchy; to pass some Bills and Acts of Parliament, to regulate the exacting powers of some Officers in trust, to give Grace to the humble, and content to all.

And forthwith a Proclamation was advised in Scotland, and there Published of a King Solomon-like instinct, 'to visit that Kingdom, and therein gave them assurance, not to alter the Civil and Ecclesiastical Estate, but by Reforming Abuses in the Church and Commonwealth, and advised them to all Accommodations to bid him and his Welcom.

These Directions were accompanied with others of State, and amongst them, for repairing and orderly adorning his Chappel, and Officers sent out of England with Necessaries, and some Portraits and Pictures of the Apostles, Carved, for the Pews and Stalls; but the People exclaim at such Sights, That such Images were to be set up; the Organs were come before, and after comes the Mass,

pleased.

The King was angry at their Ignorance, and sent them word to distinguish between Pictures intended for Ornament and Decoration, and Images erected for Worship and Adoration; resembling such men to the Constable of Castile, who being to swear the Peace concluded with Spain, and to be performed in the Kings Chappel, where some Anthems were to be sung, desired that Gods Name might not be used therein; otherwise he would be content with any thing else: So the Scots-Kirk can endure Dogs, Bears and Bulls, nay, Devils-Dressings, to be figured in Churches, but not the Patriarchs nor Apostles.

He came to Berwick in May, and there it was advised to Prorogue the Parliament to June 13. which gave the King time to progress through the Countrey, making his Entry in the Special Burghs and Towns, after the most Magnificent manner; and was welcom'd with all the Expressions of Cost and Glory that ever that poor Nation had been put unto, that some Effects might seem to make good the Scots Rants of their gude Countrey.

And because it hath been since surmized that nothing was acted there in order to the Service of that Nation, we shall trouble the Reader with some Particulars.

Parliam.
called, &c.
Kings
Speech.

The King enters their Parliament with Rules for establishing Religion and Justice, and a regard to the Ministers of both; for notwithstanding the many years Profession of Reformation, numbers of Churches remained unplanted, and those that were, wanted Maintenance, advising that Commissioners might regulate a local Stipend to each Minister.

He remembered them of his continual care and pains heretofore and since, for placing Justices and Constables to preserve the Peace, and execute Laws, which he said had been neglected by some, by the small regard shewed unto them, from others of higher Rank. But as he would have them know such Officers to be of Honourable Esteem, so none could deserve better from his hands, than those that countenanced them; and those others Enemies to the Crown and Quiet of the Kingdom.

That he had long endeavoured to Civilize men from their barbarous Customs, having made some progress, by remove of the persons, or by extinction of their Feuds, and in place thereof, established Civility and Justice; and to his Lives end, he would never leave to do his best endeavours, until he might say of Scotland, as one of the Emprors said of Rome, Inveni lateritiam, relinquo marmoream. Indeed the Countrey affords more of Stone than Tile-shard,

Articles about Religion.

They came to Vote Commissioners upon the Articles of Religion; whom the King commends, they refuse: and evermore Officers of State are suspected partial for the King; and therefore they admit but of three; The Chancellor, Treasurer, and Clerk of the Rolls.

Fac. 15.

They begin with the chiefest Article, That whatsoever should be concluded by the King and the Bishops in Matters of external Polity, should be an Ecclesiastical Law; not that the King was against the Advice and Assistance of a competent number of the Grave and Learned Ministers; but to be over-ruled (said he) as in your former General Assemblies, I shall never agree; the Bishops must rule the Ministers, and the King govern both in matters indifferent, and not repugnant to Gods Word, and so that Article was Formed and Passed.

Hereupon the Ministers mutinie, that their Discipline should be formed to all the Ceremonies of England, and Struthers in his next Sermon, condemning all those Rites, prayed God to save Scotland from the same Sin; and thus set on, they frame a Protestation to the King in Parliament.

Ministers mutiny & Expostulations.

First, Against that Article, and therein if Remedy be not provided, they shall be forced to other Effects, for Freedom of their Church, and Discharge of their Consciences.

Their Reasons they reduce into Arguments.

1. Their Reformation, That the purity in Doctrine, Sacraments, Discipline and Order thereof hath been acknowledged rather as a pattern to be followed by all Reformed Churches of Europe, than now to be put to seek it from such as never attained to it.

2. That their General Assemblies formerly established to constitute and make Canons, will be utterly overthrown.

3. That hitherto their Church, nearest the Divine and Apostolical Institution, and so have lived long without Schism and Rent, may now by introducing Novelties, be miserably overthrown.

4. That his Majesties Gracious Assurance by his Letters this last Winter against all alteration of Religion, and so hath been intimated in Pulpits, when Rumors were dispersed of intended Conformity with England:

These they pray may be sufficient to warn the King and Parliament, not to oppress their poor Church, and give grief to Millions of men, that otherwise would rejoyce at his Majesties presence; and so they resolve, that rather than submit, they are prepared to incur Censure, and oppose.

This Protestation they commit to the most mad-headed man amongst them, one Hewet; but some of the wiser sort fearing the Success, desire the Archbishop of St. Andrews to suppress it.

He meeting Hewet, desires to peruse it, and blaming the man, keeps the Writing, the other seizes the Paper; and thus striving in the next Room, the King hastily comes out, and sternly fronts the Fellow; who falls down upon his Knees, and craves pardon for the Protestation, professing never more to meddle therein.

But the Bishops had warning to summon some principal Ministers, and with them to meet him at St. Andrews, July 10. where the King greets them.

How great my Care hath been for the Church (saith he) since I had Authority and Power to perform it, your Consciences cannot chuse but confess

Speech.

Anno 1617. 'confels it; I need not tell you, I seek no thanks, 'God knows my Heart, for true Worship of 'him, and decent Order in the Church. Whilst I 'resolved on this Journey to visit you, I gave 'you warning to insert some Articles into the 'Acts of your Church, those were Anniversary 'Commemorations of Christ's Blessings to man; 'as, his Nativity, Passion, Resurrection, Ascension, 'and Descent of the Spirit; another, for private 'use of both Sacraments; a third, for Reverend 'Administration of the Communion; and a fourth, 'for Catechising and Confirming Children by 'Bishops: I was Answered, that they had not 'been moved in any of the Churches Assembly; 'and so I was silent, and lately desiring by my 'Prerogative, to be declared, in making Eccle- 'siastical Laws, ye Mutined, and protested 'against me; but I pass all, amongst many other 'wrongs frequent from you.

'The Errand I have now, is to know your Ar- 'guments, why the same ought not to be granted: 'Reason shall ever guide me; and if my De- 'mands are so Just and Religious too, I will not 'be refused, nor resisted; and upon that, Browing 'upon them with a full eye, Majestical and Stern, 'they all fell down on their Knees.

'The King went on; It is a Power innate, a 'Princely special Prerogative which Christian 'Kings have, to order and dispose external 'things in the outward Polity of the Church, 'as we with our Bishops Advice shall think fit. 'And Sirs (said he) for your approving or dis- 'proving, deceive not your selves, me you shall 'not; I will have my Reason not opposed.

They sub- mit seem- ingly. They were all become new men, and humbly besought they might confer, and so return an uniform Answer; which, in two Hours space produces a Petition for a General Assembly; where- in all his Majesties Articles being proponed, they might with common Consent be received; I, saith the King, but what Assurance have I of their consenting? They protested that they saw no reason to the contrary.

'But if it be otherwise, and your Reason now 'be none of theirs then, the Articles refused, 'my difficulty the more; and when I shall hereaf- 'ter put my own Authority in use, I shall be 'Pulpited a Tyrant, Persecutor; Ye were wont so 'to do.

All cried out that none durst be so mad.

'Yet Experience tells (says he) that it hath 'been so; therefore unless I be sure, I shall not 'grant your Assembly.

They craved the Archbishop of St. Andrews to Answer for them, but he refused; having been formerly deceived. At length they procured leave to Assemble in November next at St. Andrews.

Afterward revolt. Simson, that Subscribed to the Protestation, writes to his Brethren those Articles, which he calls Tricas Anglicanas; the Letter-Carrier was Catherwood, who, for his Insolency to the Kings Face, was committed, and after banished; and Simson sent to Edinburgh-Castle, where he lay till December,

And so the King returns to England, by the West-parts, and at Dunfries had his Farewel-Sermon by the Bishop of Galloway, which made the Hearers heavy at their hearts.

The King gone home, the Assembly met, but willingly would have delayed their Conclusion of the five Articles, till they might inform their Flocks of the equity of them; and so they went away: which the King considers as an high Contempt, and Breach of their Promise; and commands the Bishops of St. Andrews and of Glas- cow, precisely in their own persons to keep Christ- mas Day next, Preaching upon Texts according to the Time, and to discharge all Modification (advance) of Stipends to any Minister for a year, unless only such as have submitted to the Articles, and in affection to the Kings Ser- vice.

The Ministers thus curbed, and the Northern men being come up to Edinburgh for their Sti- pends, complain of their Brethren, their pride and insolency, supplicate the Bishops to intercede and mitigate his Majesties Displeasure; which they did, and procured Letters from the King, for allowance of their Stipends. And Mr. Sim- son was now released, professing his hearty Re- luctancy for opposing his Majesty; setting his Hand to a Supplication which himself framed, with all submission, but to their Assemblies or Synods (his being to the Council) he sets out an Apologetick, glossing upon each Word of his Con- fession, and concludes, 'That whatsoever frailty 'or weakness had befallen him heretofore, he ho- 'ped now to be like Peter, Qui ore negavit, & corde confessus est, and never to betray the Lords 'Cause with Judas.

The Jesuites do even so, play fast and loose; neither Tongue, Hearts nor Hands can bind them against their mental secret purposes; and yet there being some hope, that Matters might amend for the Church, and their frequent Synods pro- paring for their better Obedience, the Bishops procured the Kings consent to another General Assembly to be at Perth, in August the next year.

This Royal Progress of Pleasure into Scotland and back again, gave leisure to the King, and ad- vantage to all Attendants, for preferment of their persons, or other satisfaction for their Services, by the Freedom of their Masters Bounty, both to Scots and English.

Especially to our new Favourite, now of two years growth in the King's Affection; this man, Rife of the Duke of George Villiers, of an Ancient Family in Leice- ster-shire, and bears Arg. on a Cross Gul. five Escalops Or. His Father Sir George Villiers begat him 1592. upon a Second Venter, Mary Beau- mom, of Noble Extraction; whom for her Beau- ty and Goodness, he married: By his first, he had but one Son, rising no higher in Honour than Knight and Baronet; his Disposition not Court- like; and therefore enjoying perhaps the great- er Greatness, Self-Fruition; yet in time he had preferment to the Government of Ulster Pro- vince in Ireland: The other Sons were three; and in order of Birth, not of Preferment, John was Viscount Purbeck; George Duke of Buckingham, Christopher Earl of Anglesey, and one Daughter, Susan Countess of Denbigh.

We are told (that he came over by chance from his French Travels, and sought prefer- ment in Marriage with any body; but mist of a Match for want of an hundred Marks) and so pieces him from the Court (like the Story of Dametas his Caparisons) borrowing of each one by piece-meal, to put him forward for the Kings Favourite.

But the Truth is thus; his Mother, a Widow, was afterwards married unto Sir Thomas Com- pson, whose Brother the Lord Compson, by chance falling Anno 1617. falling upon a wonderful Match for matchless Wealth, with the Daughter and Heiress of Sir John Spencer, Alderman of London, and her Father then lately dead, this Lord was Master of all; which was more than credible, and so might be enabled bountifully to set up a Kinsman, without other Help or Alms of the Parish.

It was plotted long before, and Villiers sent for to the same purpose, by practice of some English Lords, to ballance with the Scots, who, by the help of the last Favourite Somerset, and others of great affection with the King, had the better of the poor English.

There had been a private Entertainment of a Supper at Baynards Castle, by the Family of Herbert, Hertford, and Bedford, and some others; by the way in Fleetstreet, hung Somerset's Picture, at a Painters Stall; which, one of the Lords envying, bad his Foot-boy sling Dirt on the Face; which he did, and gave one passing by, occasion to ask his Companion upon what score that was done? He told him this Meeting would discover; and truly that person waited near and opportunely, and so was acquainted with the Design, to bring in Villiers, who was entred before.

He had need to be well Back'd against enough that envied his Nearness, and aimed by any affront to discountenance him, until he made them know that his Courage overmastered his Sweetness; for having bought the Place of Cup-bearer to the King, and taking the upper end of the Board at Dinner, before some other Waiter, which was not his due, was told of it, and so removed; nor was it done with overmuch kindness; for indeed the other was Somerset's Creature; who urging a second Incivility, Villiers gave him a Box o'th' Ear; for which the Custom of Court condemned him to have his Hand cut off, and which, Somerset, as then Chamberlain, ought to prosecute the Execution of; which he did; and here the Kings Pardon, without any satisfaction to the other party, made him suspected a Budding Favourite, who was indeed raised with, or by Somerset's Ruine; so drew his friends compartners in his Fall; being then as one cast out of the Passions of the King.

We shall find him come up by degrees, and to stand firm in favour, to the Death of this King, and his second Master till his Assassination.

The King minding to shew his own Power to raise him from nothing; and his Will to advance him for nothing, though others envy him; yet his Affection was enough to hold up his Head; he waited hard and close his first years Rising; but having removed all the whole Line of Somerset's Links (his Wives Interests, the Howards) being boldly fixed in his Masters Favour, he would adventure to take leave, but not too long, to be absent; and so by degrees inured the King from his Custom of overtiring his Favourites, and at last fortifies himself, by raising Outworks, if in case of assault, his own Marriage with an Heir, the Daughter of the Earl of Rutland, Rich and Honourable, twisting himself and his Issue by Inter-Marriage with the best and most Noble.

For indeed the Brouse-Boughs cut down or removed, to plain the Stem, our Favourite appears like a proper Palm; besides the discerning Spirit of the King, who first cherished him, through his innate Virtue, that surprized all men. Henceforth Preferments came thick upon him; for the next St. Georges Day after Initiation, brought him Knight Bachelor, and Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber; at New-years-time, Master of the Horse, and Knight of the Garter; and that Summer, in August 1616. Baron of Whaddon, and Viscount Villiers; the beginning of the next year Earl of Buckingham, and Privy Counsellor; and this Summer in Scotland, sworn there also Counsellor of that State; at Christmas after (that Favours might be Recorded Acts of Time, and of Affection also) he was Created Marquess Buckingham, and Admiral of England; Chief Justice in Eyre, Master of the Kings-Bench-Office, and Steward of Westminster (Places of profit) and Constable of Windsor Castle; the largest was Duke of Buckingham, sent unto him by Patent into Spain; and last of all, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports: And so have we Blazoned him at once with all these Titles, which came to him in time heretofore and after.

These Accumulations might no doubt astonish the Conceit of Sir A.W. The hearts of Princes once dilated with Affection, cannot be satiable in the exercise of any narrow Bounty or little Affection; Choice and Love begets the Gift, which Act becomes fomented, even to be in love with their own giving, and so to excess.

And thus have we put together this great man, who was pieced up by degrees and times.

He had many Kindred; for his Family was ancient: Heraldry might Blaze as large Fields of his Pedigree as need concern any Subject to prove, were a man preferred to Pencil his Life, which I take holdness but to touch with Shadows.

These were dispersed by Time into several Matches with the Gentry; and what strange or new Device was it in him to raise them that were near in Blood by Noble and Worthy ways, as he did! He made his two Brothers Peers, his Mother and Sister Countesses; the one by Patent, the other by Marriage: The rest of his Kindred, by his Countenance, got means to live like their Births; being a Race handsom and beautiful; I mean, the Females, descending of Villiers or Beaumont, either Matched with Peers, or with the Sons and Heirs of Earls, or with Knights of plentiful condition; for he did not much strengthen his Subsistence in Court; but stood there on his own feet; the most of his Allies rather leaned on him, than he shouldered up by any of them hereafter, during this Kings Reign; wherein his Actions are successively remembered.

But concerning his Mother, made a Countess, there are in England three sorts of Honourable Women; by Creation, Descent, or Marriage.

1. H. 8. Created Anne Bullen Marchioness of Pembroke, before he Married her; so was Susan Widow, the sole Daughter of the Baron of Abergavenny, Created Baroness De la Spencer. Camden 63. 6. So also was the Lady Compton, Wife of Sir Thomas Compton, Brother to the Lord Compton, made Countess of Buckingham, with the Fee of Twenty Pound per Annum, 18 Jac. and also the Lady Finch, a Widow, Created Viscountess of Maidstone, 21 Jac.

2. Noble Women by Descent, or to whom Dignities descend as heirs, are said to be Honorable by tenure; or those heirs whose Ancestors were seized of an estate descendable to them in their titles of Dukedom, Earldom or Baronies, or heirs to Ancestors summoned to the Parliament.

3. And lastly, Noble Women are those Married to a Lord or Peer of the Realm, though themselves but in the state of Gentry.

Knights Wives are not of the Nobility, they are stiled Ladies by the Courtesie of England, but not not in Courts of Judicature. So much for Noble Women.

Anno 1617. In the Kings return out of Scotland, the people took occasion to complain of common, and to petition in particular, that the freedom of Servants and Labourers was extreemly enlaved by their Masters, pretended zeal and sanctimony against Idolizing (as was pretended) of such days as ancient custom from general Councils, and the Church of England reformed, even to that time had appointed to be kept holy; whereby after the Solemnizing of Divine Service, the Servants and Workmen were not usual to discompany from their accustomed moderate Pastimes, such as the most rigid (heretofore) could not justly but admit.

The King not sooner affected to his own sports, that the sense of the peoples sufferings might take advantage by his Example, and so of liberty in the like (for much of his most serious affairs were shadowed from the Vulgar, nay from the observing Politick, by his own publick Pastime.)

Recreations for Servants on Holy-day. Zealots displeased. But in truth it came to be a business of consequence, to consider how the intemperate zeal of our then rigid Reformers, (to countenance their own design of deforming) strook at higher powers through the peoples sides in many matters, so in this case.

For at first, these pure conceited Men quarrelled at the name of the Holy Seventh day, called, as of old, Sunday, which they would have named Sabbath; and thereafter would have it observed Levitically, so strict, as not to gather sticks.

This being discussed in some Counties, the people forbore their Recreations; then the Reformers took the like exceptions against the peoples lawful pleasures and Holy days; and at last against all sports and publick pastimes, exercises, innocent and harmless, such were Leaping, Dancing, Running, or any mastery for to Goal or Prize, May-pole, or Church-ale, as debauched idle Persons.

In some of these pastimes several Counties excelled, and to entertain community with their mirth, the Court progresses took delight to Judge of their Wagers in their Journey to Scotland; which the people observing, took occasion to themselves to petition the King in his return for freedom, and leave to be merry.

And thus by this means, an Authors Monstrum horrendum, the Church-mans Maskarado was begotten and brought to allowance by Command, in print, to Justifie the people in their lawful pleasures, though upon the Sunday after Service.

Earl of Shrewsbury dyes. This year died Edw. Talbot, the eighth Earl of Shrewsbury, without issue, and therefore it descended upon George Talbot, son of John Talbot of Grafton Esq; by Katherine his Wife, Daughter of Sir Will. Peters, heir male of Sir Gilbert Talbot of Grafton, second Son of John Lord Talbot, second Earl of Shrewsbury, after the Death of Gilbert and Edward Earls of Shrewsbury without issue male, who was this next year 1618. admitted by King James the ninth Earl.

But this Man dying also without issue, the inheritance descended upon the Children of John Talbot, Brother to this George, which John dyed and left issue John the eleventh Earl, 1652. he bears Gules, a Lion rampant, in a Border engraied, Or.

Sir Walter Raleigh troubled, and the cause thereof. Sir Walter Raleigh wearied with long imprisonment, and having there spent his time well in the History of the World, made his Petition more passable to the King, whose love to Learning granted him now at last his liberty; and not long after gave him leave to wander after a design to the Western World, where he had been in several Climates before; the common World wondering at this Mans wit, who had a way to break Jests, though to hazard his Head again; for in a jeer, he said, That his whole History had not the president of a Kings chief Prisoner to purchase freedom, and his bosom-favourite to have the halter, but in Scripture, Haman and Mordecai, meaning himself and Somerfet: to which he was told that the King replied, He might dye in this deceit; which he did: Somerfet he saved.

But in truth he had a reaching and roving mind from his first rise, and thereafter but a mean fortune, which he meant now to make up out of Adventurers purses, for Gold mettall, from a Mine in Guiana, one of the Countries of America; upon no other ground to win belief but a pound of the Ore which he had from thence by the Hands of Captain Kemish his ancient Servant.

The King wondering at this man, why to hazard his future fortune upon the nice dispute with the King of Spain, whose Territory he must invade at his own peril of success; but yet gave him leave with his liberty, so be, that he broke not the Kings bands of Amity, which he had strict Rules and Order to observe.

The French Liege had been very earnest for his enlargement, with much affection to his deserts, and some design of policy against Spain, wherein they two waded so far as that the discovery came to the Kings Ears (not without intrenching (by the by) upon his Majesties honour) and several Commissions from France, presented to him to fit him for that purpose; wherein he was warily watch'd, till it should ripen for further Trial, and at the worst, back-friends were to be put aboard, to bring him back again.

And having got Commission, and thereupon a company of his own Country-men, they imbarck with him in Voyage thither, with a compleat Fleet of twelve Sail, and landed at St. Tomazo, a Town of the Spaniards, killed five hundred men, sacked and burnt it; of five of their Fleet it may be said, as of the old saying, They went up the River, and so came down again; for the design being the River Orenoque in Guiana to discover the Mine, at the Foot of a Mountain; up in the Countrey they were opposed by the Inhabitants, Spaniards and Natives, and so returned to their Company.

This Expedition was grounded at the first only upon Kemish's information: the miscarriages that might happen were always cunningly resolved to light upon him, for satisfaction of the Adventurers to answer it to the King: his intent was never to return but by his own management, and the obedience of his Company over whom he had Commission of Life and Death. He dreamed of nothing less than of a prosperous Journey.

And now to frighten Kemish, Raleigh threatens him with the Kings displeasure, which to avoid, says the Historian, the poor man pistols himself, and so no tales could be truly told. Hist. Great Brit.

He dead, the most minded and forced their own and his return home, which he intended any where else; and so some of their scattered Ships with him, more like a Prisoner than Commander, came safe to Kingsale in Ireland, from thence

Anno 1617. thence to Plymouth, where no sooner on shore, but he is taken into custody of Sir Lewis Stukely, Vice-Admiral of Devon, and conveyed to London, and so to the Tower, with whom he deals for a sum of money presently delivered to him to escape with him into France: Stukely yields to all, accompanies him by Water, whereby the way to Gravesend (the design of Stukelys treachery in that, and so is prospered with him, being hanged afterwards for clipping Gold) they were seized, and he brought into the Tower; and not many days after commanded to the Kings-bench-bar at Westminster, before the Lord Chief Justice Mountague, where he was questioned upon the Records of his former Arraignment at the City of Winchester; and in Answer to that he was asked, What he had to say to his sentence to dye like a Traytor?

His short defence of being lately intrusted by the Kings Commission over the Lives of some of his Liege people, was soon replied unto as insufficient, and he had Judgment to dye the next day by the favour of the Ax; which he said (smilingly touching it) Was a sharp Medicine, but a sound Cure of all Diseases; as it proved to him then in this Ague fit, in the Palace-yard at Westminster, Octob. 1618.

It was indeed common discourse then that Raleigh knew of no Mine, nor was Kemish assured that the pretended Mine was of Gold, but that the piece of Ore which he presented to Raleigh in the Tower was falsified by dissolving some Gold therein; and he a better Chymist than Kemish for that purpose; that both of them designed it so to be, thereby cozening the World to get credit, and afterwards to deceive the King to purchase his liberty.

But when Kemish came safe from the supposed mountain, without Mine, whom Raleigh expected should miscarry in the way, and none but he could discover the deceit; then was he destroyed by Death, but by whose Hand it may be suspected, not by himself.

And truly these reports were more than a false visard to outface the Truth of his Merit in that action, and thereby to weigh down Raleighs miscarriage.

At his Death he endeavoured to clear some points which he knew lay on the deck against him, his disloyal words to the King. Undutiful language from Subjects of Sovereigns take deeper root than the memory of evil deeds; so did the Marshal Byron which cost him his Head. Essex once told Queen Elizabeth, That her conditions were as crooked as her carcase. Manei altâ mente repositum.

He said, His accuser was a base runagate Frenchman and perfidious, being sworn to secrecy, yet he betrayed.

Secondly, To have had often plots with France. He confessed, That he had been often solicited from thence, and that he endeavoured to escape thither at twice, and the last time being as got far as Wolwich.

Thirdly, That the French Agent came often to him with Commissions from his Master, but it was not accepted.

Much he said of these as to the publick, and of more things as to private, which he did deny but Traversed.

So then there were other businesses of a second charge and confederacy, which made him liable to a new Tryal; for Treason is so comprehensible, as to take in even circumstances, and out of them to make such conclusions as the Jealousie of State shall interpret either for safety or revenge. Fac. 15.

But the prudence of the King would not hazard more, having sufficient upon the old score; and because he could not in Law be Judicially called to accompt for his last actions; his former Attainder being the highest and the last work of the Law, whereby he was Civiliter Mortuus, the King was enforced (except Attainders should become priviledges for all subsequent offences) to execute him upon the former.

And concerning Sir Walters recovery of Queen Anne infirmity, for which she should beg a Boon, viz. (the re-examination of Lord Cobham by four Earls and three Counsellors) it being urged by an Author in the innocency of his cause, and ingratitude of the King.

Mr. Sanderson will Answer, to my knowledge, by the relation of some Ladies of her Bedchamber, and of her Surgeons and Physicians now living, That she was never cured of her Disease, but by death that ends all maladies. We are told that Sir Walter set out his design to the King, who discovered it to the Spanish Lieger Gondamore, the Country, Town, Men, Ships, Ordinance, and all, and he posted it to Spain, thence to the Indies, before that Raleigh could get out of our River; and yet for all these tidings, supplies were not come to defend the Town Tomazo.

We will confess that all these exceptions may be had under Sir Walters Hand, purposely so writ by him, to excuse the weakness (or wickedness) of the event; for the truth is, the design though hatcht in a corner, was published on the house top, to procure Contributors; otherwise he must conclude them Madmen or Fools, nay, I can, faith he, produce it under his Hand and Seal, with a blank (for he left a hundred) for other Adventurers to follow him, for which each one gave fifty pounds to his Lady; and therein was set down as much as our Historian fathers upon the King, or Gondamore.

And that his own Conscience was satisfied that he deserved death, before he was brought up Prisoner from Plymouth, and so to endeavour his escape from Trial, see but the close of his own Letter to Buckingham.

It was (faith he) the last severe Letter from the Lords for my speedy bringing up, and the impatience of dishonour that put me in fear of my life or perpetual imprisonment, which animated me in my late, and too late lamented resolution to escape, if his Majesties mercy do not pity my age, and scorn the advantage of my guilt; if his Majesty does not make differences in offences, proceeding from a life-saving natural impulsion, without ill intent, and those of an evil Heart.

And if that your Lordship do not vouchsafe to become my intercessor, whereby your Lordship shall bind a hundred Gentlemen, my kindred, to honour your memory; and bind me for all the time of my life, which you shall beg for me, to pray for your prosperity; and to remain,

Your Lordships most humble Servant

W. RALEIGH.

As to the value of that worthy Gentleman (from whose descent of blood, one faith, he was no stranger) certainly we may yield to him as much much or more than is described by his Character, but then those excellencies (natural Wit, better Judgment, and plausible Tongue, &c.) might in his long time of recess by imprisonment, (through disuse of men and business) become uncertain grounds to Fabrick such designs as the natural man (not supplied with inward Grace) usually aims at, and therein is mostly deceived; such was he, his fate, and fall.

This year the King creates by Patent four Earls, Sidney Earl of Leicester, Compton Earl of Northampton, Cavendish Earl of Devonshire, and Rich Earl of Warwick.

Having paid the price, a good Sum for their Honours, so earnest some are, and so ambitious of preferment, as what they cannot get by merit, they covet to purchase with money; an infection newly crept into the distribution of Honours, not usual here with former Sovereigns.

The miserable condition of sinful man in sundry examples of these present and of former times, should mind us hourly to beg of God preventing Grace, lest we fall into temptations of sin and Satan; such have been the calamities of ages past, at present are, and will be to come; Histories of Theft, Rapine, Murther, and such like.

One of wondrous note happened at Perinin in Cornwall, in September, a bloody and unexampled Murther, by a Father and Mother upon their own Son, and then upon themselves.

A strange Murder.

'He had been blessed with ample possessions and fruitful issue, unhappy only in a younger Son; who taking liberty from his Fathers bounty, and with a crew of like condition, that were wearied on Land, they went roving to Sea; and in a small Vessel Southward, took booty from all whom they could Master, and so increasing Force and Wealth, ventured on a Turk-man in the Streights, but by mischance their own powder fired themselves; and our Gallant trusting to his skilful swimming, got a shore upon Rhodes, with the best of his Jewels about him, where offering some to sale to a Jew, who knew them to be the Governor's of Algier, he was apprehended, and as a Pyrate sentenced to the Gallies amongst other Christians, whose miserable slavery made them all studious of freedom; and with Wit and Valour took opportunity and means to murder some Officers, got aboard of an English Ship, and came safe to London, where his Majesty and some skill made him Servant to a Chyrurgion, and sudden preferment to the East-Indies, there by this means he got money, with which returning back, he designed himself for his native County Cornwall; and in a small Ship from London, sailing to the West was cast away upon the Coast, but his excellent skill in swimming, and former fate to boot, brought him safe to shore; where since his fifteen years absence, his Fathers former fortunes much decayed, now retired him not far off to a Country habitation, in debt and danger.

'His Sister, he finds Married to a Mercer, a meaner match than her birth promised, to her at first appears a poor stranger, but in private reveals himself, and withal what Jewels and Gold he had concealed in a Bow-case about him; and concluded that the next day he intended to appear to his Parents, and to keep his disguise till she and her Husband should meet, and make their common joy compleat.

'Being come to his Parents, his humble behaviour, suitable to his suit of cloaths, melted the old couple to so much compassion, as to give him covering from the cold season, under their outward roof; and by degrees his traveling Tales told with passion to the aged people, made him their guest, so long by the Kitchen fire, that the Husband took leave and went to bed, and soon after his true Stories working compassion in the weaker Vessel, she wept and so did he, but compassionate of her Tears, he comforted her with a piece of Gold, which gave assurance that he deserved a lodging, to which she brought him, and being in bed shewed her his girdled Wealth, which he said was sufficient to relieve her Husbands wants, to spare for himself; and being very weary, fell fast asleep.

'The Wife tempted with the Golden bait of what she had, and eager of enjoying all, awakened her Husband with this News, and her contrivance what to do; and though with horrid apprehension he oft refused, yet her pining fondness (Eves enchantments) moved him to consent, and rise to be Master of all; and both of them to Murder the man, which instantly they did, covering the Corps under the cloaths till opportunity to convey it out of the way.

'The early Morning hastens the Sister to her Fathers house, where she with signs of Joy, enquires for a Saylor that should lodge there the last Night; the Parents slightly denied to have seen any such, until she told them that it was her Brother, her lost Brother, by that assured scar upon his Arm, cut with a Sword in his Youth, she knew him; and were all resolved this morning to meet there and be merry.

'The Father hastily runs up, finds the mark, and with horrid regret of this monstrous Murther of his own Son, with the same knife cut his own throat.

'The Wife went up to consult with him, where in a most strange manner beholding them both in Blood, wild and agast, with the instrument at Hand, readily rips up her own Belly till the guts tumbled out.

'The Daughter, doubting the delay of their absence, searches for them all, whom she found out too soon, with the sad sight of this scene, and being overcome with horror and amaze of this deluge of destruction, she sank down and died, the fatal end of that Family.

'The truth of which was frequently known, and flew to Court in this guise: but the imprinted Relation conceals their Names, in favour to some Neighbour of repute and a kin to that Family.

'The same sense makes me silent also.

We have heretofore heard of the Constitution of the Dutch-Netherlands, their favour to Vorsinus and his Heresies, preferred at Leyden 1611. where he had a way of Wit and Cunning to work into peoples dulness; led on by countenance of sundry the powerful Ministers of the Provincial States; that now his Tenets were Preached for Orthodox, and believed as Gospel, being mixed with those of Arminius, whose repute (following his Death) Vorsinus took up, and for the Masters sake, were misnamed Arminianism, then of a dozen years growth; infecting the Reformed Churches, almost in each Countrey published in Print, or fetcht from thence by Taint of young Students.

King

Anno King James took care to prevent both, by burning the one, if they came hither, and forbidding the other not to go thither.

Peace and plenty with them bred up these Schisms into as many Factions, the old way to work designs and changes in State, both of the Gown and of the Sword; the one mightily Mastered by the Wisdom of Barnevelt, the other commanded by the Power of the Prince of Orange: This Barnevelt was worthily Descended, and well Bred; his Travels abroad, and his Counsels at home, which his great age, seventy years, gave time to ripen for excellent Advice in the Magistracy, and Council in the Army, improved by five Embassies abroad, and thirty two Leaguers at home.

And it is Counsel to some, whether Conscience or Ambition over-ruled his last Actions; but he made himself Head of a Faction, which got the name Arminians; a common custom with opposers to colour their own designs by laying Infamy, or at least scandal upon their Adversaries; and this did the Prince do to destroy Barnevelt, for Envy and Fear. The other finding the pulse of the people to beat in a high Fever of that Disease, was forced for the present to tack on that side; where he was sure to have Hearts and Hands to keep him up, in a desperate State, otherwise to be overwhelmed in the deluge of destruction.

Thus in some condition to balance the Prince with assistance of several the Provincial States, of his Opinion and Jealousie; that if the power of the Prince, Generalissimo of their Armies, were not limited, his Greatness would ere long increase without Controul; and therefore by way of Counsel (for pretended good of the Commonwealth) they did Confederate to leavy new Companies, far from view or suspicion of the Prince, whom Barnevelt kept close to business of the publick Council, with the States General; and so it was not discovered until Midsummer, but then perfectly understood: the Prince in secret, with his Kinsman Count Ernest, and the best of his confidence, leaves the Court at the Hague, gives intelligence of his design to Colonel Ogal Commander of the Garrison at Utrecht (the place of the others greatest strength) who on the sudden receives them in; surprizes the Town and that State, in close Council, and at Hand had the Garrisons of Arnhem, and others to Master that part, and so other places of Force, whom he suspected had favour with Barnevelt's Faction.

The success of this sudden expedition gave such Authority to the Prince, that being returned in Martial manner, he seized Barnevelt, Grotius, Hogenbert, and other confederates at the Hague, and committed them to Prison, upon pretence of Treason. His Power with the Army, and Interest with the States, might do this and more.

Not long after Lydenburgh, Governour of Utrecht imprisoned, stabs himself to the Death with his Trencher-knife; being assured that no innocency would prevail against force and malice; yet Hogenbert and Grotius, had sentence of miserable mercy, and perpetual imprisonment; the last of them got loose, being conveyed out in a Chest, which his beloved Wife plotted for his escape.

Barnevelt had Friends with the State, and a strong Faction with the People; and though his Sentence pronounced him to the Scaffold, yet it lasted a long dispute, ere they brought him to the Block, which was not effected till May the Fac. 16. next year; his Sentence indeed made his Crimes Capital, as Author and Accessary of all former distempers in State, sum'd up to the height, and sufficient to hang a thousand.

The multitude of Believers begin to murmur, to appease them and prevent muteny, a National Synod was held at Dort, accompanied with sundry able Divines of several reformed Churches; King James in principal sent thither, Doctor George Carleton Bishop of Landaff, Doctor Joseph Hall then Dean of Worcester, Doctor John Davenport, Professor Revis in the University of Cambridge, and Master of Queens Colledge there; Doctor Samuel Ward, Regent of Sidney Colledge in Cambridge, and Doctor Bialcunquala Scotch-man, (in particular to give honour to that Nation) but in Truth, and in esteem they are all of them, (and so other foreign Divines of this Assembly) men of incomparable Learning in the Mystery of Religion; but where appeared no opponents, the Dispute found the less difficulty, and their conclusions for the present silenced the Pulpits.

Yet private men took pains to search the distinction, and as opinion (the rule of Conscience) binds every own; so from thence and since Arminism hath its increase; the Divines of England, not being obliged to their opinions at Dort.

For first, This Synod was Foreign and National, and therefore as a Synod could not bind us in England, unless it had been ratified, and imposed by Publick Authority here at home.

Secondly, It was not an Episcopal Synod, neither was any Bishop president of it, or Actor in it, (quatenus Episcopus) and therefore it was rather Assembly of private Divines than Ecclesiastical Synod, according to the rules of ancient Ecclesiastical Discipline.

Thirdly, Our Divines concur not absolutely in Judgment with the Netherlands in all their Synodical Conclusions.

For concerning that Article of Redemption, they write, pag. 204. De mortis Christi pretiosissimo merito, ut nec primitiva, &c.

The reverend Divines of Great Britain in these words, deliver four things.

- I. That they accord with the primitive Church touching the Articles of universal Redemption.
- II. That the promises of the Gospel ought to be proposed universally to all men.
- III. That whatsoever is offered or promised in the name of Christ, to any person in the Church, is truly intended by God to be given unto them, in such sort as his Word and Promises do outwardly sound.
- IV. It is consequent upon the former, that the Work of Redemption in respect of Christ his oblation and intention therein, is common to all mankind, although many by reason of their impediments do not actually receive them.

Now this resolution of our Divines accordeth with the Articles and Doctrine of the Church of England; but none of the Foreign Divines of that Synod were of the same Opinion, for they restrain the Redemption of Christ, both in application and Gods intentional offer meerly and only to the Elect.

the Synod of Dort, as appeareth in the Book of the Synod, pag. 329. But the 30, 31 and 32. Articles of this Confession teach, That the Presbyterian Discipline is of Divine Institution, and that all Ministers have equal Authority and Jurisdiction, and consequently condemn Episcopal Government, and the Ecclesiastical Polity of our, and all other Churches, which embrace not Calvin's Platform of Lay-Elders.

The ancient Custom of Convocating Synods, or Meeting of Divines, for composing Differences in Religion, and Reformation of corrupted Discipline, was from the very four Apostles Meeting at Jerusalem, concerning the Gentiles observing Moses's Laws; and from that example in a Province or City, the Primitive Bishops Assembled at several times for 200 years then following.

The Peace and Unity of the Church in Constantine's time, gave ease for many Churches to communicate over the whole Empire; and was called in his time the Holy Synod; & not long after, the General and Oecumenical Council, though the Empire was divided into Eastern and Western; and afterwards amongst the Grecians, from the Assembly of the five Patriarchs, and in those Kingdoms from the Unity of States obedient to the Pope in Ecclesiastical Causes, which till the fifteenth Century of years, so continued quiet, unless in that of John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, from the Doctrines of John Wickliff in England.

In the Time of Richard the Second, King of England, who Married Anne the Daughter of Wenceslaus King of Boheme, and though he had no Issue by her, yet the Conversion of Boheme from Popery, may not unfitly be stiled the Issue of her Marriage; for they that brought her hither, carried over Wickliffes Works, Anno 1382. to John and Jerome; so then England was Grandfather of Reformation, Boheme the Father, and Germany the Son; their Doctrines were against the Popes Supremacy, as Antichrist; they condemned Transubstantiation; he Translated the Bible into English, and was Buried in Leicester-shire; the first man that suffered the Fire of English Martyrdom, at forty five years of Age.

About the Year 1500. appeared the first occasion amongst the Waldenses near the Alpes, in some Cantons called Picards; but both of them then rather despised than feared; their Disciples were called Sub utraque, receiving the Sacraments with the Cup, and with the Bread against the Papists; but their Opinion of long time was rather amongst themselves, than communicable.

In 1517. began Martin Luther, an Hermite Frier in Saxony, that Covent being usually employed to Publish the Popes Indulgences; he spoke against the excessive Abuse of the Pardons, in Ninety five Conclusions, at Wittenburgh, which John Thekel a Dominican opposed in others, at Frankford; in Brandenburg, by Ecchius also, and Prierius.

And also Controversie increasing in Matter of greater importance, they were fain to strengthen their weak Arguments with the Popes Authority, as being the chiefest in the Church, and not able to err.

Martin proves him inferiour to a General Council, which he craves, as most needful; whereupon he was cited to Rome the next year; but in favour remitted to Examination of the Popes Legate, Cardinal Cajetan, at Ausburgh in Germany; who could not convince him; and in such Policy, back'd by some Princes, he appealed from the Popes Bull to a General Council.

The same Occasion of Indulgences collected at Zurich provoked Zuinglius a Canon, to oppose Samson a Franciscan, who Preached for their Pardons.

These Reformers and their Writings were Examined and Condemned by the Universities of Lovain and Cullen; and the more opposing, the more increasing; the Pope remitted the Dispute unto some Cardinals, Prelates, Divines and Canonists; and their Books were condemned, and burnt; and the Popes Bull resolving it, the Effect followed first at Lovain and Cullen.

Luther and his Scholars did the like by the Popes Bull and Decretals at Wittenburg, and justified it by a long Manifest to all the World; and this caused a Diet at Worms, which examined him; and his Answer moved the Elector and others to favour his Doctrine; but was Condemned as notorious Heretical by Imperial Edict; and by example, so did the University of Paris.

Henry the Eight, King of England, born a Second Brother, and therefore bred a Scholar, designed for the Archbishop's See of Canterbury, writes a Book against Luther, and had his Reward and Title of Defensor Fidei; though upon consideration (the Papists say it) of Lust and Policy, turn'd Reformer also.

The like Dispute and Measure had the Doctrines of Zuinglius and the rest; and so these Differences increasing, did necessitate another Diet at Norembergh; where Disputes against the Reformers, increased Complaints against the Courtiers of Rome, and were reduced into Centum Gravamina, and at the Diet at Spire as many more.

The horrid Plots between the Princes and the Popes, and general Distraction of Germany, and other parts of Christendom, and by the Seeds of the Reformed Religion. At last, to amend all, or make it worse, the Pope was forced to consent to call a General Council at Trent.

The Elector of Saxony, and five Princes more opposing the Emperors Decrees, and fourteen principal Cities adhering, they protesting against it by Manifest, were now first called Protestants, as from the Reformed Doctrine of Luther, and the rest with him.

At the Diet at Ausburgh, the Protestant Princes, fifteen, and thirty Cities, prefer their Confession of Faith of Luther, called from the Place, Augustan; the Cities also of Zuinglius Doctrine, Presented their Creed, differing only in the Eucharist; and at home were opposed by their Neighbour-Roman Cities, and quarrelled it by War; wherein Zuinglius, in the Head of a Company, Sacrificed his Life; for whom Oecolampadius, a Minister of Basil, of the same Opinion, dies for grief: And from these of the Cantons, came the Name of Gospelers.

The horrid Troubles, Discords and Disputes amongst Christian Princes, from the Seeds of Reformed Churches, controverted by several Quarrels and Armies, and referred to several Diets, Colloquies and Meetings in Germany, it was then at last resolved of the H Oecumenical Council of Trent, (as the Roman Catholics call it) opening at Trent, in December 1545, in the time of Pope Paul the Anno Third, Charles the Fifth, then Emperor, Henry 1618, the Eight King of England, and Francis the First, of France, and ended Anno 1563. Eight Bishops of Rome lived and died during that Treaty of eighteen years.

Our Countreyman Cimpian, that Apostate, writes to the Universities, in that Councils Comendations.

'The Synod of Trent (saith he) the older it waxeth, the more it will flourish. Good God! what variety of Nations, what choice of Bishops of the whole World, what Splendor of Kings and Commonwealths, what Marrow of Theologies, what Sanctity, what Weepings, what Academical Flowers, what Languages, what Subtilties, what infinite Readings, what Riches of Virtues and Studies did fill up that Majestical Sacred Place! And the like.

Paolo

And so they amused the After-Age with a counterfeit Value of that Council, until that an Italian compiled a Work of the particular and ordinary Acts of that Council, wherein their Practices to maintain the power of the Court of Rome, and to hinder the Reformation of that See is plainly expressed: An excellent Work, written in the time of King James, and Translated then into English, 1618; if there were no deceit in the Writer (as I have heard it pretended) as that underhand he was a Protestant, and so partial; which yet is not very probable.

At this time was that able Minister the Count Gondamer Lieger Ambassador for the King of Spain in England; and after that it pleased God to bereave King James of the Hopes of Great Britain, Prince Henry, his Eldest Son, he was, as a good Father ought to be, very attent upon a fit Match for his Son Prince Charles, and Heir of his Crowns; a most Virtuous and Accomplish'd Prince as any then Europe had. There had been some Overtures before, in the Life-time of Prince Henry, of a Match with Spain; but that proving abortive for want of Sincerity on the Spaniards part, the Duke of Lerma makes another Offer to Sir John Digby, then Resident in Spain, for a Marriage with Prince Charles; which, as is well known, failed afterward on the account of the Spaniards unhandsome dealing in that Matter; they still treading in the same dilatory and trifling way with King James, though he very fairly and uprightly Treated with them, yet they had Designs on that King, which they never were able to accomplish; such were, to procure such Favours for the Papists here, as were inconsistent with the King's Laws and the safety of his Kingdoms, as shall more particularly hereafter be made appear in the Sequel of this History. I very well know that unhandsome Reflections have been made upon that Prince, not only by Sir Anthony Welden, but a later Author; 'That this King affecting the Name of a King of Peace, and Peace-maker, as his chief Glory, had designed, what in him lay, the settling of a General Peace in Europe, and the reconciling of all Parties; and professed, that if the Papists would leave their King-killing, and some other grosser Errors, he was willing to meet them half-way. Moreover, he was ever zealous for the Honour and Height of Regal Majesty, and to maintain the Glory of it in his Successors; 'twas his chief desire and care to match his Son with some Prince of some most high Descent, though of a different Religion. Fac. 16.

Though God be thanked for it, this great King lived and died a sincere Christian and Protestant, as 'tis well known to the World; But the latter of these Authors had a Design in that his Work before-mentioned, though he pretends only to give an account of matter of Fact; yet, as any wary Reader will observe by the Thread that runs through his whole work, that he was very partial and warped in his whole work, as I hope to make to appear to the world upon occasion, in my Travels through the Annals of His and His Successors Reigns, so far as our Intendment lies.

King James his Advice to his Ambassador was, That he should, if possibly he could, sound the Inclinations of the Spaniard in the matter, and give him an Account of it; which he did, by advising the King to be cautious herein, lest it prove a meer Device of the Court of Spain, on purpose by them set on foot to defeat the Treaty with France, which at that time was in hand, in order to a Marriage with that Crown also.

Gondamer manages the Treaty on the part of Spain, but with Caution and Reservation, and I may add Insincerity also: he was a person very acceptable to King James, on the account of his facetious way of Address, which was very grateful to our King's Humour; but never as yet as the Historical Collection saith, prevailed mightily upon him any ways to do any thing disadvantageous to his real Interest and Estate; for that Author doth very unhandfomly reflect on the Prudence and Discretion, as well as Sincerity in his Religion, as before of his Prince, in representing him either less a Protestant or a Statesman than he really was; as if (forsooth) the Cunning of Gondamer was able to work any thing upon King James, either to the disadvantage of the Established Religion in England, or the King's real Interest in Affairs there; for though the Event were otherwise, yet Sir John Digby's Assurances from the Court of Spain, and other concurrent Motives were so fair, and seemed so reasonable that the Articles afterwards so qualified, and sent over to England were here under Debate, and were brought to that Issue, that the King thought fit to acquaint a select Number of his Council therewith; who having heard the Report of the former proceeding, delivered their Opinion, That they found very probable ground for him to enter into a publick Treaty, with as much assurance of good success as in such a case might be expected. Whereupon Sir John Digby, by Commission under the Great Seal, was authorized to treat and conclude the Marriage; and because the matter of Religion was in chief debate, those qualified Articles that were brought out of Spain, were sent back, Signed with the King's Hand; who added something to them by way of clearer explanation: They were to this effect:

That the Popes Dispensation be first obtained by the meer Act of the King of Spain.

That the Children of this Marriage be not constrained in matter of Religion, nor their Title prejudiced in case they prove Catholics.

That the Infanta's Family, being Strangers, may be Catholics, and shall have a decent place appointed for Divine Service, according to the use of the Church of Rome; and the Ecclesiasticks and Religion

 Anno 1618. That the Marriage shall be Celebrated in Spain by a Procurator, according to the Instructions of the Council of Trent; and after the Infanta's arrival in England, such a Solemnization shall be used, as may make the Marriage valid, according to the Laws of this Kingdom.

That she shall have a competent number of Chaplains, and a Confessor, being Strangers; one whereof shall have power to govern the Family in Religious matters.

In the allowing of these Articles, the King thus express'd himself:

Seeing this Marriage is to be with a Lady of a different Religion from Us, it becometh Us to be tender, as on one part, to give them all satisfaction convenient; so on the other, to admit nothing that may blemish Our Conscience, or detract from the Religion here established.

The Articles which afterwards were agreed upon for the French Match, which afterwards succeeded, and with which the Parliament, as shall afterwards be made appear, were so well pleased with, were for substance the same; but the Historical Collection takes no notice of this, but goes on in his accustomed way with his Tragical affrightments and mormo's.

The people of England having yet in memory the intended Cruelty of 88, and hating the Popish Religion, generally loathed this Match, and would have bought it off at the dearest rate; and what they durst, opposed it by Speeches, Counsels, Wishes, Prayers; but if any one spake louder than his Fellows, he was soon put to silence, disgrac'd, and cross'd in Court-preferments; whereas in Spain and Flanders, Books were penn'd, and Pictures Printed, to disgrace the King and State; for which the English Ambassadors sought satisfaction, but in vain. The Roman Catholics desired the Match above measure, hoping for a moderation of Fines and Laws, perhaps a Toleration; yea, a total Restauration of their Religion; for they gained more and more Indulgence by the long-pun Treaty: The Articles of Religion were long hammered upon the Spanish Anvil, enlarged and multiplied by new Demands without end.

True it is, as is well known in all Treaties of this nature, that the Papists ever endeavoured to get themselves some ease from our Laws, and the same they endeavoured afterwards, after the Match with France, with which the whole Kingdom was so well pleased; yet what they gained hereby, the Collection doth not tell us; neither indeed was it any thing more than the Release out of Prison of some of their Priests, and not things of so high a nature as those which the Collector, most partially, I had almost said invidiously there mentioneth:

That the Wall of this Island, the English Navy, once the strongest of all Christendom, now lies at Road unarmed, and fit for Ruine; Gondomar [as was the common voice] bearing the King in hand, that the furnishing of it would breed Suspicion in the King his Master, and avert his mind from this Alliance: Moreover the Town of Flushing, the Castle of Ramakins in Zealand, 2nd Brill in Holland, which were held by way of Caution from the United Provinces, to insure their dependency upon England, the King resolved to render up, as being merely Cautionary, and none of his propriety: He rid his hands of those Places, to prevent Requests and Propositions from the King of Spain, who claimed Propriety in them, and Gondomar put hard for them, being accounted the Keys of the Low Countreys: Such was the Kings care and contrivance to keep Faith with those Confederates, and not offend Spain; and to render this a politick Action, it was urged, That the advantage of those Holds was countervail'd by the vast Expence in keeping them. Howbeit, the power of the English Interest in that State was by this means cut off and taken away; and the Alienation between King James and the United Provinces, which appeared in latter times, and was nourished by Bernevelt, the Head of the Arminian Faction, and a Pensioner of Spain, is now increased by the discovery and observation of these late Spanish Compliances.

And here again I must appeal to the Fidelity and Ingenuity of that Collector, whether these things which he gives in as the Consequences of this proposed Match were matters of Fact and History, which he pretends were the only Matters he proposed to entreat of, or whether they were not, as the Reader will see, the designed Warping of the Collector. Some of these things he mentioneth, we must confess, did afterwards happen; but here Gondomar must be the Robin-Good-Fellow, and the Spanish Match the Natural Cause of the afore-mentioned Effects. But this his Paralogism amounts herein to no more than this, Socrate ambulante coruscavit.

In the next place, saith the Collector, 'The Conde Gondomar, an active subtil Instrument, to serve his Masters ends, neglected no occasion tending thereunto, which he mainly shewed in the Particular of Sir Walter Rawleigh, wherein he put forth all his strength to destroy him, being one of the last Sea-Commanders then living; bred under Queen Elizabeth, and by her flesh'd in Spanish Blood and Ruine. He did first underwork his Voyage to Guienna, which seemed to threaten loss and danger to the spreading power of Spain in the West-Indies; and after his Return with misfortune, he pursued him to death. In the beginning of the Kings Reign, this Gentleman, with others was Arraigned and Condemned for Treason; 'twas a dark kind of Treason, and the Vail is still upon it. The King had ground enough to shew Mercy; which some of that condemned party obtained. After many years Imprisonment, Sir Walter Rawleigh, desirous of Liberty and Action, propounded an American Voyage, upon the assurance of gaining a Mine of Gold in Guienna. The King hearkened to him, and gave him power to set forth Ships and Men for that Service; but commanded him upon his Allegiance, to give under his hand the Number of his Men, the Burden and Strength of his Ships, together with the Countrey and River which he was to enter. All this was done, and came so timely (saith the Collector) p. 5. as if the King had been a party in the Contrivance, to Gondomar's knowledge, that Advertisement was sent to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before this English Fleet departed out of the Thames, The Action proved unfortunate, and the Mine was inaccessible; the Spaniards at St. Thomas opposed their Passage up the River; and this engaged them to assault the Town, which they took, sacked and burnt. Gondomar hereat incensed, with Gondomar contrives the death of Sir W. Rawlei b. an enemy of Spain.

Anno 1618. with a violent importunity demanded the reparation of this wrong; and the Spanish Faction urged, that this irruption might make a Breach both of the Match and Peace with Spain. The Kings fears kindled his wrath; he disavowed the action; and to prevent the like for the future, put forth a severe Proclamation. Hereupon the Storm of Passion ceased, and Raleigh knowing nothing, but that he might appear in England with safety, put in at Plymouth, and was no sooner Landed, but by secret intimation, understanding his danger, sought to escape beyond Sea, but was taken in the Attempt, brought to London, and recommitted to the Tower; and at length his Life was offered up a Sacrifice for Spain; but not upon such Grounds as the Ambassador had designed; for he desired a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this occasion he might sily gain from the English an acknowledgment of his Masters Right in those Places, and hereafter both stop their Mouths, and quench their heat and valour. But the late Voyage was not brought in question, only his former Condemnation was revived; his Arraignment at Winchester many years before was now laid open, and he at the Kings Bench demanded, Why Execution should not be done upon him according to the Sentence therein pronounced? Raleigh answered, That the Kings late Commission gave him a new Life and Vigour; for he that hath power over the Lives of others, ought to be the Master of his own. This Plea was not accepted, but the former Judgment took place; and accordingly he lost his Head upon a Scaffold erected in the Old Palace at Westminster.

The Truth is, Sir Walter had been an old Servant of Queen Elizabeth, and had had some particular Differences with some Servants that came from Scotland with King James, and was not pleased with the Times on that Account, and was somewhat male-content.

While Spain and England were thus closing, the Fire brake out in Germany between the States and Princes Protestant, and the House of Austria: These Commotions involved and drew along the Affairs of most Christian Princes especially of the two Potent Kings now in Treaty. The Catholick Cause, and the Lot of the House of Austria, engaged the King of Spain, who was the strongest Branch of that Stock. King James must needs be drawn in, both by common and particular Interest; the Religion which he professed, and the State of his Son-in-Law, the Elector Palatine, who became the principal part in those Wars, and the most unfortunate.

The Clouds gather thick in the German Sky; Jealousies and Discontents arise between the Catholicks and the Evangelicks or Lutherans of the Confession of Ausburg. Both Parties draw into Confederacies, and hold Assemblies; the one seeking by the advantage of Power to encroach and get ground, the other to stand the ground, and hold their own. The potency of the House of Austria became formidable. The old Emperor Matthias declared his Cousin German, the Arch-Duke Ferdinand, to be his adopted Son and Successor, and caused him to be chosen and Crowned King of Bohemia and Hungary; yet reserving to himself the sole exercise of Kingly power during his Life.

The Jesuites Triumph in their Hopes of King

Ferdinand; the Pope exhorted the Catholicks to keep a Day of Jubilee, and to implore aid of God for the Churches high occasions. To answer this Festival, the Elector of Saxony called to mind, that it was then the Hundredth year compleat since Martin Luther opposed the Popes Indulgences, which was the first beginning of Protestant Reformation. Whereupon he Ordained a Solemn Feast of three Days for Thanksgiving and for Prayer to God, to maintain in peace the purity of the Word, and the right Administration of the Sacraments. The Professors of the Universities of Lipsick and Wittemberg, the Imperial Towns of Frankford, Worms, and Noremburg; yea, the Calvinists also observed the same Days of Jubilee against the Romish Church; and much Gold and Silver was cast abroad in memory of Luther, whom they called Blessed.

In these times the Emperour wrote Letters, both to the Elector Palatine, and to the Protestant Provinces, and States of the Empire, then Assembled at Hailbrun, advising them to acquiesce in what was done touching the Designation of his Adopted Son to the Empire, to observe the Golden Bull (the Magna Charta of the Empire) and the Matter of it concerning the Electoral Bonds, and to dissolve their League. The Protestants in their Answer, acknowledged the good will of the Emperour their Chief, and shewed, That the Catholicks had oppressed them, contrary to the Pacification; and having sought Redress in vain, they were compelled to use means of preserving Publick Tranquility, according to the Laws. That their League and Union, consisting only of Protestant Germans, was a known practice in the Empire, and not against the Golden Bull, and tended not to a separation from his Imperial Majesty; but the Catholicks made their League with Strangers, and declared a Stranger Chief over them, was objected as irregular by the other Party.

The Count of Thurne, and other Defenders Evangelick, with the Estates of Bohemia, Assembled at Prague, to advise of Publick safety, and conservation of Privileges. The Emperour required his Council held at the Castle of Prague, to oppose and hinder this Assembly, which he said was called to raise Sedition, and to plot against his Person and Government. Nevertheless, in all their Publick Worship, the Evangelicks prayed to God to confound the Emperours Enemies, and to grant him long to Live and Reign over them in Peace and Justice; but this in pretence of what after appeared.

The Bohemian Troubles took their first Rise, as the Evangelicks said, from the Breach of the Edict of Peace concerning Religion, and the Accord made by the Emperor Rodolph, whereby the Protestants retained the free Exercise of their Religion, enjoyed their Temples, Colledges, Tithes, Patrimonies, Places of Burial, and the like; and had liberty to build new Temples, and power to chuse Defenders to secure those Rights, and to Regulate what should be of Service in their Churches. Now the stop of Building certain Churches on Lands within the Lordships of the Catholick Clergy, (in which places the Evangelicks conceived a Right to Build) was the special grievance and cause of Breach, as they pretended.

On the Twenty third of May, the Chief of the Evangelicks went Armed into the Castle of Prague, entred into the Council-Chamber, and opened

fontius*, one of the Council, and Fabritius the Secretary, from an high Window into the Castle Ditch; others of the Council temporising in this Tumult, and seeming to accord with their demands, were peaceably conducted to their own houses. Hereupon the Assembly took advice to settle the Town and Castle of Prague with new Guards; likewise to appease the people, and to take an Oath of Fidelity, they chose Directors, Governors, and Counsellors Provincial to govern affairs of State, and to consult of raising Forces against the enemies of God and the King, and the Edicts of his Imperial Majesty. They banished the Jesuits throughout all Bohemia: Moreover, to defend their own cause, and to give an account of their late proceedings, and present posture, a Declaration was drawn up, and sent, with Letters, to the Estates of Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, and to all the Princes and States, their Allies, throughout the Empire, with request of aid in case of need. They declare to this effect.

Bohemians put forth a Declaration.

That they had indured infinite Injuries and Afflictions, by certain Officers, Ecclesiastick and Civil, and by the Jesuits above all others, who sought to bring them under the yoke of Popery, rebuked them with the names of Hereticks, heaved them out of places of Dignity, provoked the Magistrates to pursue them with Fire and Sword: That their Ministers were banished, and their Charges given to Roman Catholics. The Senators of Prague, who were Evangelicks, were evil intreated, and divers persons persecuted for Religion, under pretence of Civil offences. And whereas in case of difference touching the Agreement and Edict of Peace, the Estates of both Parties were to hear and judge; their Enemies procured Commands from the Emperor to bear them down before a due hearing: Their lawful Meetings to advise and seek redress, were declared to be manifest Sedition and Rebellion, and themselves threatened with loss of Estates and Lives.

The Emperor dissatisfied with the Declaration.

This Declaration they sent likewise to the Emperor, with a submissive Letter, asserting their own Fidelity, and praying for the removal of those evil Counsellors, that threaten so much danger to his Majesty, and his Kingdoms. This very usual in attempts of this nature. The Emperor herewith was no way pacified, but charged them with an evil design, required them to lay down Arms, and to make no more Levies, but to live in peace as becometh faithful Subjects: Upon which terms he promised to disband his own Souldiers, to forgive what was past, and to protect all that will obey him.

He publishes a Manifesto.

This prevailed nothing, but the breach grows wider. The Emperor published a Manifesto in Answer to the Apology of the Bohemian States, and wrote Letters to the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, with high Aggravations of the violence offered at Prague to his principal officers, against Divine and Humane Rights, the Constitutions of the Kingdom, and the Customs of all Nations, without hearing, without summoning, without any form of Process; yea, without giving a moment of time to Repent, or make Confession, or receive the Sacrament, which is never denied to the worst offenders. Fac. 16. This they had done to Slabata and Smefontius, as before.

Forthwith a pernicious War, and all confusion breaks out. The Emperor raised Forces under the conduct of divers Commanders, of whom the chief were Count de Buquoy, and Count d'Amptere. The Evangelicks raise two Armies under Count de Thurne, and Count Mansfelt. Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, with all the Estates Protestant, Germans, and Neighbours of Bohemia, (very few excepted) assist the Evangelicks with Counsel, Men and Money: likewise the Prince of Orange, and the States of the United Provinces, promised to aid them with their Forces. The Electors and Princes Protestant favouring the Bohemians, whose Countrey the Imperialists destroy with Fire and Sword, perswade the Emperor to stop the rage of Civil War, (so they call'd it,) the success whereof is doubtful, and the end ever miserable. The Emperor propounded an Arbitration of these differences by the Elector of Mentz, and the Duke of Bavaria, Princes Catholics; and by the Electors Palatine and of Saxony, Princes Protestants; and Pilsen should be the place of Treaty: The Evangelicks consent to the Arbitration, but dislike the place, where the people were wholly Catholics, and followed the Emperors Party; besides, the Directors had designed the besieging of it. New actions of War made the overtures of Peace more difficult: Several Armies were now raising throughout Bohemia, and the neighbouring Provinces: As yet the Elector of Saxony stood Neutral; the Duke of Bavaria cast in his lot with the Emperor, whose Estate was then every where embroiled.

Amidst these distractions, the House of Austria made no small improvement of their interest in the King of Great Britain, who in the hot pursuit of the Spanish Match, was earnest to oblige them. And the Spaniards made shew, that on their part, nothing under Heaven was more desired, than this Alliance; and in their Discourses magnified the King, Queen, and Prince of England. For the state of their Affairs did press them hard, if not to close really, yet at least to fain a pressing towards it. For the French administr'd cause of discontent; the Truce with the United Provinces was near expiring; but above all, they took to heart the Bohemian War, and resolv'd to set the main stock upon it: Wherefore the King of Spain gave commandment, that his Treasure should be gathered together for the Infanta's vast Portion, being no less than Two Millions, and gave hopes of payment of half a Million beforehand, as was desired, and with himself all dispatches seemed to pass freely. But his Ministers, say some, (particularly the Collector, but gives his Reader no satisfaction in the proof of what he wrote, only gives the World an account of a Letter wrote, as he saith, from a great Minister of State to Mr. Corsington, his Majesties then Agent in Spain, which, for clearer satisfaction, you have here at large) were suspected either not to intend it at all, or not so soon as was pretended.

Good Mr. Corsington, I doubt not, but that before these come to your hands, you will have heard of the receipt of all your former Letters: These are in answer of your last of the Eighth of October, wherein you advertise of the arrival of the Conde Gondomar at Lerma, and of his

Both Parties Aim.

K. James engages not in these troubles, flattering himself with the Spaniards seeming forwardness to effect the Match.

Anno 1618. his entertainment by that Duke. It seemeth unto us here in England, that he hath gone but very slowly in his journey; and divers (seeing how long time he hath spent in the way) do make conjecture, That it proceedeth from the small affection that he judgeth to be there, towards the effecting of the main business; saying, If the Ambassador were assured, that his Master did so really desire the speedy effecting thereof, as is pretended, he would have made more haste homeward; and that it hath not been sincerely intended, but meerly used by that State as an amuzement to entertain and busie his Majesty withal, and for the gaining of time for their own ends: and this is muttered here by very many, but, I hope, we shall, ere long, receive such an account from thence of their proceedings, as will give sufficient satisfaction. For my own part, I must confess, I am not yet well perswaded of their intentions; for, if there be either Honor, Religion, or moral Honesty in them, the Protestations and Professions which I have so often heard them make, and you likewise daily advertise hither, are sufficient to perswade a man, that will not judge them worse than Infidels, to expect sincere dealing in the business; and whensoever I shall perceive that they go about to do otherwise, I must confess my self to have been deceived, as I shall ever be on the like terms, while I deal with inmost care; but withal, I shall judge them the most unworthy and perfidious people of the World, and the more, for that his Majesty hath given them so many testimonies of his sincere intentions toward them, which he daily continueth, as now of late, by the causing Sir Walter Rawleigh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them satisfaction: whereof his Majesty commanded me to advertise you, and concerning whom, you shall by the next receive a Declaration, shewing the Motives which induced his Majesty to recal his mercy, through which he had lived this many years a condemned man. In the mean time, I think it fit, that to the Duke of Lerma, the Confessor, and the Secretary of State, you do represent his Majesties real manner of proceeding with that King and State; and how for the advancing of the great business, he hath endeavoured to satisfy them in all things, letting them see how in many actions of late, of that nature, his Majesty hath strained upon the affections of his People, and especially in this last concerning Sir Walter Rawleigh, who died with a great deal of courage and constancy; and at his death moved the common sort of people to much remorse, who all attributed his death to the desire his Majesty had to satisfy Spain.

Further, you may let them know how able a man Sir Walter Rawleigh was to have done his Majesty service, if he should have been pleased to employ him; yet to give them content, he hath not spared him, when by preserving him, he might have given great satisfaction to his Subjects, and had, at command, upon all occasions, as useful a Man, as served any Prince in Christendom: And on the contrary, the King of Spain is not pleased to do any thing, which may be so inconvenient unto him, as to lessen the affections of his people, or to procure so much as murmuring or distraction amongst them: And therefore it is to be expected, that, on his part, they answer his Majesty, at least with sincere and real proceeding, since that is all they are put to, the difficulties and hazards being indeed on his

Majesties side. And truly, I should think it fit, that not by way of commination, but, as it were, out of zeal to the Peace and Amity betwixt these two Crowns, you did intimate to the Duke and the other Ministers, how impossible you held it to have peace long continued betwixt their Majesties; if in this business, wherein so much hath been professed, there should be found any indirectness. But herein you must be cautious and temperate; for as on the one side, you and I well know, that this stile most perswades with them, so on the other side, the decency and buen termino that is to be observed betwixt great Princes, will hardly admit of Threats or Revenge for a wooing Language. But this, I know, falleth into so discreet a hand, that I little fear the handsom carriage of it. And I hope, that before these Letters arrive with you, we shall hear from you, in such a stile, that this advice of mine shall be of no use. I pray you be very earnest with the Conde Gondomar, that he will not forget to negotiate the liberty of Mr. Mole, for whom, I hope, (now my Lord Rosse is dead) for that which you and I know, it will not be so difficult to prevail. You may put him in mind, how when Father Baldwill's liberty was granted unto him, although he could not absolutely promise Mr. Mole's release, yet he then faithfully protested, he would use the mediation of the Duke of Lerma, and of the Kings Confessor, and of that King, if need were; and that he would try the best friends he had for the procurement of his enlargement, wherein you may desire him to deal effectually, for that there is great expectance that he should proceed honourably and really therein. I myself likewise will use all the means I can for his relief; for it is a thing which is very much desired here, and would give a great deal of satisfaction.

As touching Osulivare, it is very fit that you let them know, that the report of the honour they did him, hath come unto his Majesties ears, and that although they will alledge, that in the time of Hostility betwixt England and Spain, it may be he did them many services, and may then have deserved well at their hands, for which they have just cause to reward him; yet since by his Majesties happy coming to these Crowns, those differences have had an end, and that there is a perfect League and Amity betwixt them, his Majesty cannot chuse but dislike, that they should bestow upon him any Title or Dignity, which only or properly belongeth unto him towards his own Subjects; that therefore he would be glad that they would forbear to confer any such Titulary Honours upon any of his Subjects without his privity. This you shall do well to insist upon, so that they may understand that his Majesty is very sensible, that they should endeavour to make the Irish have any kind of dependance on that State.

I would desire the Reader to take notice that the forgoing Letter, as to its value and reputation must rest solely upon the Credit of the Collector Mr. Rushworth.

Queen Anne died this year at Hampton-Court, Nov. 17. and was thence brought to her Palace at Denmark-house in the Strand. The common people, who were great admirers of Princes, were of opinion, that the Blazing-Star rather betokened the death of that Queen, than that cruel and bloody War,

War, which shortly after hapned in Bohemia, and other parts of Germany; but indeed and in truth whether of one or the other, or perhaps and more probably of neither, is left to others to judge.

The Kingdom of Bohemia for many hundred of years past was Elective, which may be proved from their Chronicles, from many Bulls of the Emperors, and from diverse other Examples and Antiquities. Many practises had been used to hinder the free Election, but never managed with more wiles than now.

Ferdinands undue practices to be King

Matthias the Emperor two years before, had adopted Ferdinand his Uncles Son his Successour, but not to meddle with Sovereignty of a King, whilst Matthias lived: however, Ferdinand thus far set forward: himself makes way to the Dignity of Boheme, and to prevent discovery from the incorporate Confederate Provinces, who have Voices in the Election, he calls a Parliament forthwith, only of the States of Boheme, with expresse denunciation, that in the Assembly, nothing should be consulted, but the choice of a new King. The Electoral Provinces, nor their Deputies, nor Ambassadors, not being present, the Assembly was not legal.

The best of the States of Boheme therefore refuse to appear; against whom was denounced such threats, as frightened them with hazard of their Heads, and so was procured a pretended Election, (for the present) and his Coronation assented, by the main party, Catholicks.

The Crowning Kings in the life of another, was of late a sure policy, to unite those Kingdoms in the Austrian Family, contrary to the ancient custom of free Elections, which now, neither State durst oppose.

To this end therefore; and to suppress all future free Elections, (the Palladium of the Kingdom) Ferdinand secretly compacts with the King of Spain, without consent of the States, and before his Election, or pretence to any interest.

That the King of Spain, his Posterity, and Heirs, for want of Issue male of his Father's Austrian Line, should succeed him in that Kingdom, contrary to the established Rules of Politicians, (that no elected King hath power to alienate, without consent of the States) this succession exposed them to the loss of all, and Religion also, and enabled him to enfeeble strangers into each Province, and into the inheritances of those Royally descended, high-born, illustrious Families; and by which, as was then suspected (and since came to pass) he should easily seize the Dignity of the Crown Imperial, and so abolish the foundation of the Golden Ball and Form of Empire.

This while, the aged Emperor keeps Court at Vienna, King Ferdinand at Gres in Stiria: the Government of Boheme continues in such Counsellors as Matthias left there, chosen Ministers Catholick, who with the Archbishop of Prague endeavor to suppress the Protestants.

Protestant Prin-

redress.

The States Protestants assemble themselves to redress these injuries, backt with some Forces which they brought with them, and were opposed by the Emperor's Faction, whom they overmastered and flung his Chief Justice Slabata, his Secretary Fabritius, and others out of a Window of the Castle, down into the Court; and being done in choler, excused by Apology to the Emperor.

But on they go, raise force, and banish the Jesuits, and others of that Faction, whom they load with Complaints.

The Emperor as forward, commits the command of two Armies unto Count Buquoy and Dampiere. Fac. 18.

The Protestants counter-force with two Bodies, severally under the Prince of Anholt, and under Count Thorn and Mansfelt, skirmishing with different effects. Emperor in arms also

Some Princes, King James and others, interpose Mediations: and Ferdinand complains of the Bohemians obstinacy.

They remonstrate former undue Elections, and allege:

That between a conditional King and his Subjects, there are reciprocal obligations; the one Obedientia, the other Promissa. Their grievances.

That he received the Scepter of the States, with thankful remuneration, and Royal grace to all; to satisfy the desire of every one, and to deserve their love, and swears not to meddle with Government whilst Matthias lives.

Notwithstanding he maintains the Wars of others, against the Bohemians, Moravians, and Silesians, and raised Terra Maria, against the Bohemians, sent for his own Army out of Sterea, and pronounced the Protestant States of Boheme Traitors and Rebels, and declared himself Enemy to them all.

That he banished the old President Cesal, directs all Councils, corrects the Decisions and Decrees Imperial, disposes the actions of Buquoy, as King and Lord of all, and disinclines all means of Peace with Ambassadors of all Provinces, who met at Prague, carefully consulting to recover Peace.

That conditional elective Kings receive their Royal Authority upon Oaths, their Sovereign power, Ex pacto, non ex jure: from the Subjects by concessions upon Covenant; not by Succession nor descent, as other Kings, who are so before they swear to their Subjects, and do swear because they are Kings, but are not Kings because they swear, the one born a Prince without his Subjects, the other made and given to be a King. Kings Election and Succession distinguished.

The Oath of Elective Kings is, Et si (quod absit) in aliquibus Juramentum meum violavero, Nullam mihi incola Regni, omniumque dominorum uniuscujusque gentis, obedientiam prestare debebunt.

And the Chancellor usually tells them.

Quandoquidem viderunt Ordines, Majestatem regiam pactis conventis stare nolle, non debere, ait, ipsius Majestatem in malam partem interpretari, si Ordines obedientiam ipsius Majestati renuncient.

These things thus a doing, the old Emperor Matthias dies, and Ferdinand now King of Hungary and Boheme, and adopted Heir of the Empire, meets at Frankford (by Summons) with the three Electors, Mentz, Collen, and Trevours; the other three Silesia, Moravia, and Lusatia, failing in their persons, sent their Representatives only, and so the Council chose him King of the Romans, which the State of Bohemia disclaim, and of his being Elector as King of Bohemia, he never actually possessing the Crown. Their dissensions could not lessen his Election to the Empire, yet they swore never to receive him their King. Matthias dies, Ferdinand succeeds Emperor.

King James much troubled at these interruptions of Germany took himself to be much concerned in the hazard of the Protestant party, and the peace and danger of the Reformed Church, and therefore sent Hay, Viscount Doncaster, Ambassador extraordinary to mediate with the Emperor and Bohemians; but to little purpose; The Emperor by means avoiding to receive him, K. James how concerned.

Anno 1620. knowing his errand, being to palliate what was grown too high for his Reconciliation, and removed his Guests, when Doncaster came but near him; so whilst King James hunted at New-Market; his Ambassador coursed the Hare in Germany, but his business, through the crudity and raw initiation, took not the effect.

Ferdinand fearing the Success of Engagements, insinuates with the German Princes, and had possessed the Duke of Bavaria, and others.

Palsgrave Elected King of Bohemia.

The poor Bohemians in this strait, and finding King James an Intercessor, thought it policy to bring him into the List; for having published their Declarations and Reasons, pronounced the Election of Ferdinand to be invalid and null; and the States of that Kingdom, and other Provinces, Elect by this Title, The most Gracious, and the most Mighty Prince Lord Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, and King of Bohemia.

In the mean time King James consults with his Council, diversly affected to this Design of taking or refusing. Amongst them, see what our Archbishop Abbot sends to Secretary Norton, not being able to come to Council.

Good Master Secretary,

Archbishop Abbot's Letter to Norton.

I Have never more desired to be present at any Consultation, &c. My humble advice is, That there is no going back, but a countenancing of it against all the world, with ringing of Bells, and making Bonfires in London, so soon as it shall be certain of the Coronation. I am satisfied in my Conscience, the cause is just, having rejected that proud and bloody man, making that Kingdom not Elective; and when God hath set up the Prince a Mark of Honour to all Christendom, to propagate the Gospel and protect the distressed, I dare do no other, but to follow where God leads.

It is a great Honour to our King to have such a Son to be made a King, and me thinks I do in this, and that of Hungary, foresee the Work of God; that by piece and piece the Kings of the Earth that give their Power to the Beast, shall now leave the Whore to Desolation, as St. John saies.

Our striking in will comfort the Bohemians, Honour the Palsgrave, Strengthen the Union, bring on the Dutch, stir up Denmark, and move his two Uncles, Prince of Orange and Duke of Buillon, together with Tremvile a rich Prince in France, to cast in their shares, and Hungary I hope will run the same fortune, and for money and means to support the War, Providebit Deus. This from my Bed; and when I can stand I hope to do better service.

Sept. 12. 1612.

Geo. Cant.

Some regret there was in the Palsgrave (as well might be) to act without the consent of the King of Great Britain, and whilst his Ambassadors were treating a Peace; but by perswasion of the Prince of Anholt, the Earl of Holloch, and Baron Done, with other their intimates, he was at length intreated to accept of that golden Bait, a Crown, which was given to him freely, not without some regret, though by others, such a Bit would be swallowed with damnation it self.

His Coronation.

And this was hastened upon him in Aug. 1619. and his entrance into Prague the last of October, and his Coronation four days after. But instantly posts the Baron to King James in excuse of all, either of too hasty acceptance, and neglect of his fatherly advice.

King James ever averse from such undue Precipitations, for affections of the people to be engaged at their pleasures, and to be a President to dispose of Sovereignty already established; utterly refuses Done's Address, for a time, but dispatches Ambassadors to the Emperor, and to the States of the League and Covenant, not meddling with his Son in Law to advise or neglect him.

Of this errand two are sent in joint Commission to Boheme, Sir Richard Weston (after Lord Treasurer) and Sir Edward Conway, not long after Secretary of State. Ferdinand, upon the News of his New Rival in the Kingdom, hastens this Proscription against the Palsgrave.

Embassadors sent from England to the Emperor.

We Ferdinando, &c. To all Electors, Princes, &c. But especially to the subjects of Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhene, Elector, &c.

Palsgrave proscribed.

That Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhene, hath made himself Head of that perfidious and rebellious crew of our Kingdom of Boheme, wherefore we proclaim him guilty of High Treason, and Iterate Proscription, and of all the penalties, which by Law and Custom are depending thereon. We conclude him out of Our and the Imperial peace, and are firmly resolved to execute the said penalties upon him, as against one publicly proscribed an Enemy and Adversary to us, and the Empire. Commanding you under pain of Life, not to give him Aid, Succor, Assistance, Money, Provision, Munition, openly or covertly,

And whoever is in pay, his Complices or Helpers, to forsake his service, and that the States dependant, Alliances, Subjects, and his Vassals, shall not yield to him Obedience, nor partake to him of his Crime, but to forsake him and Assist us, to reduce him, the Rebellious Frederick, to obedience. And we absolve ye his Vassals from his Protection, and from your Oath into our Grace and Favour, and whoever disobey this our Command, we declare him and them guilty of High Treason, and Iterate Proscription, so well as himself.

Given at our City Vienna, &c. 1626.

And now each Party take the field; The Duke of Savoy for the Imperial Ban, with Twenty five thousand Men reduced Lusatia. The Prince of Anholt General, and Holloch Lieutenant General for Boheme, and with these (evenly powered) the War went on in that Kingdom.

War on both sides.

And to make it famous through the Western World; Spinola forms an Army in Flanders, under Spains interest, but for that purpose, which King James suspected, and to be assured, sent to Sir Thomas Edmonds his Ambassador at Brussels, to enquire (for the truce of Spain and the Netherlands continued) but Spinola's Commission was sealed up by the Spanish subtilty, not to open till the March of the Army of Twenty thousand Foot, and Five thousand Horse, which proved fatal to the Palatinate.

Spinola raises Forces in Flanders.

The Spirit of the English began to bustle, Sir Horace Vere being here, and somewhat rusty since the Peace with Spain, associating his Nephews the Earls of Oxford and Essex (young and daring Spirits, saies one) indeed so young they apprehended no danger, and so ignorant they knew not how to avoid it. Oxford the eighteen Earl, and Lord High Chamberlain without intermission, from Ambry de Vere High Chamberlain to Henry the first, Portgrave of London, and Lord Chief Justice of England, Descended from the Earls of

So does Oxford & Essex in England. Hist. Great Britain.

Guisne

Guifure; the surname from Vere a Town in Zealand, his Son Ambry created Earl of Oxford by Anno 1620. Henry 2. and High Chamberlain.

The eighth Earl after him, was by Richard 2. created Duke of Ireland during life, and bore for that honour quarterly before his own Coat, three Crowns Or, a border Argent; his own being quarterly Gu. and Or, upon the first a Mulletary.

This man now was lately returned home from Travel in hope to recover his former debaucheries, but how improved, implicate credit was to expect the Tryal.

As for Essex then, he only buoyed up by the people, upon his Fathers score, which we have told before.

But mad they were made by Our younger Brothers to fight, and a Regiment only was raised, not I believe imagined for any goodly effects, but to bandy with the King's Wildom, who though not forward in this unjustifiable quarrel, yet not without counsel to act for the future.

How madly some men urged the Kings interest, seeming so hasty, as to do the work at their own charge? But being connived at, to try their intent, the good Earl of Essex had fifty brave fellows pinn'd upon him to pay them their pensions, besides his compleat number of his own company. These two brave Captains with the rest, raw-souldiers, adventured without fear under (indeed) the fame and fortune of that Right valourous, and truly expert man of Arms, Sir Horace Vere their Colonel, who must needs endure with patience, the toil he had to make them good Souldiers.

Their march and action in the expedition.

Convoyd by Hen. of Nassau.

Spinola had got the start, yet the English got over, ere he took leave of the Arch-Duke, but they followed at a distance, somewhat in danger to go too near; and in August both Forces were marching, the English had passage over the Rhine, by conduct of Prince Henry of Nassau, with two thousand Horse, and four hundred Musqueteers. But ere they came there, our raw English droop'd with eating Honey, and lost not the Nick-name for some years after. Ninety four with Tents, Truncks and Luggage were left at Bac-rack, and they and the Town lost to Spinola, by former example of all other that had stood in his way, and with no more pains than his sudden summons. And had done so to all the English, if his Design to snap them had not miscarried by the boisterous stream of the Rhine, which wet his Waggon of Ammunition, and some of his Field-pieces disordered, and so escaped they to Franckford, the 24 of September. Then to Darmstat, a Town of Bohemia, and to Hissen, where Prince Henry and the Dutch, take leave of the English and return home to Holland.

Joyns with the Princes of the Union

And here they joyn with fifteen hundred Horse of the Princes of the Union and march to Reims, the nether Town of the Palatinate; and the third of October joyn with the Army; four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot. Spinola at hand frightened them with a charge, but night afforded no light to fight, the next day to quarters for a Week, where the new Wine in the Must, grapes and fruits brought crudities upon their weak stomachs, till Spinola led them a Dance for Digestion as far as Keyfers-Luther; and the weather cold, the Nights long, disposed their necessities to several Garrisons, and the Forces of the Reformed Princes cooped up to their several places, whilst the Enemy carved to himself of the whole Countrey, the good English went thither to fight, and so came home again.

Fac. 18.

In this mean time the two Generals encounter, Anhalt for Bohemia, had the better, and scattered Bucquoys main Body, this was in the Spring. But in Autumn it fell out otherwise, for whilst Spinola and the Princes were hunting each other on the Hills, the Duke of Bavaria joyns with Bucquoys and Tilly. Anhalt and Mansfield got between them and Prague, but the Enemy breaks through, and routs the other into confusion and flight.

Anhalt and Holloch, the first that fled to the King of Bohemia at Prague, and the next morning the ninth of November, they all fly for succor, the King and Queen with both our Ambassadors, Weston and Conway, as far as Linburgh, in their way to the Netherlands, and the Ambassadors by safe conduct returned back to Bohemia, where the conquering business took up more time than to spend with leasurely disputes, and so they came home again.

The next Spring the Princes of the Union submit to the Emperor, so does Anhalt, who is received into favour, and made one of his Generals. Mansfield not so capable, and being put to his shifts, doubles his brave Spirit with the necessity of his Fortune, hurrying several Countries with Forces of fourteen thousand men, for almost two years after, till he constrained them to offer him peace, which he accepted.

Whilst King James sends to the Emperor by Sir Henry Wootton a Man fitted for Negotiation by his often employments to several States and Princes, and thus qualified he hath his Commission, passes by the Duke of Lorraine into Germany (for I find not he had any Credentials to him) only confers the King's Christian intents, as one cumbred with the sad events of the German Troubles on this side; and the French intents on the other, and so not improper for the King to study the passages of both.

And out of his particular Commission to others, Duke of he frames general Arguments to him, of the King's innocency in the beginning of the Bohemian business, and his impartiality ever since, and so rendred his Master the first Mediator therein, being tyed in the conscience of a Christian King to prosecute the same, and in it peace to all.

The Duke, a cunning and subtle Prince, told him, that the Princes of the Union would assure him, how his affections were in the cause, more he could not get out of him.

His next was to the Arch-Duke Leopold (of the Austrian family,) to him he had Letters, and tells him, That King James was clear of all foreknowledge or counsels in the business of Bohemia, and also of the Palgrave's preceding practice, till it was laid upon him:

That his Master continued equal to both parties, and was troubled, that there should be so great preparations for invading the Nether Palatinate, being the Patrimony of the King's Descendants, no way commixt with the Affairs of Bohemia.

Perfwades the Arch-Duke, as a Personage of Power to keep those that were in action, from such precipitation, as might preclude all mediation of accord.

He was answered, with the Arch-Dukes protestation; that he believes the King's cleanness, but of the Palgrave he much doubts, accusing him of practice with the Bohemians, at the Emperors Election at Franckford, and more foully (said he) to introduce the Turks into Hungary.

And conceived, the Marquess Spinola might have some aim upon the Lower Palatinate, assured the Emperors inclination to accord, but never without restitution of the usurped Kingdom; a loss not of easie concoction, especially by the Palatine his Subject.

And excused the Emperors levies, for that there were likewise some English forces, designed towards that place out of England, which was no fair way, if King James intended a Treaty.

It was replied by Wootton, That true it was, the Kings people, and some of the Nobility, had taken Alarm, upon a voice of that Invasion, and voluntarily meant to sacrifice themselves in that action; but without the Kings concurrence of money or command.

And being ask'd; he answered, he had no particular form of Accord to propose to the Emperor, for the King thought it necessary, to dispose the affections on both sides; and so collect some measure of agreement without spending the honour of the King in vain Treaties.

Then to the Community of Strasburgh and Ulme, who professed themselves in Neutrality, for it might be uncivil (they said) to offer their Counsels, where such Kings imploy their Wisdoms and Authority; they would only contribute their prayers.

The Duke of Wittenburgh made large professions towards the King of Bohemia (as he called the Palatine) of whose clearness from practice, he could vindicate; for visiting him presently upon his Election, he found him perplexed even to tears for to accept of the Kingdom, he was lyable to suspicion, as to ambition: and if he refused, he feared the people would call in more than Christian aid, to the effusion of much blood. And professed that no Prince of the Empire, should exceed his affection to defend the Palatinate, with all his power by bond of confederacy, and reason of State, lest any Stranger should neighbour him.

He had likewise Commission to the Duke of Bavaria, whom he found in actual arms about Liniz in the Upper Austria, and the Emperor at Vienna, with no success in those Messages.

Yet still King James hoping that time it self, and the experience of vexation, might in some degree mollifie their affections, better to digest difficulties, he never refused by Ambassies to both sides, and to all other the intervenient Princes and States, to attempt that high work of Peace first; and then afterwards of Restauration of the Palatinate, by other wayes and means.

The times when these Negotiations set forward, were usual in the Kings progress or retirements from London to his Sports (as was conceived) but they were then chosen abroad for better leasure of business, even then when Kingdoms were in dispute. An art he had thus to cover his weightier Meditations, for most of his Dispatches were concluded in his hunting journeys.

Prince Charles now grown man; the King had disposed to a Treaty for his Marriage with the Infanta of Spain (some while since) and Sir Walter Aston sent thither Lierger to sit correspondence, and now conceived not improper to induce the restauration of the Palatinate by that means.

However, it may be observed the evil success of all our former meddling with that Nation in matters of Marriages, so malignant, and disagreeing withours.

Let us ravel back to the memory of the Black Prince, a person of the greatest performance that Christendom can parallel. Yet in his voyage to Spain to settle Don Pedro; besides their monstrous ingratitude and perfidy to him then, caused also that miserable revolt in France by his absence, which lost us our Inheritance there, and his health ever after, his body either corrupted by the Air, or by their Drugs impoisoned.

And indeed their Matches with the Heirs and Princes of this Crown, for above six score years, having been no where else (except the second Marriage of Henry the eighth) were always unhappy, Prince Arthur's sudden death, left his Widow to his wicked Brother, with whom God was less pleased, as the Match was more unlawful; and therefore not a Male was left of their race, only one Daughter, in whose short Reign of six years, was more bloodshed for the true Religion, than for the false in sixty years, and she adventuring to Marry there also, this discontented Nation fell into Insurrections, Treasons, Wiat's Rebellion, and therefore her Husband Philip, suspecting the future effects, forsook her; who lost Calis to the French in six dayes, that the English had enjoyed 200 years; but altogether, broke her heart, and she died.

Now to parallel these foreign Marches with those at home to our own Subjects, the first being by Edward the fourth, and the last with Henry the eighth, from which two, Gods blessing brought forth two Queens Elizabeths; such instruments of his Glory, Peace in the Land, and Religion in the Church, as never could produce greater examples of Happiness to England, until this of King James, who brought hither them both with him.

In Flanders an Army of 30000 is levied. To the King of Englands demand of the cause of such great Preparations, the Marquess of Spinola answers, That he received his Commission sealed up with this injunction, that it should not be opened till his Levies were compleated and had rendezvouz'd. Some Aids, under Sir Horatio Vere, were sent to the Palatinate; the Forces of the Emperor becoming very numerous by the supplies that joyned them, from several Countries and Provinces. The Protestant States of the Upper and Lower Austria, upon the Bavarian Armies approach, renounce their League with the Bohemians, and submit to the Emperor, the Rights and Priviledges of their Religion being secured to them. The Bohemian's call in Bethlem Gabor, and fortifie their Frontiers; the Emperor in the mean time calls upon the Elector of Saxony to assist him in the Execution of the Ban against King Frederick, who would upon the Palsgraves entreaty stand Neuter, but enters Lusatia with an Army, whiles Spinola prevails mightily in the Palatinate, and by reason of the slowness of the Protestant supplies coming in to the King of Bohemia's succor, the Principal of the Union are disheartned, and the Union ready to be dissolved, whilest the English are drawn into several Towns in the Palatinate for their Winter Quarters, the Spaniards roave about in the Palatinate, and Protestant Princes retire into their own Countries.

The Truth is, King James was now in great straits what to do, he never approved his Son in Laws act to take the Kingdom of Bohemia upon him; and was unwilling on the other hand to see his Children devided of their natural Rights; he advises his Son to overtures of Peace, yet so as 1620. if they should not be hearkned too, to provide to assist him in the Wars, by the Raising of money by the way of Free gift, which he did, by directing his Letters to diverse Earls, Viscounts, Bishops and Barons, as followeth.

Oct. 25. YOU may formerly have heard how the Palatinate, being the ancient Heritage of the Count Palatine, His Majesties Son-in-Law, and to descend to His Majesties Grand-Children, is now invaded by a Foreign Enemy; many principal Towns are surprized, a great part of the Countrey in the possession of Strangers, and the Inhabitants forced to take an Oath against their Natural Prince. Whereupon His Majesty, out of Considerations of Nature, Honour and State, hath declared Himself in the course of an Auxiliary War, for the Defence and Recovery of the same; and the occasion being so weighty and pressing, hath moved His Majesty, by the general advice of Us His Council, to think of some course for provision of that Nature, as may serve as well to the maintenance and preserving of the present Succours already sent, as for the re-inforcing them out of those Countries, as the occasion of the War shall require: And for that the swiftness of the occasion would not permit a Supply by other means for the present, so readily as was needful, we have all concurred to begin with our selves, in offer of a voluntary Gift unto His Majesty, for the advancement of the present Occasion; nothing doubting, but that your Lordship being a Peer of the Kingdom, will cheerfully and readily follow the Examples of us begun. And if there were much alacrity and readiness found in the Nobility and others, to contribute at the motion of His Majesties Son's Ambassador, at what time the Palatinate was not invaded, neither had His Majesty declared himself; you will much more, and in a better proportion do it, now these two weighty Motives do concur; and so nothing doubting of your Lordships readiness herein, we bid, &c.

A Letter of the same import was written to the Lord Mayor of London; but the Fatal Battel of Prague decides all; where the Imperial Forces under the Command of the Duke of Bavaria and Buquoy on the 8th. of November, being Sunday, utterly ruined the whole Army of King Frederick; they mutinying and refusing to fight for want of Pay, though he had it by him; and it became a Prey to his Enemies by the loss of the Battel; after which the King and Queen fled, and Count Mansfield, who joyned not with the Prince of Anhalt, King Frederick's General, fights manfully, and with a flying Army became a continual vexation to the Emperour, harrassing his Countries, and forcing Contributions every where.

The King of England hearing of the King of Bohemia's Overthrow, by the Earls of Oxford and Essex, newly returned from the Palatinate, calls his Council together, to consider what is fit to be done in this affair.

Fac. 18.

HIS Majesty being resolved to make some Royal Preparations for the Recovery and Protection of the Palatinate, being the Ancient Inheritance of His Majesties Son-in-Law, and Grand-children, did in His High Wisdom think meet to appoint some persons of knowledge and experience in the Wars, to consider of, and give their Advice in such Propositions as shall be made unto them by the Board, for the better expediting of that Service. To which purpose, the Earl of Oxford, and the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Viscount Wilmot, the Lord Danvers, the Lord Calfield, Sir Edward Cecil, Sir Richard Harrison Knights, and Captain Danbingham were called to the Table, and made acquainted with His Majesties pleasure, That they or any five or more of them, together with Sir Hor. Vere, & Sir Edw. Conway Knights (if they return into England while this Committee doth continue) shall undertake this Service, and have their Meetings and Assemblies in the whole Council-Chamber here in Whitehall, touching the affairs above-mentioned: And that, for their better assistance, they call unto them such others of experience, whose advice and opinion they shall think fit to make use of in their several Consultations, upon such things as shall be so referred unto them from the Board. Which they are to prosecute without intermission or delay. And they shall make report of their Opinions, which is to be done in writing under five of their hands at least.

An Order at the Council Table for recovering the Palatinate.

The Particulars offered to their Consideration, are these.

First, What proportion or number of Men, as well Horse as Foot, with Munition, Victuals, Shipping and Treasure will be sufficient for that Enterprize.

And Secondly, By what time it will be meet, that their Forces be in readiness: And where the Arms, Munition and Victuals may be best provided; with such other Circumstances as are incident to any of these Heads.

For the better direction herein, Mr. Secretaries will acquaint them with such Intelligences as they have received, touching the strength of the Enemies Forces now in the Palatinate.

Moreover, the King, to encourage the Princes of the Union, and to keep them in Arms, sent them 30000 Pounds; yet withal, resolved to treat for a Peace; and dispatch'd Sir Edward Villers

Villers into Silesia, to fetch the Palsgrave's Submission to the Emperor, upon Conditions to be conceived according to equity and conveniency.

Never did the Spaniards more flatter King James, than after the Defeat at Prague. They affirm, that he shall ordain, according to his pleasure, in the Palsgrave's Restitution, and be obeyed: That the Infanta's Portion was preparing, and that the Pope was obliged to grant the Dispensation, from whom they resolve to take no denial. Cottington, the Agent in Spain, now attesting the honesty of Gondomar's Dispatches hither, and cryed him up for a cordial man, and well deserving his Majesty's favour.

The Spanish Ambassador's Instructions received from the King his Master, were as followeth, but must be taken entirely upon the Credit of the Historical Collector. p. 18.

Private Instructions to the Spanish Ambassador into England.

Besides that which I enjoin you in your general Instructions given you for England, whither I send you to reside, I thought good to advertise you apart by themselves of the chiefest things of importance, which you shall there negotiate, and endeavour to further and advance.

It is well known, that I have desired and endeavoured to favour the Cause of the Catholicks of that Kingdom, and to further it to their best advantage, as well in the time of the Queen deceased, who did so much prosecute and oppress them, as since the time that the present King hath succeeded; yet that calamity still continues upon them, by reason of the ill offices done unto them by the Puritans and Protestants (of whom the greater part of that Kings Council doth consist:) Howbeit, because it is a thing that I could not well urge or press, without breeding Jealousies, and so cause thereby a greater harm to the Catholicks, I have proceeded on my part with that wariness and dissimulation as is fit.

D. A. shall inform you of what hath passed in this matter, as also in what estate things are at this present, and how you shall govern your self for the time to come, according to the Orders given unto him, whose example we wish you to follow. And of this take special heed; That although it be believed, that we may be very confident of the Trustiness of those Catholicks, by whose means the business of the rest is undertaken, that they will be secret; notwithstanding; lest any Heretick shall come in the name or shew of a Catholic, only to make some discovery; it shall be fit, that in all Speeches you shall have with them, concerning that which shall touch the Catholicks, that you tell them, how much I desire to see them freed from those pressures, under which Queen Elizabeth put them, and that God would inspire the King's heart, that he may reduce himself to the obedience of the Roman-Catholic Church; and advise them to endeavour to win the King unto them, by shewing themselves good, and Loyal, and obedient Subjects, in temporal Duties, and not to meddle in any thing against his State; that by their deeds he may see what security may be expected from them, and may also bind himself to favour them; these being things that no way contradict the observing the Catholic Religion, and are due from them to the Dignity of their King and Natural Lord: And for the same reason they ought to abstain from all ill practices, or unfitting Speech or Actions against his Person as, is said, some heretofore have used; especially seeing no good hath, or can come thereof, and thereby they shall justly provoke him against themselves; and by holding this course, they shall win the King's good will, and the Peace shall be preserved, and by the Peace by little and little, be won and attained that which is desired. By this manner of proceeding, it is certain, there can come no inconvenience: But in case that this your manner of dealing shall come to the King's knowledge (as possibly it may) it will breed a great Obligation of Brotherhood and Friendship between us, when he shall see that I carry my self in this sort in his affairs; and consequently will be the more confident of our Amity, and will thereby be induced the better to subdue all Malice in them that shall endeavour to periwade the contrary. And therefore you shall have a special care to do this dexterously, in due time and season; and to inform your self very particularly from the said D. A. concerning those with whom you may deal confidently, and how far you may trust the Negotiants for the Catholicks; though you shall do well alway to proceed with the afore-said caution and wariness.

You shall understand from the said D. A. what Pensions are allotted to certain Ministers of that King, and to other persons: It will be necessary to inform your self thoroughly of all that concerns this Point, and that you know both the Persons and Pensions, to serve your self of them, and to make the best use of them in all occasions that shall be most behoveful for your better direction in the businesses given you in charge, and all others that may be offered of consequence, seeing the said Pensions were appointed to that end.

Whatsoever of the said Pensions you shall find unpaid for the time past, D. A. is to discharge, and you shall undertake for the time to come, telling every one what his Pension is, to the end they may be deceived of no part thereof by the Third person, who conveys it unto him; and let it be punctually paid at the days, that their good payment may bind them to persevere, and do their service punctually; for the which you shall be furnished with all that shall be necessary. And have a special care to advertise me, how such Persons employ themselves in the things that shall occur, disguising their names in such manner as D. A. doth.

Above all, you must take great care to dive into the estate of the Affairs of that King, what his Treasure is: In what Estimation he is with his Subjects, and what correspondence and good meaning there is betwixt them how the English, Scotch, and Irish stand affected among themselves, & one towards another and towards their Neighbours, and how they are bent against me, &c. my Common Estates, or any of my particular Kingdoms; whence they draw their Intelligences, and particularly what Amity and Correspondency that King entertaineth with France, and with the Netherlands of Holland and Zeland, and with the Venetians, and upon what Causes it is founded, what Matters they treat of, what Designs they have in hand. All which is very necessary to be known; for the attaining of which, D. A. will open unto you some ways, which you must follow, besides those which your self shall discover. And you shall advertise me of whatsoever you shall understand and learn, governing your self in all Occurrences with with that wariness and discretion, as your zeal Anno to my service doth assure me of.

1620.

These were the Arts of Spain, to corrupt divers in the Court of England.

Buckingham and his Dependants followed the King's inclinations, The Duke of Lenox, Marquis Hamilton, and William Earl of Pembroke, disliking the King's course, did not contest with him, but only intimated their dissent.

It was said of Gondomar, that when he returned into Spain, he gave in his account of disbursements for Pensions given in England (amongst others) to Sir Robert Cotton 1000*l.* a person of great integrity, and one who was ever averse to the House of Austria. Which Sir Robert getting notice of by the English Agent, then in Spain, demanded reparation; which was obtained; but with a Salvo to the Ambassadors Honour, the Errour being said to be committed by a Dependant upon the Ambassador, and not by himself.

The King being jealous of uncontrolled Sovereignty, and impatient of his Peoples intermeddling with the Mysteries of State (a thing very usual, but of evil consequence both in his, and the subsequent times) had fallen into a great dislike of Parliaments; which, while Justice and due Subjection sway their Actions, are a Princes greatest as well as highest Councils. And many of his Ministers perhaps, fearing an Enquiry into their own actions, might suggest to him, that he might better furnish himself by those ways of Monopolies, &c. and the Match now in Treaty, than by Subsidies, usually accompanied with the Redress of Grievances. Nevertheless, he was now minded to call a Parliament, conceiving it might be of special use: For he observed the affections of the People to be raised for the recovery of the Palatinate; and then concluded, that those affections would open their Purse to the supply of his wants; and the Treaty with Spain would effect the business, without the expence and troubles of War, and the good accord between him and his People would quicken the Spaniard to conclude the Match. And accordingly Writs were issued forth to Assemble them the 30th of January. In the Calling of this Parliament, he recommended to his Subjects the choice of such Members as were of the wisest, gravest, and best affected people, neither superstitious, nor turbulent, but obedient Children to this their Mother-Church.

The Protestant Union continually declined, by the gradual falling away of the several Partakers. The Elector of Saxony reduced the remainder of Lusatia. The Province of Moravia, upon the approach of Buzoy, seeing the Count de Lathiere came not in to their succor, prayed that they might enjoy their Priviledges in matter of Religion, and be received into the Emperor's Grace and Favour: which submission was well received at Vienna. Likewise the States of Silesia failing of assistance from the Elector Palatine, were constrained to make their peace.

The Palatine propounded to the Elector of Saxony an Overture of Peace; declaring, That he took the Crown upon him to preserve the Protestants in the free exercise of their Religion. The Saxon replied, That he had no way to make his Peace, but to renounce the Kingdom of Bohemia, and the Provinces incorporate, and to beg the Emperor's pardon. Afterwards the Elector Palatine goeth to Brandenburg, and then to Segenburgh, where there was an Assembly of Princes and States Protestant, to oppose the Exploits of Spinola. In the mean while, Count Mansfeld stirs in Bohemia, pillages several Towns, and the Goods of all those that cried, God save King Ferdinand.

The Relation of England to those Affairs of Foreign States, had caused a general liberty of Discourse concerning Matters of State; which King James could not bear; but, by Proclamation, commanded all, from the highest to the lowest, not to intermeddle, by Pen or Speech, with State-concernments, and secrets of Empire, either at home or abroad; which were no fit Themes or Subjects for vulgar persons, or common Meetings.

On the Thirtieth of January, the Parliament began to Sit, and the King is said by the Collector to have made this Speech following to the Parliament; but the Speech is not the Kings, but a Hodge-podge of the Collectors; the true Speech of His Majesty followeth the other of the Collectors.

MY Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and you the Commons, Cui multiloquio non deest peccatum? In the last Parliament I made long Discourses, especially to them of the Lower House: I did open the true thoughts of my heart; but I may say with our Saviour, I have piped to you, and you have not danced; I have mourned, and you have not lamented. Yet as no mans actions can be free, so in me God found some Spices of vanity, and so all my Sayings turned to me again without any success. And now tell the Reasons of your Calling, and this Meeting, apply it to your selves, and spend not the time in long Speeches. Consider, that the Parliament is a thing composed of a Head and a Body, the Monarch and the Two Estates; it was first a Monarchy, then after a Parliament. There are no Parliaments, but in a Monarchical Governments; for, in Venice, the Netherlands, and other free Governments, there are none. The Head is to call the Body together; And for the Clergy, the Bishops are chief, for Shires, their Knights; and for Towns and Cities, their Burgesses and Citizens. These are to treat of difficult matters, and to counsel their King with their best advice, to make Laws for the Common-weal: And the Lower House is also to petition their King, and acquaint him with their Grievances, and not to meddle with their King's Prerogative. They are to offer supply for his Necessity, and he to distribute in recompence thereof Justice and Mercy. As in all Parliaments, it is the King's Office to make good Laws (whose fundamental Cause is the Peoples ill Manners) so at this time, that we may meet with the new Abuses, and the incroaching Craft of the times: Particulars shall be read hereafter.

As touching Religion, Laws enough are made already. It stands in two points; Perswasion and Compulsion: Men may perswade, but God must give the Blessing. Jesuites, Priests, Puritans and Sectaries, erring both on the right hand and left hand, are forward to perswade unto their own ends; and so ought you the Bishops, in your example and preaching; but Compulsion to obey, is to bind the Conscience.

There

Anno 1620. There is talk of the Match with Spain; but if it shall not prove a furtherance to Religion, I am not worthy to be your King: I will never proceed but to the Glory of God, and content of my Subjects.

*-Buckingham.

For a Supply to my Necessities; I have reigned eighteen years, in which time you have had peace, and I have received far less supply than hath been given to any King since the conquest. The last Queen, of Famous Memory, had one year with another above a hundred thousand pounds per annum in Subsidies; and in all my time I have had but Four Subsidies, and Six Fifteens. It is ten years since I had a Subsidy; in all which time I have been sparing to trouble you: I have turned my self as nearly to save Expences as I may; I have abated much in my Household-Expences, in my Navies, in the Charge of my Munition; I made not choice of an old beaten Souldier for my Admiral; but rather chose a young man, whose Honesty and Integrity I knew, whose Care hath been to appoint under him sufficient men to lessen my Charges, which he hath done.

Touching the miserable Dissentions in Christendom, I was not the Cause thereof; for the appeasing whereof, I sent my Lord of Doncaster; whose Journey cost me Three thousand five hundred pounds. My Son-in-Law sent to me for Advice, but within three days after accepted of the Crown; which I did never approve of, for three Reasons.

First, For Religions sake, as not holding with the Jesuits disposing of Kingdoms; rather learning of our Saviour to uphold, not to overthrow them.

Secondly, I was no Judge between them, neither acquainted with the Laws of Bohemia. Quis me Judicem fecit?

Thirdly, I have treated a Peace, and therefore will not be a Party; yet I left not to preserve my Childrens Patrimony; for I had a Contribution of my Lords and Subjects, which amounted to a great Sum. I borrowed of my Brother of Denmark Seven thousand five hundred pounds to help him, and sent as much to him as made it up Ten thousand; and Thirty thousand I sent to the Princes of the Union, to hearten them. I have lost no time; had the Princes of the Union done their parts, that handful of men I sent had done theirs. I intend to send, by way of perswasion, which in this Age will little avail, unless a strong hand assist: Wherefore I purpose to provide an Army the next Summer, and desire you to consider of my Necessities, as you have done to my Predecessors. Qui cito dat, bis dat. I will engage my Crown, my Blood, and my Soul in that Recovery.

You may be informed of me in things in course of Justice; but I never sent to any of my Judges to give Sentence contrary to Law. Consider the Trade, for the making thereof better; and shew me the reason why my Mint for these eight or nine years hath not gone. I confess I have been liberal in my Grants; but if I be informed, I will amend all hurtful Grievances: But who shall hasten after Grievances, and desire to make himself popular, he hath the Spirit of Satan: If I may know my Errors, I will reform them. I was in my first Parliament a Novice; and in my last there was a kind of Beasts called Undertakers, a dozen of whom undertook to govern the last Parliament, and they led me. I shall thank you for your good Office, and desire that the World may say well of Our Agreement.

In this Parliament the Commons presented Sir Tho. Richardson for their Speaker.

My Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and you the Commons,

IN multiloquio non deest peccatum: said the wisest King that ever was; and this Experience I have found in my own person; for it is true, that there have been Sessions of Parliament before this time, wherein I have made many Discourses to the Gentlemen of the Lower House, and in them delivered a true endeavour of my heart: But as no mans Occasions, be they never so good, can be free from censure, in regard of the Excellency required to make Perfection; so it may be, it pleased God, seeing some vanity in me, to send back my Words as Wind spit into my own face. So, as I may truly say, I have often Piped unto you, but you have not Danced; I have often mourned, but you have not lamented: But now I have put on this resolution for the few dayes that are left me in this World, wherein I know not how far I have offended God, and if it may please you especially of the Lower House, to apply this Rule unto your selves, you may find the more fruit.

Now to the Errand of your being called hither; for entring whereunto the more easily, I will begin with the general Condition of a Parliament, not to instruct you, whom I suppose not to be ignorant, but to refresh your Memories; and first what a Parliament is: It is an Assembly compos'd of a Head and a Body. The Monarch is the Head, and the Body is the Three Estates; which are called in all Monarchies a Parliament, which was Used and Created at the first by Monarchy; for Kings were before Parliaments; who, as soon as they had settled a Form of Government, and were willing that their People should be guided by Laws, called a Parliament: I know there are divers sorts of Foreign Parliaments, some more, some less in number: But I leave them; only this I would have you to observe, That it is a vain thing for a Parliament-Man to press to be popular; for there is no State or Parliament without a Monarchy; so the Grizons, Swisses and Low-Countries, which are governed without a King, have no Parliaments, but Councils and Assemblies. This I put you in mind of, that you serve under a Monarch, and that you must stand or fall with it.

Now consider, First, Who calls you: your King, Secondly, Whom he calls; the Peers, who in respect of the eminency of their Places and high Honours, have an interest therein by Birth and Inheritance, because they are to assist the King in his greatest Affairs. In the next place is the Church, the Clergy; yet not all of them, but the principal Heads thereof, the Bishops, whose Holiness of Life doth claim a priviledge in Advice, and respect of their Baronies: also the Knights stand for the Shires, and the other Gentlemen for the Burroughs; of these is the whole Body compos'd. Thirdly, Why you are called; viz. To advise the King in his urgent Affairs, to give him your best advice in such Errands as he shall ask of you, or you shall think fit to ask his Advice in. The King makes Laws, and ye are to advise him to make such as may be best for the good of the the Common-wealth: There is another Cause also, viz. The House of Commons is Called, for that they best know the particular Estate of the Country; and if the King shall ask their Advice, can best tell what is amiss, as being most sensible of it, and also petition him to amend and redress. You are the Authors of sustenance also to him, to supply his Necessities; and this is the proper use of Parliaments. Here they are to offer what they think fit to supply his wants; and he is in lieu hereof to afford them Mercy and Justice; and this is that I boldly say, and am not ashamed to speak it, That all People owe a kind of Tribute to their King, as a thankfulness to him for his Love to them; and where there is this Sympathy between the King and his People, it breeds a happy Parliament.

Thus much of the general Condition and special Use of Parliaments in this Kingdom. Now I come to the particular Causes which moved me to call this Parliament.

First, As in all Parliaments, the King must have a special care to make good Laws; for ex malis moribus bonæ Leges oriuntur: For the elder the World grows, men become the more wise, the more crafty, and the more sinful, and therefore the more need to make new Laws for new Crimes. And here I am in a large Subject, yet because of my intended Brevity, I will speak of no Particulars, but hold it best to leave it to the Times wherein you should both see and read them.

First, For Religion there are Laws enough, so as the true intent and execution follow; The Maintenance of Religion stands in two points: 1. Persuasion, which must precede; 2. Compulsion, which must follow; for as all the World cannot create a new Creature, be it never so little, so no Law of man can make a good Christian in heart, without inward Grace; but the Minister must persuade, and leave the success to God; and if there were not so many Priests and Jesuites, there would not be so many perverted to ill; yet it is not enough to trust to a good Cause, and to let it go alone; likewise the busie Puritans, do but see how busie they are in persuading the People. But God forbid that I should compel mens Consciences, but leave them to the Law of the Kingdom; for the Rumor that is spread, that I should tolerate Religion in respect of this Match, which hath been long intreated with Spain for my Son; I profess I will do nothing therein which shall not be honourable, and for the good of Religion: The Trial which you have had of my Works and Writings, wherein I have been a Martyr, tortured in the Mouths of many idle Fellows, may give you ample testimony of my Integrity, in such a sort, as I hope you trust the Wisdom of your King so far as that I will never do one thing in private, and another thing in publick: But if after this my Declaration, any shall transgress, blame me not if I see them severely punished.

Now the main Errand, to speak truth, which I have call'd you for, is for a Supply of my urgent necessities; ye can all bear me witness I have Reigned 18 Years among you; if it be a fault in me, that you have been at peace all this while, I pray you pardon it; for I take it for an honour to me, that ye should live quietly under your Vines and Fig-trees, eating the fruit of your own Labours, and my self to be a Just and Merciful King to you; ye have not been troubled with pressing of men with a thousand Inconveniencies, which the disaster of War produceth; and yet within these 18 years I have had less Supplies than many Kings before. The last Queen (of Famous Memory) was so far supply'd in her time, as it grew to an annual Contribution; which by Computation came to 135000 l. a year at the least. I had never above 4 Subsidies, and 6 Fifteens; I challenge no more desert than She; but sure I am, I have governed you as peaceably the time since my Supply hath been, as if Women with Child, que decem menses fastidia Menstris, who, after ten Months Longing are delivered of their Burden; but I have travailed ten years, and therefore now full time to be delivered of my wants. I was ever willing to spare you till now, It is true, Two Arguments were used in other Parliaments against Supplies; first, That many Subsidies had been given by them, and therefore they required a time of Respiration; which Objection is now taken away: The other was, That my Treasure was confusedly governed by me; so as some did not stick to say, that they would give me all they had, were they sure it should come into my Purse: Now you have seen Trial of my late Care in two Years last past, in looking into the Particulars of my Estate, wherein I must confess that I have found my Revenue, as Job's Friends, forsaking me. In my Household Expence I have abated 10000 pound per Annum; in the Navy I abated 25000 pound per An. and shortly hope to abate 10000 pound more in mine Ordinance; I have brought mine Expences from 34000 l. to 14000 l. and yet was loth at first to think that things were so much out of order; but at the last, by means of the information of some private honest Gentlemen, I was induced to enter into a particular Survey; and herein, such was the Love of my young Admiral to me, as he took the only Envy of all upon my self for my sake; and though he be but young, yet I find him true in Faith, and an honest man, who hath had the better success in all the rest; he took under himself divers Commissioners, as a young Commander should do, the better to preserve him from Errors, and then sought no reward, but my good Service; yet went nevertheless through all with great diligence and happy Success; and therefore I hope the Kingdom shall say I have a true care of my Estate, not taking from others by violence House or Land, but governing my own with good Husbandry: And now I took your Supply not to fall into a bottomless Purse.

The next Cause of your Calling is for an urgent necessity; the miserable and torn Estate of Christendom; which none that hath an honest heart, can look on without a weeping Eye. I was not the Cause of the beginning thereof (God knows;) but I pray God I may be a happy Instrument of a happy ending the Wars in Bohemia, I mean, wherein the States expell'd the Emperour, and chose my Son-in-Law their King: I was requested at first by both Sides to make an Agreement between them; which cost me 30000 l. in sending Doncaster on an Embassie for that purpose. In the mean time they cast off all Allegiance, and chose my Son, who sent to me to know whether he should take the Crown upon him or not; and yet within three days after, before I could return my Answer, took the Crown on his Head; and then I was loth to meddle in it at all, for three Reasons.

First, I would not make Religion the Cause of Deposing Kings. I leave that Cause to the Jesuites, to make Religion a Cause to take away Crowns.

Next, I was not a fit Judge between them; for for they might after say to me, as he said to Anno Moses, Who made thee a Judge over us? And my 1621. self would not be content that they should judge whether I were a King or not.

Lastly, Because I had been a Medler between them, and then to determine my Son might take the Crown upon him, had been unproper; and yet I left not off so far as Nature compell'd me, to admit his Good, I permitted a voluntary Contribution, to preserve the Palatinate, which came to a great Sum; for that purpose I borrowed also 75000 l. of my Brother of Denmark, and now have sent to him to make it up 100000 l. and all this have I done with the Charge of Ambassadors, and otherwise; which have risen to an infinite Sum, which I have born my self, and hath cost me above 200000 l. in preserving the Palatinate from invading, finding no hope of the rest, besides 300000 pound, and besides the voluntary Contribution; and I am now to take care for a worse danger against next Summer; albeit I will leave no travail untried to obtain a happy Peace; but I thought good to be armed against the worst time, it being best to intreat of Peace with a Sword in my Hand. Now I shall labour to preserve the rest; wherein I declare, that if by fair means I cannot get it, my Crown, and Honour and All shall be spent with my Sons Blood also, but I will get it for him: And this is the Cause, for all the Causes of Religion are involved in it; for they will alter Religion where they conquer, and so perhaps my Granchild may suffer, who hath committed no fault at all. There is nothing done without a speedy Supply, and his dat qui cito dat; wherefore I hope you will no more fail me now, than you have done my Predecessors. In this I must trust your Cares; and I think if a man could see all your Hearts in one Face, it would testifie a general Acclamation of this my Motion. Consider who it is that moves you; your King, and his care of Reformation, and the Charges which he hath discharged, besides 40000 l. of late in the Piretical War, and consider if I deserve not your respects.

For your parts you may be informed of something fit to be required of Me for matter of Justice, I never directly nor otherwise desired the contrary; for which purpose I have chosen Judges of the best Learning and Integrity that I could; and if they prove unjust, I will not spare them. It's strange that my Mint hath not gone this 8, or 9 years; but I think the fault of the want of Money, is the uneven balancing of Trade: for other things (I confess) I have been liberal; but the main Cause of my wants hath been the ill Government of those whom I have trusted under me: For Bounty, I will not make every day a Christmas; and yet it may be I have hurt my self in some, and in others my Subjects; but if I be truly inform'd, I will rightly reform; but for you to hunt after Grievances to the prejudice of your King and your selves, is not the Errand: Deal with me as I deserve at your hands; will leave nothing undone that becomes a just King, if you deal with me accordingly. I know this Parliament hath been of great expectation; and so was that at my first coming, when I knew not the State of this Land; I was led by the old Counsellors I found which the old Queen left, and it may be there was a misleading, and a misunderstanding between us, which bred an abruption: And at the last Parliament there came up a strange kind of Beast call'd Undertakers, a Name which in my Nature I abhor; which caus'd a Dissolution; now you have the advantage, that I call you out of my free motion, and my trust is in your good Offices for my good estate even in all and every one of you; Fac. 19. I hope I want not good Subjects; and I assure you, ye shall find an honest King of me: How happy a Fame will it be that he is Reverenced and Loved by his People, and reciprocally loves them? Now shall I be honoured by my Neighbour Princes, and my Government peradventure made an example for Posterity to follow: And so I leave you.

Sir John Digby, now Lord Digby, is sent into Flanders to the Arch-Duke, to gain a Cessation from War, and a Treaty of Peace with the Emperor; the former is granted, and is continued till the Death of the Arch-Duke; and the Treaty of Twelve years betwixt the United Netherlands and the Spaniards expiring, Spinola returns into Flanders, and leaves the Palatinate to the Imperial Forces; King Frederick and his Queen retire into Holland, and are Nobly entertained there by the Prince of Orange, whilst the Emperor deals severely with the Bohemians, and treats them not as an Elected King, but a Lord by Right of Conquest: The Union now dissolves amain, and the Protestant States and Towns reconcile themselves to the Emperor; to whom they do but in vain intercede for the Palgrave, whilst the King of Denmark the United Provinces, and diverse German Princes adhere still to his Cause, and stickle hard for him.

The Parliament now called, Petition the King to put the Laws in execution upon Popish Priests, Jesuites and Popish Recusants; complain of Sir Giles Mompesson for many heinous Offences, tot he Scandal of the King and Government; he was Committed to Prison, and escaped thence beyond Seas. Diverse Patents were then likewise Complained of; as that of Gold and Silver-Thread, of Innes and Ale-houses, &c. which the Commons complain of, not touching in the least upon the King's Prerogative; and these things (the Lords admitting of no other Business) being before that House, the King came to the House of Peers, and spake as followeth;

MY Lords, The last time I came hither, My The King's Errand was to inform you (as well as My Speech to Memory could serve Me of things so long past) the Lords of the verity of My Proceedings, and the Caution used by Me in passing those Letters Patents, now in question before you, to the effect, that they might not be abused in the execution. And this I did by way of Declaration. But now I am come (understanding the time of your censure at hand) to express My readiness to put in execution (which is the Life of the Law) those things which ye are to sentence; (for even the Law it self is a dead Letter without execution) for which Office, God hath appointed Me in these Kingdoms. And though I assure My self, that My former Behaviour, in all the course of My Life, hath made Me well known for a Just King; yet in these special cases I thought fit to express My own intentions out of My own Mouth, for punishment of things complained of: The first proof whereof I have given by the diligent search I caused to be made after the person of Sir Giles Mompesson; who, though he were fled, yet My Proclamation pursued him instantly; and as I was earnest in that, so will I be to see your Sentence against him put in execution.

Anno 1621. 'Two Reasons move Me to be earnest in the execution of what ye are to sentence at this time.

'First, That duty I owe to God, who hath made Me a King, and tied Me to the care of Government by that politick Marriage betwixt Me and My people: For I do assure you, in the heart of an honest Man, and by the Faith of a Christian King (which both ye and all the world know Me to be) had these things been complained of to Me before the Parliament, I would have done the Office of a just King, and out of Parliament have punished them as severely, and peradventure more, than ye now intend to do. But now that they are discovered to Me in Parliament, I shall be as ready in this way, as I should have been in the other; for I confess I am ashamed (these things proving so as they are generally reported to be) that it was not My good fortune to be the only Author of the Reformation and Punishment of them by some ordinary Courts of Justice. Nevertheless, since these things are new discovered by Parliament, which before I knew not of, nor could so well have discovered otherwise, in regard of that Representative Body of the Kingdom, which comes from all parts of the Countrey, I will never be a whit the slower to do my part for the execution: For, (as many of you as here, have heard me often say, and so I will still say) so precious unto me is the publick Good, that no private person whatsoever (were he never so dear unto Me) shall be respected by Me, by many degrees, as the publick Good; not only of the whole Common-wealth, but even of a particular Corporation that is a Member of it. And, I hope, that ye, my Lords, will do me the Right, to publish to my People this my heart and purpose.

'The second Reason is, That I intend not to derogate or infringe any of the Liberties or Privileges of this House, but rather to fortifie and strengthen them: For never any King hath done so much for the Nobility of England as I have done, and will ever be ready to do. And whatsoever I shall say, and deliver unto you as my thought; yet when I have said what I think, I will afterwards freely leave the Judgment wholly to your House. I know you will do nothing but what the like hath been done before: And I pray you be not jealous, that I will abridge you of any thing that hath been used; for whatsoever the Precedents (in times of good Government) can warrant, I will allow; for I acknowledge this to be the Supream Court of Justice, wherein I am ever present by Representation. And in this ye may be the better satisfied by my own presence, coming divers times among you. Neither can I give you any great assurance, or better pledge of this my purpose, than that I have done you the honour to set my only Son among you, and hope that ye, with him, shall have the means to make this the happiest Parliament that ever was in England.

'This I profess, and take comfort in, That the House of Commons at this time, have shewed greater Love, and used me with more Respect in all their proceedings, than ever any House of Commons have hitherto done to me, or I think, to any of my Predecessors. As for this House of yours, I have always found it respective to me, and accordingly do I, and ever did, favour you, as you well deserved. And I hope it will 'be accounted a happiness for you, that my Son doth now sit among you, who, when it shall please God to set him in my Place, will then remember, that he was once a Member of your House, and so be bound to maintain all your lawful privileges, and like the better of you all the days of his Life. But because the World, at this time, talks so much of Bribes, I have just cause to fear, the whole Body of this House hath bribed him to be a good Instrument for you upon all occasions: He doth so good Offices in all his Reports to me, both for the House in general, and every one of you in particular. And the like I may say of one that sits there, Buckingham; he hath been so ready upon all occasions of good Offices, both for the House in general, and ever Member in particular. One proof thereof, I hope, my Lord of Arundel hath already witnessed unto you, in his Report made unto you of my Answer, touching the Privileges of the Nobility, how earnestly he spake unto me of that Matter.

'Now, my Lords, the time draws near of your Recess; whether Formality will leave you time for proceeding now to Sentence against all, or any of the persons now in question, I know not; but, for my part, since both Houses have dealt so lovingly and freely with me, in giving me a free Gift, two Subsidies, in a more loving manner than hath been given to any King before, and so accepted by me: And since I cannot yet retribute by a General Pardon (which hath by form been usually reserved to the End of a Parliament) the least I can do (which I can forbear no longer) is to do something in present, for the Ease and Good of my People. Three Patents at this time have been complained of, and thought great Grievances.

1. That of Inns and Hosteries.
2. That of Ale-Houses.
3. Of Gold and Silver-Thread.

'My purpose is to strike them all dead; and that Time may not be lost, I will have it done presently. That concerning Ale-houses, I would have to be left to the managing of Justices of the Peace, as before. That of Gold and Silver-Thread, was most vilely executed, both for wrong done to mens persons, as also for abuse in the Stuff; for it was a kind of false Coin. I have already freed the persons that were in Prison; I will now also damn the Patent, and this may seem instead of a Pardon. All these three I will have recalled by Proclamation, and wish you to advise of the fittest Form to that purpose.

'I hear also there is another Bill amongst you, against Informers. I desire you, my Lords, that as you tender my Honour, and the Good of my People, ye will put that Bill to an end, as soon as you can; and at your next Meeting, to make it one of your first Works. For I have already shewed my dislike of that kind of people openly in Star-Chamber; and it will be the greatest ease to me, and all those that are near about me at Court, that may be: For, I remember, that since the beginning of this Parliament, Buckingham hath told me, he never found such Quiet and Rest, as in this time of Parliament, from Projectors and Informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours.

'And now I confess, that when I looked before upon the face of the Government, I thought (as every man would have done) that the people

Anno 1621. people were never so happy as in my time: For even as at divers times I have looked upon many of my Copices, riding about them, and they appeared on the outside very thick and well-grown, unto me; but when I turned into the midst of them, I found them all bitten within, and full of plains and bare spots; like the Apple or Pear, fair and smooth without, but when ye cleave it asunder, you find it rotten at heart. Even so this Kingdom, the External Government being as good as ever it was, and I am sure, as learned Judges as ever it had, and, I hope, as honest, administering Justice within it; and for Peace both at home and abroad, I may truly say, more settled and longer lasting, than ever any before; together with as great plenty as ever: So as it was to be thought, that every man might sit in safety under his own Vine and Fig-tree: yet I am ashamed (and it makes my Hair stand upright) to consider, how in this time my people have been vexed and polled by the vile execution of Projects, Patents, Bills of Conformity, and such like; which, besides the trouble of my People, have more exhausted their Purfes, than Subsidies would have done.

Now, My Lords, before I go hence, since God hath made me the Great Judge of this Land under him, and that I must answer for the Justice of the same; I will therefore, according to my Place, remember you of some things, though I would not teach you; for no mans Knowledge can be so good, but their Memories will be the better to be refreshed. And now because you are coming to give Judgment, (all which moves from the King) that you may the better proceed, take into your care two things. 1. To do Bonum. 2. To do it Bene.

I call it Bonum, when all is well proved whereupon ye Judge; for then ye build upon a sure Foundation. And by Bene, I understand, that ye proceed with all Formality and Legality, where in you have fit occasion to advise with the Judges, who are to assist you with their Opinions in Cases of that nature; and Wo be to them if they advise you not well. So the ground being good, and the form orderly, it will prove a course fitting this High Court of Parliament.

In Sentence ye are to observe two parts: First, to recollect that which is worthy of Judging and censuring: And secondly, to proceed against these, as against such-like Crimes properly. We doubt there will be many matters before you; some complained of out of Passion, and some out of just cause of Grievance: Weigh both, but be not carried away with the impertinent discourses of them that name, as well innocent men as guilty. Proceed judicially, and spare none where ye find just cause to punish: But let your proceedings be according to Law; and remember that Laws have not their Eyes in their Necks, but in their Foreheads; for the Moral Reason for the punishment of Vices in all Kingdoms and Common-wealths, is, because of the breach of Laws standing in force: for none can be punished for breach of Laws by Predestination, before they be made.

There is yet one particular that I am to remember you of. I hear that Sir Henry Telverton (who is now in the Tower, upon a Sentence given in the Star-Chamber against him, for deceiving my Trust) is touched concerning a Warrant Dormant which he made, while he was my Attorney. I protest I never heard of this Warrant Dormant before; and I hold it as odious a matter as any is before you. And, if for respect to me, ye have forbore to meddle with him in Examination, because he is my Prisoner, I do here freely remit him unto you, and put him into your hands.

And this is all I have to say unto you at this time, wishing you to proceed justly and nobly, according to the Orders of your House; and I pray God to bless you; and you may assure your selves of My Assistance. Wishing, that what I have said this day among you, may be entered into the Records of this House.

The Lords pronounced Sentence upon Sir Giles Mompeffon, who was fled beyond Sea.

1. That he shall be Degraded of the Order of Knighthood, with reservation of the Dignity of his Wife and Children.
2. That he shall stand perpetually in the degree of his Person, Outlawed for Misdemeanor and Trespasse.
3. That his Testimony be received in no Court, nor be to be of any Inquisition or Jury.
4. That he shall be excepted out of all General Pardons to be hereafter granted.
5. That he shall be imprisoned during Life.
6. That he shall not approach within twelve Miles of the Court, or Prince, nor of the Kings High Court usually held at Westminster.
7. That the King's Majesty shall have the profit of his Lands for Life, and all his Goods and Chattels so forfeited; and that he shall undergo Fine and Ransom; which was set at Ten thousand pounds.
8. Disabled to hold or receive any Office under the King, or for the Common-wealth.
9. That he shall be ever held an infamous person.
10. And his Majesty added therunto, Perpetual Banishment.

Sir Francis Michel, a Projector, and Mompeffon's Compartner, was Fined One thousand Pounds, Degraded, and imprisoned in the same place in Finsbury-Fields, which he had prepared for others; for the Tower was thought too honourable for such a person. He rode likewise from Westminster into London with his Face to the Horse-tail. Likewise the King revoked his Letters-Patents, Commissions, and Proclamations concerning Inns and Ale-houses, and the Manufactures of Gold and Silver-Thread.

To these Reforms the King gave Encouragements by his third Speech in Parliament, wherein he declared much against Corruption and Bribery in Judicatures; professing, That no person should be preferred before the publick Good, and that no Offender should go unpunished. In the same Speech he gave them thanks for the Subsidies given in the beginning of the Parliament, and for the Title of the Grant; and proceeded to open his present State in relation to his Son-in-Law, the Prince Elector Palatine; how the Sums granted by the Acts of Subsidy were taken up before-hand for the Defence of the Palatinate, and the Maintenance of his Children been expelled out of their Countrey, and for the raising of a Army for their Recovery: That he hath procured a short Truce, and did hope to obtain a General Peace. But the Charges of sending Ambassadors over Christendom, or an Army into the Palatinate, in case a Peace were not settled, could not be born, but by the grant of more Subsidies. Moreover, he protested before God, that he would not dissolve the Parliament, till the Matters in agitation were finished.

Lord Chancellor Bacon accused & convicted of Bribery

Soon after the Lord Chancellor Bacon was proceeded against, and a Conference of both Houses was held concerning him: Where, first the Commons observed his incomparable good parts, which they highly commended. Secondly, They magnified the place he held, from whence Bounty, Justice and Mercy were to be distributed to the Subjects; whither all great Causes were drawn, and from whence there was no Appeal in case of Injustice, or wrong done, save to the Parliament. Thirdly, He was accused of great Bribery and Corruption in this eminent Place, and the Particulars were laid open. Then they concluded, that this Matter which concerned a Person of so great Eminencie, might not depend long before their Lordships; but that the examination of Proofs be expedited, that as he should be found upon Trial, either he or his Accusers might be punished.

After this, the Marquis of Buckingham, Lord Admiral, declared to the House of Lords, that he had received a Letter from the Chancellor, expressing, that he was indisposed in health; but whether he lived or died, he would be glad to preserve his Honour and Fame as far as he was worthy; desiring to be maintained in their good Opinions without prejudice till his Cause was heard; that he should not trick up Innocency with cavillation, but plainly and ingenuously declare what he knew he remembered; being happy, that he had such Noble Peers, and Reverend Prelates to discern of his Cause; That he desired no privilege of Greatness for subterfuge of Guiltiness, but meant to deal fairly and plainly with their Lordships, and to put himself upon their Honours and Favours.

But the Charge came home upon him, inso-much that he abandoned all defence, and only implored a favourable Judgment in this humble Submission and Supplication to the House of Lords.

May it please your Lordships,

I Shall humbly crave at your hands a benign interpretation of that which I shall now write; for words that come from wasted Spirits, and oppressed minds, are more safe in being deposited to a noble construction, than being circled with any reserved Caution,

This being moved (and, as I hope, obtained of your Lordships) as a Protection to all that I shall say, I shall go on; but with a very strange entrance, as may seem to your Lordships, at first: For, in the midst of a state of as great affliction as, I think, a mortal man can endure (Honour being above Life) I shall begin with the professing of gladness in some things.

The first is, That hereafter the greatness of a Judge or Magistrate shall be no Sanctuary or Protection to him against guiltiness, which is the beginning of a Golden Work.

The next, That after this example, it is like that Judges will fly from any thing in the likeness of Fac. 19. Corruption (though it were at a great distance) as from a Serpent; which tends to the purging of the Courts of Justice, and reducing them to their honour and splendor. And in these two points (God is my witness) though it be my Fortune to be the Avail upon which these two effects are broken and wrought, I take no small comfort. But to pass from the motions of my heart (whereof God is my Judge) to the merits of my Cause, whereof your Lordships are Judges, under God and his Lieutenant; I do understand there hath been heretofore expected from me some Justification; and therefore I have chosen one only Justification, instead of all others, out of the Justification of Job. For after the clear submission and confession which I shall now make unto your Lordships, I hope I may say, and justify with Job, in these Words, I have not hid my sin, as did Adam, nor concealed my faults in my bottom. This is the only Justification which I will use.

It resteth therefore, that without Fig-leaves I do ingenuously confess and acknowledge, that having understood the Particulars of the Charge, not formally from the House, but enough to inform my Conscience and Memory: I find Matter sufficient and full, both to move me to desert my Defence, and to move your Lordships to condemn and censure me. Neither will I trouble your Lordships by singling these Particulars which I think might fall off. Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus uva? Neither will I prompt your Lordships to observe upon the Proofs where they come not home, or the Scruple touching the Credits of the Witnesses. Neither will I represent to your Lordships, how far a Defence might, in divers things, extenuate the Offence, in respect of the Time and Manner of the Guilt, or the like Circumstances; but only leave these things to spring out of your more Noble thoughts and observations of the Evidence and Examinations themselves, and charitably to wind about the Particulars of the Charge, here and there, as God shall put into your mind, and so submit my self wholly to your Piety and Grace.

And now I have spoken to your Lordships as Judges, I shall say a few words unto you as Peers and Prelates, humbly commending my Cause to your Noble Minds, and Magnanimous Affections.

Your Lordships are not simply Judges, but Parliamentary Judges; you have a further extent of Arbitrary Power than other Courts; and if you be not tied by ordinary course of Courts or Precedents, in points of Strictness and Severity, much less in points of Mercy and Mitigation: And yet if any thing which I shall move, might be contrary to your honorable and worthy End (the introducing a Reformation,) I should not seek it, But herein I beseech your Lordships to give me leave to tell you a Story.

Titus Manlius took away his Sons life, for giving Battel against the prohibition of his General: Not many years after, the like severity was pursued by Papirius Curfor, the Dictator, against Quint. Maximus; who being upon the point to be Sentenced, was by the intercession of some particular persons of the Senate, spared; whereupon Livy maketh this grave and gracious Observation, Neque minus firmata est Disciplina Militaris periculo Quinti Maximi, quam miserabili supplicio Titi Manlii. The Discipline of War was no less established by the questioning of Quintus Maximus, than by the punishment of Titus Manlius. And the same Reason is in the reformation of Justice; for the questioning of Men in eminent Places, hath the same terror, though not the same rigor with the Punishment.

But

But my Cause stays not there; for my humble desire Anno is, That his Majesty would take the Seal into his 1621. Hands; which is a great downfall, and may serve, I hope, in it self, for an expiation of my faults.

Therefore, if Mercy and Mitigation be in your Lordships power, and no way cross your ends, Why should I not hope of your favour and commiseration? Your Lordships will be pleased to behold your chief pattern, the King our Sovereign, a King of incomparable Clemency, and whose Heart is instructable for Wisdom and Goodness; And your Lordships will remember there sate not these Hundred years before, a Prince in your House, and never such a Prince, whose presence deserveth to be made memorable by Records, and Acts mixt of Mercy and Justice. Your selves are either Nobles, (and compassion ever beareth in the Veins of Noble Blood) or Reverend Prelates, who are the Servants of him that would not break the bruised Reed, or quench the smoking Flax. You all sit upon a high Stage, and therefore cannot but be sensible of the change of humane conditions, and of the fall of any from high place.

Neither will your Lordships forget, that there are Vitia temporis, as well as Vitia hominis; and the beginning of Reformation hath the contrary power to the Pool of Bethesda; for, that had strength to cure him only that was first cast in, and this hath strength to hurt him only that is first cast in; and for my part, I wish it may stay there, and go no further.

Lastly, I assure myself, your Lordships have a Noble feeling of me, as a Member of your own Body, and one that in this very Session had some taste of your loving affections, which, I hope, was not a lightning before the death of them, but rather a spark of that grace, which now in the conclusion will more appear: And therefore my humble suit to your Lordships, is, That my penitent Submission may be my Sentence, the loss of my Seal my Punishment, and that your Lordships would recommend me to his Majesties Grace and Pardon for all that is past. God's holy Spirit be among you.

The Parliament not satisfied with this general Acknowledgment, do require the Chancellor, either to confess the particulars of the Charge, or they would descend to proof against him. Hereupon he came to an express and plain acknowledgment, even to confess his Servants receipt of a dozen of Buttons, as a gift, in a Cause depending before him; and put himself upon their Lordships mercy. And he further said, That he was never noted for an avaritious Man; and the Apostle saith, Covetousness is the root of all evil; and hoped their Lordships did find him in a state of Grace, for that in all particular Charges against him, there were few or none that were not almost two years old: whereas those that have the habit of Corruption, do commonly wax worse and worse; and for his Estate, it was so mean and poor, that his care was now chiefly to satisfy his Debts. The Lords afterwards pronounced him guilty of the Charge exhibited against him, and in the presence of the Commons gave sentence, That he should undergo Fine and Ransom, and be made incapable to bear Office, &c.

Sir Henry accused by the Commons.

Sir Henry Yelverton was Charged by the Commons, for committing divers persons for not entering into Bonds to restrain their own Trades: That he signed Dormant Warrants, having no authority for the same: That he advised the Patents of Gold and Silver Thread, to be re-assumed into the King's Hand, conceiving the same to be a Monopoly, and advised the Patentees to proceed by contract with the King: That Four thousand Quo Warranto's were granted by him touching the Patents of Inns, and but two to come to Trial: That he commenced divers Suits in the Exchequer, touching the Gold and Silver Thread, but did not prosecute the same. Fac. 19.

Which Charge being read unto him, he said, He thought himself happy in the midst of his Majesties disfavour, that his Majesty was pleased to cast the Grace upon him, as to send him to this Honourable House; That Innocence hath her present Answer, but Wisdom requires time. Therefore he made it his humble suit for time, to give his further Answer; adding withal, That the chief Complaint against him was, concerning the two Patents of Gold and Silver Thread, Inns and Osteries. He said, That if he deserved well of his Majesty, it was in that matter; That the King and Subjects were more abused by that Patent, than by any other; and that he suffered at that day for opposing that Patent, as he took it.

The King being informed of this passage in his Speech, came in person to the House of Peers, took notice thereof, saying, It seemed strange unto him, that Sir Henry Yelverton should be questioned here upon any thing, save the Patent of Gold and Silver Thread, for his Majesty did not conceive, that any matter was complained of against him touching the Inns and Osteries, whereof he was also examined: touching which Patent, Mompeffon had made a complaint to his Majesty, that Yelverton refused to send any Process of Quo Warranto against a multitude of Innkeepers; and his Majesty accepted Yelverton's modest answer, That he disliked those proceedings against his Subjects. His Majesty, to clear himself, did lay open the many former just dislikes which he had against Sir Henry, and his gentle proceedings against him for the same. And when His Majesty intended to question him, Buckingham Lord Admiral besought him not to think of any private wrongs done to his Lordship; His Majesty added, That in the examination of the business touching the Charter of London, Yelverton had first justified himself by his Majesty's Warrant; and that by that Warrant, he might have given away all London from him; yet at length he made a good Submission in the beginning, but in the end he said, he had not wronged His Majesty in his Prerogative. And sith that now Yelverton doth tax His Majesty, that he suffered for his good service done, His Majesty requires the Lords, who are able to do him justice, to punish Yelverton for his slander.

Sir Henry Yelverton coming shortly after before the Lords [gave his particular Answer to each particular Charge, in serie temporis, and] spake as followeth.

I Cannot but present my self this day before your Highness, and my Lords with much fear, with more grief; for I am compassed with so many terrors from His Majesty, as I might well hide my Head with Adam. His Lordship's displeasure (meaning Buckingham) wounds me more, than the Conscience of any of these facts; yet had I rather die, than the Commonweal should so much as receive a scratch from me. I that in none of my actions feared that great Man, on whom they (viz. Sir Edward Villers and Sir Giles Mompeffon) did depend, much less would I fear them, who were but his shadow. But, my most noble Lords, knowing that my Lord of Buckingham was ever at His Majesty's Hand, ready upon every occasion to hew me down, out of the honest fear of a Servant, not to offend so gracious a Master, as His Majesty.

Majesty hath ever been to me, I did commit them
Anno (VIZ. the Silk-men.)

1621. And speaking concerning the Patent of Inns, he said, I cannot herein but bemoan my unhappiness, that in the last cause, labouring by all lawful means to advance the honest profit of His Majesty; and in this (with the sight almost of my own ruine) to preserve His Majesty's honour, and the quiet of the People, I am yet drawn in question, as if I had equally dishonoured His Majesty in both.

When Sir Giles saw I would not be wooed to offend His Majesty in his direction, I received a Message by Mr. Emmerfon, sent me from Sir Giles, That I would run myself upon the Rocks, and that I should not hold my place long, if I did thus withstand the Patent of Inns, or to this effect. Soon after came Sir Giles himself, and like an Heralds at Arms, told me to this effect, He had a message to tell me from the Lord of Buckingham, that I should not hold my Place a Month, if I did not conform my self in better measure to the Patent of Inns; for my Lord had obtained it by his Favour, and would maintain it by his Power: How could I but startle at this message? For I saw, here was a great assuming of Power to himself, to place and displace an Officer. I saw my self cast upon two main Rocks, either treacherously to forsake the standing his Majesty had set me in, or else to endanger my self by a by-blow, and so hazard my Fortune.

I humbly beseech your Lordships: Nature will struggle when she sees her place and means of living thus assaulted; for now it was come to this, Whether I would obey His Majesty, or my Lord, if Sir Giles spake true. Yet I resolved in this, to be as stubborn as Mordecai, not to stoop or pass those gracious bounds His Majesty had prescribed me.

Soon after, I found the message in part made good; for all the Profits almost of my Place were diverted from me, and turned into an unusual Channel, to one of my Lord's Worthies, that I retained little more than the name of Attorney. It became so fatal and so penal, that it became almost the loss of a Suit to come to me. My place was but the seat of Winds and Tempests.

Howbeit, I dare say, if my Lord of Buckingham had but read the Articles exhibited in this place against Hugh Spencer, and had known the danger of placing and displacing Officers about a King, he would not have pursued me with such bitterness. But by opposing my Lord in this Patent of Inns, in the Patent of Ale-houses, in the Irish Customs, and in Sir Robert Naunton's Deputation of his place in the Court of Wards: These have been my overthrow, and for these I suffer at this day in my Estate and Fortune (not meaning to say, I take it, but as I know, and for my humble oppositions to his Lordship) above Twenty thousand pounds.

The King was offended at Tolverton's Speech, for that he reflected upon the King himself, and that he had accused the Duke of Buckingham; whereupon the Lords, upon the King's condescension, took the matter against Sir Henry into their Debate, and Fined him Ten thousand Marks for the Words spoken against His Majesty, and enjoined him submission to the King; and for those spoken against the Duke Five thousand Marks, the like submission to the Duke also: The Duke pardons the Fine to him given, and Sir Henry thanks his Lordship. And the House of Peers agreed to move His Majesty to mitigate Sir Henry's Fine, which was done, and he set at Liberty; and the Duke was reconciled to him, and he was afterwards made a Judge, for that he was a person very knowing in the Common Law.

The Treaties with the Emperor and King of Spain are now openly spoken against, and the People, by some ill minded-men, enraged against Count Gondomar, who set upon him against the Law of Nations, openly in the Streets of London, reviling him and calling him Devil, &c. for which one Person suffered (the King, as he had reason in honour, being extremely offended at this their excess) and was Whipped publicly from Algate to Temple-bar. Sir Robert Mansel was sent into the Mediterranean, against the Pirates of Algiers, and performed gallantly, Firing the Pirates Ships in their own Harbour; though an unworthy reflection is cast upon this Action by the Collector, p. 34. First Part.

That hereby our Strength was diverted, our Treasure exhausted, and the Spanish Fleet and Merchants secured from those Robbers, and Spain left at liberty to assist in subduing the Palatinate.

In Germany, the Emperor Ferdinand had well nigh subdued all the revolted Countries, and Tryes and Condemns the Authors of the late Commotions, some to perpetual Imprisonment, others to Death, and fixes the Heads of some upon the chief Towers in Prague. All these proceedings are declared against by the Marquess of Jagerndorfe, as Barbarous and Cruel, whilst the Emperor justifies his Proceedings as necessary and lawful, against those who moved Sedition, and not in the cause of Religion.

The King, by the Treasurer, signifies his pleasure to adjourn the Parliament, during the heats of Summer, for fear of Infection, signifying to the Houses that he had already reformed the Courts of Justice, call'd in the Patents for Gold and Silver Thread, Inns and Osteries, and that he would encourage the Bill against Monopolies. This Adjournment is taken ill by the Commons, and with the Lords intend a Petition, which the King resents, and tells them, That a Petition of this nature could not be pleasing to his Majesty, it seeming to derogate from his Prerogative, who alone hath Power to Call, Adjourn, and Determine Parliaments. The Commons at a further Conference, declared their hearty sorrow and passionate grief at the King's resolution, which, they said, cut off the performance of what they had consulted, and promised for the publick weal.

The Lords sitting in their Robes, the King came and made a Speech, takes notice of his Message to both Houses, and gave their Lordships thanks for obeying the same, and acknowledging his power to Call, Adjourn, and Dissolve Parliaments, and for refusing to joyn with the Commons in the Petition for Non-adjournment. And whereas some had given out, that no good had been done this Parliament, he put them in mind, that the two Patents, grievous to the Commonwealth, were called in, and that the Parliament had censured the offenders for an example to all ages. And, if they desired it, he offered them eight or ten days longer Sitting, to expedite Bills; but said, that at the request of the Commons he would not grant it. The Lords had a Conference with the Commons; after which, they moved the King to continue their Sitting for fourteen days; which was granted, and the Commons were satisfied with the resolution of Adjournment.

A Committee of both Houses afterwards attending the King, he told them how ill he took resents it, that the Commons should dispute his reasons of Anno of Adjournment; all power being in him alone to Call, Adjourn, Prorogue, and Dissolve Parliaments. And on June 4. he declared for an Adjournment till November following; and that he will in the mean time, of his own Authority, redress Grievances. And his Majesty, as General Bishop of the Land, did offer his prayers to God for both the Houses; and admonished them, That when they go into the Country, they give his people a good account and satisfaction, both as to the Proceedings, and to the Adjournment of the Parliament.

The House of Commons, immediately before their recess, taking to Heart the miseries of the Palatinate, resolved, that the drawing back in so good a Cause, should not be charged on their slackness; and thereupon drew up this following Declaration, with an universal consent.

The Commons Declaration touching the Palatinate.

THE Commons assembled in Parliament taking into most serious consideration the present state of the King's Children abroad, and the generally afflicted estate of the true Professors of the same Christian Religion, professed by the Church of England, in Foreign parts; and being touched with a true sense and fellow-feeling of their distresses, as Members of the same Body, do, with unanimous consent, in the name of themselves, and the whole Body of the Kingdom (whom they represent) declare unto His most excellent Majesty, and to the whole World, their hearty grief and sorrow for the same; and do not only join with them in their humble and devout prayers unto Almighty God, to protect his true Church, and to avert the dangers now threatened, but also with one heart and voice do solemnly protest, That if His Majesties pious endeavours by Treaty, to procure their peace and safety, shall not take that good effect which is desired in Treaty; (wherefore they humbly beseech His Majesty not to suffer any longer delay) That then upon signification of His Majesties pleasure in Parliament, they shall be ready, to the utmost of their powers, both with their Lives and Fortunes, to assist him so, as by the Divine help of Almighty God, (which is never wanting unto those, who, in his fear, shall undertake the defence of his own Cause) he may be able to do that with his Sword, which by a peaceable course shall not be effected.

After the recess of Parliament, the King, by Proclamation, Declared his Grace to his Subjects in matters of publick Grievance: And taking notice, that many great affairs, debated in Parliament, could not be brought to perfection in so short a time, and that the Commons thought it convenient to continue the same Session in course of Adjournment; and withall observing, that divers of those particulars required a speedy determination and settlement for his Peoples good, and that they are of that condition and quality, as that he needeth not the assistance of Parliament to reform the same, and would have reformed them before the Parliament, if the true state of his Subjects Grievances had been made known unto him, he hath determined, and doth declare an immediate redress therein, by his own Regal Authority, as in the business of Informers, of Mischances of Ministers in Chancery, of the Patents for Gold and Silver-Thread, for Licensing Pedlars and Petty-Chapmen, for the sole Dressing of Arms, for the Exportation of Lints and Shreds, and for the sole making of Tobacco-pipes, Cards, and the like. And besides the redress of these Grievances, he will enlarge his Grace unto other kinds for the Subjects ease: And that both his own, and ears of his Privy-Council shall be open to his Peoples modest and just Complaints.

Moreover, a second Proclamation was issued forth against excess of licentious speech touching State-affairs: For, notwithstanding the strictness of the King's former Command, the Peoples inordinate liberty of unreverend speech increased daily. Wherefore the King threatened severity, as well against the Concealers of such Discourses, as against the boldness of audacious Tongues and Pens.

Puts forth another Proclamation against talking of State-affairs.

In July following, Dr. John Williams Dean of Westminster, was sworn Lord Keeper of the great Seal of England, and the King being solicited from Spain and Rome to take of the penal Laws, execution from the Papists; declared openly in Parliament, That if that party should grow insolent, his people might justly count him unworthy to Reign, if he gave them not extraordinary punishment, &c.

And yet for all this the Collector hath that unhandson reflection upon the King, that therein he was intangled in the ways he had chosen; unhandsonly reflecting on the King's proceedings in the Spanish Match according to his usual method.

About the same time the Lord Digby was sent Ambassador to the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria. The Heads of whose Embassie were these, That the Elector Palatine, and the Children of the King of Great Britain his Master, might be received into the Emperor's favour, and restored to all their Hereditary Goods, and the Prince Elector himself to the Title which he enjoyed before the troubles of Bohemia: That the Ban Imperial published against him, should be revoked, and the execution thereof suspended; which being done, the King of Great Britain will undertake, that the Palatine shall render due obedience to his Imperial Majesty, and submit to Conditions meet and honest.

To these Demands he received Answer, That the Emperor had a very good will to gratifie the King of Great Britain, and those other Kings and Princes that had made the same request for the Palatine: But he could not grant it, because the Palatine to this hour useth the Counsels of many of the Electors and Princes, in opposition to the Emperor: And when the Emperor had agreed to a Cessation of Arms, according to the desires of the King of Great Britain, and had ordered the suspending all Hostility in the Lower Palatinate, at the same time the Palatine gave Commission to raise Forces, and do acts of Hostility, which was put in execution by Count Mansfield and Marquis Jagerndorf, to begin new troubles in Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia. Nevertheless the Emperor, having appointed an Assembly to meet at Ratisbone, will there make known the desires of the King of Great Britain, who shall know what Resolution

The Emperor's Reply to those Demands.

Resolution is there taken concerning the Palatine.
Anno 1621. Albert Archduke of Flanders, at the request of King James, had made intercession for the Palgrave. After his decease, the Archduchess his Wife continued the same mediation by Letters to the Emperor. And withal, the King's Ambassador further proposed these Conditions for a Cessation of Arms, and a Suspension of the Ban Imperial; That Mansfeld and Jagerndorf shall observe the Agreement; otherwise, the Prince Palatine shall revoke their Commissions, and declare them his Enemies. And that their Garrisons in Bohemia shall be rendred to the Emperor.

The Emperor's Answer. The Emperor answered the Archduchess, That the Archduke her Husband, in his life-time, had exceedingly recommended the Interposition of the King of Great Britain, and the great prudence of that King in not approving the actions of the Palatine: Which Recommendation, as to a Treaty and Cessation of Arms, he shall entertain, and consult thereupon with the Deputies of the Electors and Princes of the Empire.

The English Ambassador goes to the Duke of Bavaria. The English Ambassador departed from Vien-na to the Duke of Bavaria, who had then entered the Upper Palatinate, and had published the Emperor's Declaration against Mansfeld and his Adherents, and exhorted the States and Princes there to execute the same; and the rather, for that he had not heard of any King, Elector, Prince, or State; no, not so much as the King of Great Britain, that had approved the seditious Revolt of the Bohemians, except some few States and Princes, who for interest did countenance the same. The Ambassador found the Bavarian acting hostility, and committing great spoils in the Countrey, and resolving to reject all propositions of Peace or Cessation. Nor could the Emperor agree upon any Truce without the Duke of Bavaria: First, In respect of his Agreement, neither to make War or Peace, without the consent of the said Duke; which hapned, because upon the former Truce made with the Archduke, the Souldiers that were in the Lower Palatinate, and wanted employment, came up into the Higher Palatinate to Count Mansfeld, and much infested the Duke of Bavaria. Secondly, In regard the Duke of Bavaria had a great part of Austria in pledge for his satisfaction. Thirdly, Because the Emperor was barred from all other passages, but through Bavaria, by Bethlem Gabor, Jagerndorf, and Budi-an. And the Duke, upon receipt of the Emperors Letter touching the Truce, sent the Lord Digby a deriding answer, That there was no need to labour for a Truce, for the Wars were at an end, in that he had agreed with Count Mansfeld; nor did he doubt of keeping both Palatinates in peace, till the Emperor and Palgrave were agreed. So the King received but a slender return of the Lord Digby's Embassie to the Emperor, for the restoring the Elector Palatine.

But the Emperors full meaning in this business may be found at large in his own Letter to Don Baltazar de Zuniga, a prime Counsellor of State in Spain, to be by him represented to the King his Master, to this effect.

The Emperor's Letter to Don Baltazar de Zuniga. That beholding the admirable Providence of God over him, he is bound to use that most notable Victory to the honour of God, and the extirpation of all Seditions and Factions, which are nourished chiefly among the Calvinists; lest that judgment which the Prophet threatned the King of Israel should fall upon him, Because Fac. 19. thou hast dismissed a man worthy of death, thy Soul shall be for his Soul. The Palatine keeps now in Holland, not only exiled from the Kingdom which he rashly attempted, but dispoiled almost of all his own Territories, expecting, as it were, the last cast of Fortune: whom if by an impious kind of commiseration, and his subtle petitioning, he shall be perswaded to restore, and nourish in his bosom as a troden half-living Snake, what can he expect less than a deadly sting from him, who, in regard of his guilt, can never be faithful, but will alway gape for occasions to free himself from his fears, and the Genius of whose Sect will make him an Enemy, or an unsound Friend, to the House of Austria, and all other Catholick Princes?

Wherefore firmly casting in his mind, that the Palatine cannot be restored, he hath freely offered the Electorate to the Duke of Bavaria, a most eager Defender of the Catholick Cause; by which means the Empire will always remain in the Hand of Catholicks, and so by consequence in the House of Austria. And in so doing, he shall take away all hope from the Palatine, and those that sollicite so importunately for his restitution. And it is to be hoped, that the Lutheran Princes, especially the Duke of Saxony, will not so far disallow this translation, as to take up Arms, seeing Charles the Fifth, upon a far lighter cause, deprived John Frederick Duke of Saxony of the Electorate, and conferred it on Maurice, this Dukes Great Uncle. Besides, no less is the Lutherans hatred of the Calvinists, than of the Catholicks.

Such were the effects which the King's treating had wrought with the Emperor.

The Parliament that was to meet November the Fourteenth, the King, by Proclamation, adjourned to the Eighth of February, and expressed the cause to be the unseasonableness of the time of the year. But this long Recess was shortened, and the King declared, That upon important Reasons, he had altered his former Resolutions, and did adjourn it for no longer time, than from the Fourteenth to the Twentieth of this instant November.

Upon which day it re-assembled, and the King being absent, by reason of his indisposition in health, commanded a Message to be delivered to both Houses, by the Lord Keeper, the Lord Digby, and the Lord Treasurer.

The Parliament begins again, Nov. 20.

In the first place he acquainted the Two Houses with his Majesty's indisposition of health, which was the occasion of his absence at the opening of the Parliament; yet he could not say he was absent, so long as he was represented by a Son, who was as dear to the Kingdom as to his Majesty. As to the occasion of calling the Parliament, by way of Antecedent, he took notice of several effects of his Majesties gracious care over the Nation, since the last Recess of the Parliament, in his Majesties answering several Petitions concerning Trade, Importation of Bullion, Conservation of Coin in the Land, and Prohibiting the Transportation of Iron Ordnance; and that his Majesty by his Proclamation reformed Thirty six or Thirty seven several matters, complained of as publick Grievances, all of them without the least Truckling or Merchandising with the People, a thing usual in former times.

The substance of the Lord Keeper's Speech.

times. He further said, That his Majesty did principally fix the occasion of the calling a Parliament upon the Declaration recorded, and divulged far and near by the Representative Commonalty of this Kingdom, to assist his Majesty to carry on the War to recover the Palatinate; yet withal, his Lordship gave an account, how his Majesty, since the last Parliament, encouraged to travel a little longer in his pious endeavours to procure a Peace by way of Treaty, and that the Lord Digby was sent Ambassador upon that occasion, and since returned, but not with such success as was to be hoped for. He minded both Houses of one Heroical Act of his Majesties, since the last Parliament; in the advancement of Forty thousand pounds, to keep together a Body of an Army in the Lower Palatinate, which otherwise had been dissolved before this Parliament could be assembled: And that unless the Parliament take further resolution, and imitate rather antient than Modern principles, and be expeditious in what they do, the Army in the Palatinate will fall to the ground: And lastly, told them, That his Majesty did resolve, that this Parliament should continue till seven or eight days before the Festivals, and to be renewed again the eighth of February, to continue for the Enacting of Laws, and perioding things of Reformation, as long as the necessity of the State shall require the same.

L. Digby's Speech. After the Lord Keeper had done, the Lord Digby (having received a command from his Majesty to that purpose) gave a brief account of his Negotiation with the Archduke about the Treaty of Peace; how the Archduke consented thereunto, and writ accordingly to the Emperor and the King of Spain of his proceedings; who also writ to Spinola for a Cessation of Arms, the Archduke having the command of the Spanish Forces in Germany; but the Duke of Bavaria would not consent thereunto. And the Lord Digby informed the Two Houses, that by the carriage of the Duke of Bavaria, and by other circumstances, he did evidently discover, That from the beginning that Duke affected to get unto himself the Palatinate, and the Title of Elector. He further declared, That if Count Mansfeld was not speedily supplied, he could not keep his Army together. Then he gave an account, how bravely Sir Horatio Vere had behaved himself in the Palatinate, and that, by his wisdom and valor, there was kept from the Enemy, Heidelberg, Mainheim, and Frankendale; the last of which places had then endured a months Siege. He also spoke honorably of Captain Burroughs, and concluded, That the fittest redress was, to furnish and keep up the Army already there; which must be done by supplies of Money, and more Forces must be prepared against the next Spring, that we may have there an Army of our own, for the strengthening of the Palatinate, and encouragement of the Princes of the Union.

L. Treasurer's Speech. Then the Lord Treasurer spake, and acquainted both Houses; How empty the King's Coffers were, and how he had assisted the Palatine, and Princes of the Union, with great sums, which had exhausted his Treasure, and that his Majesty was much in debt.

Nevertheless, though the King declared for War, he pursued Peace, and resolved to close with Spain, hoping to heal the Breach by that Alliance. The Commons in the mean Petition and Remonstrate to the King, but grant him no money, though they had before declared they would as-list him in the recovery of the Palatinate with their Lives and Fortunes.

Fac. 19.

Most Gracious and Dread Sovereign,

WE Your Majesties most Humble and Loyal Subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses, now assembled in Parliament, who represent the Commons of Your Realm, full of hearty sorrow, to be deprived of the comfort of Your Royal Presence, the rather, for that it proceeds from the want of Your health, wherein we all unfeignedly do suffer; In all humble manner calling to mind Your Gracious Answer to our former Petition concerning Religion; which, notwithstanding Your Majesties Pious and Princely Intentions, hath not produced that good effect, which the danger of these times doth seem to us to require: And finding how ill Your Majesties goodness hath been requited by Princes of different Religion, who even in time of Treaty, have taken opportunity to advance their own ends, tending to the subversion of Religion; and disadvantage of Your affairs, and the estate of Your Children: By reason whereof, Your ill affected Subjects at home, the Popish Recusants, have taken too much encouragement, and are dangerously increased in their number, and in their insolencies. We cannot but be sensible thereof, and therefore humbly represent what we conceive to be the causes of so great and growing mischiefs, and what be the Remedies.

I. The Vigilancy and Ambition of the Pope of Rome, and his dearest Son, the one aiming at as large a Temporal Monarchy, as the other at a Spiritual Supremacy.

II. The Devilish Positions and Doctrines, whereon Popery is built, and taught with Authority to their Followers, for advancement of their Temporal ends.

III. The distressed and miserable estate of the Professors of true Religion in Foreign parts.

IV. The disastrous accidents to Your Majesties Children abroad, expressed with rejoicing, and even with contempt of their Persons.

V. The strange Confederacy of the Princes of the Popish Religion, aiming mainly at the advancement of theirs, and subverting of ours, and taking the advantages conducing to that end upon all occasions.

VI. The great and many Armies raised, and maintained at the charge of the King of Spain, the Chief of that League.

VII. The expectation of the Popish Recusants of the Match with Spain, and feeding themselves with great hopes of the consequences thereof.

VIII. The interposing of Foreign Princes and their Agents, in the behalf of Popish Recusants, for connivance and favour unto them.

IX. Their open and usual resort to the Houses, and, which is worse, to the Chapels of Foreign Ambassadors.

X. Their

The Commons Petition and Remonstrate to the King.

Anno 1621. X. Their more than usual concourse to the City, and their frequent Conventicles and conferences there.

XI. The education of their Children in many several Seminaries and Houses of their Religion in Foreign parts, appropriated to the English fugitives.

XII. The Grants of their just Forfeitures intended by your Majesty, as a Reward of Service to the Grantees; but beyond your Majesty's intention, transferred or compounded for, at such mean rates, as will amount to little less than a Toleration.

XIII. The Licentious Printing and dispersing of Popish and Seditious Books, even in the time of Parliament.

XIV. The swarms of Priests and Jesuits, the common Incendiaries of all Christendom, dispersed in all parts of your Kingdom.

And from these Causes, as bitter Roots, we humbly offer to your Majesty, That we foresee and fear there will necessarily follow very dangerous effects both to Church and State. For,

I. The Popish Religion is incompatible with ours, in respect of their Positions.

II. It draweth with it an unavoidable dependency on Foreign Princes.

III. It openeth too wide a gap for Popularity, to any who shall draw too great a party.

IV. It hath a restless spirit, and will strive by these gradations, if it once get but a continuance, it will press for a Toleration; if that should be obtained, they must have an Equality; from thence they will aspire to Superiority, and will never rest till they get a Subversion of the true Religion.

The Remedies against these growing Evils, which, in all humility, we offer unto your most Excellent Majesty, are these.

I. That seeing this inevitable necessity is fallen upon your Majesty, which no wisdom or providence of a peaceable and pious King can avoid, your Majesty would not omit this just occasion, speedily and effectually to take your Sword into your hand.

II. That once undertaken upon so honorable and just grounds, your Majesty would resolve to pursue, and more publickly avow the aiding of those of our Religion in Foreign parts, which doubtless would reunite the Princes and States of the Union, by these disasters disheartned and disbanded.

III. That your Majesty would propose to your self to manage this War with the best advantage, by a diversion or otherwise, as in your deep judgment shall be found fittest, and not to rest upon a War in these parts only, which will consume your Treasure, and discourage your People.

IV. That the bent of this War, and point of your Sword, may be against that Prince (whatsoever opinion of Potency he hath) whose Armies and Treasures have first diverted, and since maintained the War in the Palatinate.

V. That for securing of our Peace at home, your Majesty would be pleased to review the parts of our Petition, formerly delivered unto your Majesty, and hereby annexed, and to put in execution, Fac. 19. by the care of choice Commissioners to be thereunto especially appointed, the Laws already, and hereafter to be made for preventing of dangers by Popish Recusants, and their wonted evasions.

VI. That to frustrate their hopes for a future Age, our most Noble Prince may be timely and happily married to one of our own Religion.

VII. That the Children of the Nobility and Gentry of this Kingdom, and of others ill-affected and suspected in their Religion, now beyond the Seas, may be forthwith called home by your means, and at the Charge of their Parents or Governors.

VIII. That the Children of Popish Recusants, or such whose Wives are Popish Recusants, be brought up, during their Minority, with Protestant School-masters and Teachers, who may sow, in their tender years, the seeds of true Religion.

IX. That your Majesty will be pleased speedily to revoke all former Licences for such Children and Youth to travel beyond the Seas, and not grant any such Licence hereafter.

X. That your Majesty's Learned Council may receive commandment from your Highness, carefully to look into former Grants of Recusants Lands, and to avoid them, if by Law they can; and that your Majesty will stay your hand from passing any such Grants hereafter.

This is the sum and effect of our humble Declaration, which we (no ways intending to press upon your Majesty's undoubted and Regal Prerogative) do with the fullness of our Duty and Obedience, humbly submit to your most Princely consideration: The glory of God, whose cause it is; the zeal of our true Religion, in which we have been born, and wherein (by God's grace) we are resolved to die; the safety of your Majesty's Person, who is the very life of your people; the happiness of your Children and Posterity; the honour and good of the Church and State, dearer unto us than our own lives, having kindled these affections truly devoted to your Majesty.

And seeing out of our duty to your Majesty, we have already resolved to give, at the end of this Session, one entire Subsidy, for the present relief of the Palatinate only, to be paid in the end of February next, which cannot well be effected but by passing a Bill in a Parliamentary course before Christmas; we most humbly beseech your Majesty (as our assured hope is) that you will then also vouchsafe to give life, by your Royal Assent, to such Bills, as before that time shall be prepared for your Majesty's honour, and the general good of your people: And that such Bills may be also accompanied (as hath been accustomed) with your Majesties gracious Pardon, which proceeding from your own most grace, may, by your Highness direction, be drawn to that latitude and extent, as may best lost with your Majesties bounty and goodness. And that not only Felons and Criminal Offenders may take benefit thereof, but that your good Subjects may receive ease thereby. And if it shall so stand with your good pleasure, That it may extend to the relief of the old Debts & Duties to the Crown before the first Year of your Majesties Reign, to the discharge of Aliens without Licence, and misusing of Liberties and Oustre le Maine, before the first Summons of this Parliament, and of concealed Wardships, and not suing of Liberties, and Oustre le Maines, before the Twelfth year of your Majesties Reign. Which gracious favour would much comfort your good Subjects, and ease them from vexation, with little loss or prejudice to your own profit.

And we by our daily and devout Prayers to the Almighty, the Great King of Kings shall contend for a Blessing upon our endeavours; and for your Majesties long and happy Reign over us, and for your Children after you, for many and many Generations.

At this time the Protestants are ill treated in France.

And indeed the Protestants are Attacked every where; in Germany, by the House of Austria and Bavaria; in France, by Lewis the 13th, who Besieged them in person in Montauban; and by the Duke of Guise, and Count of Soissons in Rochel; whilst the King of England prevailed little on them by the Embassies of the Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and the Viscount Doncaster, who was sent afterwards on the same Errand.

The King hearing of the foregoing Remonstrance, wrote the Letter following to the Speaker.

To Our Trusty and Well-beloved,
Sir Thomas Richardson Knight,
Speaker of the House of COMMONS.

Mr. Speaker,

The Kings Letter to Sir Thomas
Richardson

WE have heard, by divers Reports, to our great Grief, that our distance from the Houses of Parliament, caused by our Indisposition of Health, hath imboldened some fiery and popular Spirits of some of the House of Commons, to argue and debate publickly of the Matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high Dishonour, and Breach of Prerogative Royal. These are therefore to Command you, to make known, in our Name, unto the House, That none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our Government, or deep Matters of State, and namely not to deal with our Dearest Sons March with the Daughter of Spain, nor to touch the Honour of that King, or any other our Friends and Confederates; and also not to meddle with any mans Particulars, which have their due motion in our ordinary Courts of Justice. And whereas we hear, they have sent a Message to Sir Edward Sandys, to know the Reasons of his late restraint, you shall in our Name resolve them, That it was not for any Misdemeanor of his in Parliament, but to put them out of doubt of any Question of that Nature that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them in our Name, That we think our self very free and able to punish any mans Misdemeanors in Parliament, as well during their Sitting, as after; which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any mans insolent behaviour there that shall be ministered unto us; Fac. 19. and if they have already touched any of these points, which we have forbidden, in any Petition of theirs, which is to be sent unto us, it is our Pleasure that you shall tell them, that except they reform it before it come to our Hands, we will not deign the hearing nor answering of it.

Dated at New-Market, Dec. 3. 1621.

Upon the Receipt hereof they again Petition and Remonstrate.

Most Dread and Gracious Sovereign,

WE your most humble and Loyal Subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burghesses, Assembled in the Commons House of Parliament, full of grief, and unspeakable sorrow, through the true sense of your Majesties Displeasure, expressed by your Letter lately sent to our Speaker, and by him related, and read unto us: Yet comforted again with the assurance of your Grace and Goodness, and of the Sincerity of our own intentions and proceedings, whereon with confidence we can rely, in all humbleness beseech your most Excellent Majesty, that the Loyalty and Dutifulness of as Faithful and Loving Subjects as ever served, or lived under a Gracious Sovereign, may not undeservedly suffer by the misinformation of partial and uncertain Reports, which are ever unfaithful Intelligencers: But that your Majesty would, in the clearness of your own Judgment, first vouchsafe to understand from our selves, and not from others, what our humble Declaration and Petition (resolved upon by the universal Voice of the House, and proposed with your Gracious favour, to be Presented unto your Sacred Majesty) doth contain. Upon what occasion we entered into consideration of those things which are therein contained, with what dutiful respect to your Majesty, and your Service, we did consider thereof, and what was our true intention thereby. And that when your Majesty shall thereby truly discern our dutiful affections, you will, in your Royal Judgment, free us from those heavy Charges, wherewith some of our Members are burdened, and where in the whole House is involved.

And we humbly beseech your Majesty, that you would not hereafter give Credit to private Reports, against all or any of the Members of our House, whom the whole have not censured, until your Majesty have been truly informed thereof from our selves; and that in the mean time, and ever, we may stand upright in your Majesties Grace and good Opinion, than which no worldly consideration is, or can be dearer unto us.

When your Majesty had re-assembled us in Parliament by your Royal Commandment, sooner than we expected, and did vouchsafe, by the mouths of three honourable Lords, to impart unto us the weighty another Petition.

weighty occasions moving your Majesty thereunto; and from them we did understand these Particulars:

That notwithstanding your Princely and Pious endeavours to procure Peace, the time is now come, that Janus Temple must be opened.

That the voice of Bellona must be heard, and not the voice of the Turtle.

That there was no hope of Peace, nor any Truce to be obtained, no not for a few daies.

That Your Majesty must either abandon Your own Children, or engage your self in a War, wherein consideration is to be had, what foot, what horse, what Money will be sufficient.

That the Lower Palatinate was seized upon by the Army of the King of Spain, as Exerctor of the Ban there in quality of Duke of Burgundy, as the Upper Palatinate was by the Duke of Bavaria.

That the King of Spain, at his own Charge, had now at least five Armies on foot.

That the Princes of the Union were disbanded, but the Catholick League remained firm, whereby those Princes so dissevered, were in danger, one by one, to be ruined.

That the estate of those of the Religion in Foreign parts was miserable; and, that out of these considerations we were called to a War, and forthwith to advise for a Supply for keeping the Forces in the Palatinate from disbanding, and to foresee the means for raising and maintaining the Body of an Army for the War, against the Spring. We therefore, out of our Zeal to Your Majesty and Your Posterity, with more alacrity and celerity than ever was presented in Parliament, did address our selves to the Service commended unto us. And although we cannot conceive, that the Honour and Safety of Your Majesty and Your Posterity, the Patrimony of Your Children invaded, and possessed by their Enemies, the welfare of Religion, and state of Your Kingdom, are matters at any time unfit for our deepest consideration in time of Parliament: And although before this time we were in some of these points silent, yet being now invited thereunto, and led on by so just an occasion, we thought it our Duties to provide for the present Supply thereof, and not only to turn our eyes on a War abroad, but to take care for the securing of our Peace at home, which the dangerous increase and insolency of Popish Reculants apparently, visibly, and sensibly did lead us unto. The consideration whereof did necessarily draw us truly to represent unto Your Majesty, what we conceive to be the Causes, what we feared would be the Effects, and what we hoped might be the Remedies of these growing Evils; among which, as incident and unavoidable, we fell upon some things, which seem to touch upon the King of Spain, as they have relation to Popish Reculants at home, to the Wars by him maintained in the Palatinate, against Your Majesties Children, and to his several Armies now on foot; yet, as we conceived, without touch of Dishonour to that King, or any other Prince Your Majesties Confederate.

In the discourse whereof, we did not assume to our selves any power to determine of any part thereof, nor intend to inroach or intrude upon the Sacred Bounds of Your Royal Authority, to whom, and to whom only, we acknowledge it doth belong to resolve of Peace and War, and of the Marriage of the most Noble Prince Your Son: But as your most Loyal and Humble Subjects and Servants, representing the whole Commons of your Kingdom (who have a large Interest in the happy and prosperous estate of Your Majesty, and Your Posterity, and of the flourishing estate of our Church and Commonwealth) did resolve out of our cares and fears, truly and plainly to demonstrate these things to Your Majesty, which we were not assured could otherwise come, so fully and clearly to Your knowledge; and that being done, to lay the same down at Your Majesties feet, without expectation of any other Answer of Your Majesty, touching these higher points, than what at Your good pleasure, and in Your own time should be held fit.

This being the effect of that we had formerly resolved upon, and these the Occasions and Reasons inducing the same, our humble Suit to Your Majesty, and Confidence is, That Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to receive, at the hands of these our Messengers, our former humble Declaration and Petition, and vouchsafe to read, and favourably to interpret the same; and that to so much thereof as containeth our humble Petition concerning Jesuits, Priests and Popish Reculants, the Passage of Bills, and granting Your Royal Pardon, You will vouchsafe an Answer unto us.

And whereas Your Majesty, by the general words of Your Letter, seemeth to restrain us from intermeddling with matters of Government, or Particulars which have their motion in in the Courts of Justice, the generality of which words, in the largeness of the extent thereof (as we hope, beyond Your Majesties intention) might involve those things, which are the proper Subjects of Parliamentary Occasions and Discourse.

And whereas Your Majesty doth seem to abridge us of the Ancient Liberty of Parliament for freedom of Speech, Jurisdiction, and Just Censure of the House, and other proceedings there (wherein, we trust in God, we shall never transgress the Bounds of Loyal and Dutiful Subjects;) a Liberty which we assure our selves, so Wise and so Just a King will not infringe, the same being our ancient and undoubted Right, and an Inheritance received from our Ancestors; without which we cannot freely debate, nor clearly discern of things in question before us, nor truly inform Your Majesty: In which we have been confirmed by Your Majesties most Gracious former Speeches and Messages.

Anno 1621. We are therefore now again enforced in all humbleness to pray Your Majesty to allow the same, and thereby to take away the Doubts and Scruples Your Majesties late Letter to our Speaker hath wrought upon us.

So shall we your Loyal and Loving Subjects ever acknowledge Your Majesties Justice, Grace and Goodness, and be ready to perform that Service to Your Majesty, which in the true affection of our hearts we profess, and pour out our daily and devout Prayers to the Almighty for your Majesties long Life, happy and religious Reign, and prosperous Estate, and for your Royal Posterity after you for ever.

The King rejected the first Petition, and gave to the latter this Answer following.

The Kings Answer to the latter Petition.

WE must here begin in the same fashion that we would have done, if the first Petition had come to our hands before we had made a stay thereof, which is to repeat the first Words of the late Queen of Famous Memory, used by her, in an Answer to an insolent Proposition made by a Polonian Ambassador unto her; that is, Legatum expectabamus, Heraldum accipimus. For we had great reason to expect, that the first Message from your House should have been a Message of Thanksgiving for our continued gracious Behaviour towards our People, since your last Recess, not only by our Proclamation of Grace, wherein were contained six or seven and thirty Articles, all of several points of Grace to the People, but also by the labour we took for the satisfaction of both Houses, in those three Articles recommended unto us in both their Names, by the Right Reverend Father in God, the Archbishop of Canterbury; and likewise for the good Government of Ireland, we are now in hand with, at your request; but not only have we heard no News of all this, but contrary, great Complaints of the danger of Religion within this Kingdom; tacitly implying our ill Government in this point. And we leave you to judge whether it be your duties, that are the Representative Body of our people, so to distaste them with our Government; whereas by the contrary it is your Duty, with all your endeavours, to kindle more and more a dutiful and thankful love in the Peoples hearts towards us, for our Just and Gracious Government.

Now whereas, in the very beginning of this your Apology, you tax us in fair terms of trusting uncertain Reports, and partial Informations concerning your proceedings, we wish you to remember, that we are an old and experienced King, needing no such Lessons; being in our Conscience freest of any King alive, from hearing or trusting idle Reports; which, so many of your House, as are nearest us, can bear witness unto you, if you would give as good ear to them, as you do to some Tribunal Orators among you: And, for proof in this particular, we have made your own Messengers confer your other Petitions sent by you, with the Copy thereof, which was sent us before; between which there is no difference at all; but that since our receiving the first Copy, you added a Conclusion into it, which could not come to our hands, till it was done by you, and your Messengers sent, which was all at one time. And if we had had no Copy of it beforehand, we must have received your first Petition to our great dishonour, before we had known what it contained; which would have enforced us to return you a far worse Answer than now we do; for then your Messengers had returned with nothing, but that we have judged your Petition unlawful, and unworthy of an Answer: For, as to your Conclusion thereof, it is nothing but Protestatio contraria facto; for, in the Body of your Petition, you usurp upon our Prerogative Royal, and meddle with things far above your reach, and then in the conclusion you protest the contrary; as if a Robber would take a mans Purse, and then protest he meant not to rob him. For, first, you presume to give us your advice concerning the Match of our dearest Son with some Protestant (we cannot say Princess, for we know none of these fit for him) and dissuade us from his Match with Spain, urging us to a present War with that King, and yet in the conclusion, forsooth, ye protest ye intend not to press upon our most undoubted and Regal Prerogatives; as if the petitioning of us in matters, that your selves confess ye ought not to meddle with, were not a meddling with them.

And whereas ye pretend, that ye were invited to this course by the Speeches of three Honourable Lords; yet by so much as your selves repeat of the Speeches, nothing can be concluded, but that we were resolved by War to regain the Palatinate, if otherwise we could not attain unto it. And you were invited to advise forthwith upon a Supply, for keeping the Forces in the Palatinate from Disbanding, and to foresee the means for the raising and maintenance of the Body of an Army for that War against the Spring. Now, what inference can be made upon this, that therefore we must presently denounce War against the King of Spain, break our dearest Son's Match, and match him to one of our Religion, let the World judge: The difference is no greater than if we would tell a Merchant that we had great need to borrow Money from him for raising an Army, that thereupon it would follow, that we were bound to follow his Advice in the direction of the War, and all things depending thereupon: but yet not contenting your selves with this excuse of yours, which indeed cannot hold water, ye come after to a direct contradiction to the Conclusion of your former Petition, saying, That the Honour and Safety of us and our Posterity, and the Patrimony of our Children, invaded and possessed by their Enemies, the welfare of Religion, and State of our Kingdom, are matters at any time not unfit for your deepest considerations in Parliament. To this Generality, we answer with the Logicians, That where all things are contained, nothing is omitted. So as this Plenipotency of yours, invests you in all power upon Earth, lacking nothing but the Popes to have the Keys also both of Heaven and Purgatory: And to this vast generality of yours, we can give no other Answer; for it will trouble all the best Lawyers in the House to make a good Commentary upon it: for so did the Puritan Ministers in Scotland bring all kind of Causes within the compass of their Jurisdiction; saying, That it

Anno 1621. it was the Churches Office to judge of Slander; and there could no kind of Crime or Fault be committed, but there was a slander in it, either against God, the King, or their Neighbour; and by this means they hooked in to themselves the cognizance of all Causes; or like Bellarmin's distinction of the Popes power over Kings, in Ordine ad Spiritualia, whereby he gives them all Temporal Jurisdiction over them.

But to give you a direct Answer to the Matter of War, for which you are so earnest: We confess, we rather expect you should have given us thanks for the so long maintaining a settled Peace in all our Dominions, whenas all our Neighbours about are in a miserable combustion of War; but, dulce bellum inexpertis. And we indeed find by experience, that a number of our Subjects are so pamper'd with Peace, as they are desirous of change, though they knew not what.

It is true, that we have ever professed (and in that mind, with God's Grace, we will live and die) that we will labour by all means possible, either by Treaty, or by Force, to restore our Children to their ancient Dignity and Inheritance; and whatsoever Christian Princes or Potentates will set themselves against it, we will not spare any lawful means to bring our so just and honourable purpose to a good end; neither shall the Match of our Son, or any other worldly respect, be preferred to this our resolution. For by our credit and intervention with the King of Spain, and the Arch-Dutchess, and her Husband, now with God, we preserved the Lower Palatinate one whole year from any further conquering in it, which in eight days space, in that time, might have easily been swallowed up by Spinola's Army, without any resistance. And in no better case was it now at our Ambassador the Lord Digby's coming through Heidelberg, if he had not extraordinarily succoured it.

But because we conceive, that ye couple this War of the Palatinate with the Cause of Religion, we must a little unfold your Eyes herein.

The beginning of this miserable War, which hath set all Christendom on fire, was not for Religion, but only caused by our Son in Law his hasty and harsh resolution, following evil counsel, to take to himself the Crown of Bohemia.

And that this is true, himself wrote Letters unto us at that time, desiring to give assurance both to the French King, and State of Venice, that his accepting of the Crown of Bohemia had no reference to the Cause of Religion, but only by reason of his right of Election (as he called it.) And we would be sorry that that aspersion should come upon our Religion, as to make it a good pretext for De-throning of Kings, and usurping their Crowns; And we would be loth that our People here should be taught that strange Doctrine: No, let us not so far wrong the Jesuits, as to rob them of their sweet Position and Practice in that very point.

And upon the other part, we assure our self so far of your charitable thoughts of us, that we would never have constantly denied our Son-in-Law both the Title and Assistance in that point, if we had been well perswaded of the Justice of his Quarrel. But to conclude, This unjust usurpation of the Crowns of Bohemia and Hungaria from the Emperor, hath given the Pope and all that Party too fair a ground, and opened them too wide a gate for curbing and oppressing of many thousands of our Religion in divers parts of Christendom.

And whereas you excuse your touching upon the King of Spain, upon occasion of the incidents by you repeated in that place, and yet affirm, that it is without any touch to his honour; we cannot wonder enough that ye are so forgetful both of your Words and Writs: For in your former Petition ye plainly affirm, That he affects the Temporal Monarchy of the whole Earth; than which, there can be no more malice uttered against any great King, to make all other Princes and Potentates both envy and hate him; but if ye list, it may easily be tried, whether that Speech touched him in honour or not, if ye shall ask him the question whether he means to assume to himself that title or no; for every King can best judge of his own honour. We omit the particular ejaculations of some foul-mouthed Orators in your House, against the honour of that King's Crown and State.

And touching your excuse of not determining any thing concerning the Match of our dearest Son, but only to tell your Opinion, and lay it down at our Feet: First, we desire to know, how you could have presumed to determine in that point, without committing of High Treason? And next, you cannot deny, but your talking of his Match after that manner, was a direct breach of our Commandment and Declaration out of our own Mouth, at the first sitting down of this Parliament, where we plainly professed, that we were in Treaty of this Match with Spain; and wished you to have that confidence in our Religion and Wisdom, that we would so manage it, as our Religion should receive no prejudice by it: And the same we now repeat unto you, professing that we are so far engaged in that Match, as we cannot in honour go back, except the King of Spain perform not such things as we expect at his hands. And therefore we are sorry that ye should shew to have so great distrust in us, as to conceive that we should be cold in our Religion; otherwise we cannot imagine how our former publick Declaration should not have stopt your mouths in this point.

And as to your Request, That we would now receive your former Petition; We wonder what could make you presume, that we would receive it, whereas in our former Letter we plainly declared the contrary unto you. And therefore we have justly rejected that Suit of yours; for what have you left unattempted in the highest points of Sovereignty, in that Petition of yours, except the striking of Coin? For it contains the violation of Leagues, the particular way how to govern a War, and the Marriage of our dearest Son, both Negative with Spain, nay, with any other Popish Prince; and also Affirmatively, as to the Matching with one of our Religion; which we confess is a strain beyond any Providence or Wisdom God hath given us, as things now stand.

These are unfit things to be handled in Parliament, except your King should require it of you: For who can have Wisdom to judge of things of that nature, but such Anno 1621. as are daily acquainted with the particulars of Treaties, and of the variable and fixed connexion of affairs of State, together with the knowledge of the secret wayes, ends, and intentions of Princes in their several Negotiations? otherwise a small mistaking of matters of this nature, may produce more effects than can be imagined; and therefore, Ne Sutor ultra crepidam. And besides, the intermeddling in Parliament with matters of Peace or War, and Marriage of our dearest Son, would be such a diminution to us and to our Crown in Foreign Countries, as would make any Prince neglect to treat with us, either in matters of Peace or Marriage, except they might be assured by the assent of Parliament. And so it proved long ago with a King of France, who, upon a Trick procuring his States to dissent from some Treaty which before he had made, was after refused Treating with any other Princes, to his great Reproach, unless he would first procure the Assent of his Estates to their Proposition. And will you cast your eyes upon the late times, you shall find, That the late Queen, of famous memory, was humbly Petitioned by a Parliament to be pleased to Marry: But her Answer was, That she liked their Petition well, because it was simple, not limiting her to Place or Person, as not befitting her liking to their Fancies; and if they had done otherwise, she would have thought it a high presumption in them. Judge then what we may do in such a case, having made our publick Declaration already (as we said before) directly contrary to that which you have now Petitioned.

Now to the Points in your Petition, whereof you desire an Answer, as properly belonging to the Parliament; the first and the greatest point is, that of Religion: concerning which, at this time we can give you no other Answer than in the general; which is, That you may rest secure, that we will never be weary to do all we can for the propagation of our Religion, and repressing of Popery: But the manner and form you must remit to our Care and Providence, who can best consider of Times and Seasons, not by undertaking a publick War of Religion through all the world at once (which how hard and dangerous a Task it may prove, you may judge.) But this puts us in mind, how all the world complained the last year of plenty of Corn; and God sent us a Cooling-Card this year for that heat: And so we pray God, that this desire among you of kindling Wars (shewing your weariness of Peace and Plenty) may not make God permit us to fall into the Miseries of both. But, as we already said, our care of Religion must be such, as on the one part we must not, by the hot persecution of our Recusants at home, irritate Foreign Princes of contrary Religion, and teach them the way to plague the Protestants in their Dominions, with whom we daily intercede, and at this time Principally, for ease to them of our Profession that live under them; yet upon the other part, we never mean to spare from due and severe punishment any Papist that will grow insolent for living under our so mild Government. And you may also be assured, we will leave no care untaken, as well for the good Education of the Youth at home, especially the Children of Papists; as also for preserving at all times hereafter the Youth that are or shall be abroad, from being bred in dangerous places, and so poysoned in Popish Seminaries. And as in this point, namely, the good education of Popish Youth at home, we have already given some good proofs, both in this Kingdom and in Ireland; so will we be well pleased to pass any good Laws that shall be made, either now, or at any time hereafter, to this purpose.

And as to your Request of making this a Session, and granting a General Pardon; it shall be in your defaults, if we make not this a Session before Christmas.

But for the Pardon, ye crave such Particulars in it, as we must be well advised upon, lest otherwise we give you back the double or treble of that we are to receive by your entire Subsidy, without Fifteens. But the ordinary course we hold fittest to be used still in this case is, That we should of our free Grace send you down a Pardon from the Higher House, containing such Points as we shall think fittest, wherein, we hope, ye shall receive good satisfaction.

But we cannot omit to shew you, how strange we think it, that ye should make so bad and unjust a Commentary upon some words of our former Letter, as if we meant to restrain you thereby of your ancient Priviledges and Liberties in Parliament. Truly a Scholar would be ashamed so to misplace and misjudge any Sentences in another mans Book. For whereas in the end of our former Letter, we discharge you to meddle with matters of Government, and Mysteries of State; namely, Matters of War and Peace, or our dearest Son's Match with Spain; by which particular denominations we interpret and restrain our former words: And then after, we forbid you to meddle with such things as have their ordinary course in Courts of Justice: Ye couple together those two distinct Sentences, and plainly leave out those words, Of Mysteries of State; so as ye err, à bene divisis ad male conjuncta: For of the former part, concerning Mysteries of State, we plainly restrain our meaning to the Particulars that were after mentioned; and in the latter, we confess we meant it by Sir Edward Cookes foolish business. And therefore it had well become him, especially being our Servant, and one of our Council, to have complained unto us; which he never did, though he was ordinarily at Court since, and never had access refused unto him.

And although we cannot allow of the Style, calling it, Your Ancient and Undoubted Right and Inheritance; but could rather have wished, that ye had said, That your Priviledges were derived from the Grace and Permission of our Ancestors and Us; (for most of them grow from Precedents, which shews rather a Toleration, than Inheritance:) Yet we are pleased to give you our Royal assurance, that as long as you contain your selves within the limits of your Duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your Lawful Liberties and Priviledges, as ever any of our Predecessors were; nay, as to preserve our own Royal Prerogative. So as your House shall only have need to beware to trench upon the Prerogative of the Crown; which would enforce us, or any just King, to retrench them of their Priviledges, that would pare his Prerogative, and Flowers of the Crown; But of this, we hope, there shall never be Cause given. Dated at Newmarket, Dec. 11. 1621.

Anno 1621. It will not be amiss to give the Reader to understand, that though the Commons had Voted to assist the King in the Recovery of the Palatinate, yet not one penny of Money did they, or would ever advance towards it, though Count Mansfield's Army, for want of pay, was then ready to disband in the Palatinate, and he had good Overtures also offered him by the Emperour to leave that Service; yet nothing was done by them: They insisted, it was their Duty to advise his Majesty in all things, (though their Advice was never required) as well as to supply him: which, saith the Collector (according to his usual way) discontented the Commons and good People of England, foreseeing a Dissolution by Gondomar's means.

Before the Adjournment, in vindication of their Parliamentary Rights and Privileges, the Commons made and entred this Protestation following [having Plotted a thin House, and a late Hour, Six a Clock at Night in December, and not a third part of their Number present.]

The Commons Protestation.

THE Commons now Assembled in Parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry Liberties, Franchises and Priviledges of Parliament, amongst others here mentioned, do make this Protestation following; That the Liberties, Franchises, Priviledges and Jurisdictions of Parliament are the ancient and undoubted Birthright and Inheritance of the Subjects of England; And that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the King, State, and Defence of the Realm, and of the Church of England, and the maintenance and making of Laws, and Redress of Mischiefs and Grievances which daily happen within this Realm, are proper Subjects and Matter of Counsel and Debate in Parliament; and that in the handling and proceeding of those Businesses, every Member of the House of Parliament hath, and of Right ought to have freedom of Speech, to Propound, Treat, Reason, and bring to Conclusion the same; And that the Commons in Parliament have like Liberty and freedom to treat of these Matters in such order, as in their Judgments shall seem fittest; And that every Member of the said House hath like Freedom from all Impeachment, Imprisonment and Molestation (other than by Censure of the House it self) for or concerning any Speaking, Reasoning, or Declaring of any Matter or Matters touching the Parliament, or Parliament-Business; And that if any of the said Members be complained of, and questioned for any thing done or said in Parliament, the same is to be shewed to the King by the Advice and Assent of all the Commons Assembled in Parliament, before the King give Credence to any private Information.

At which the King was moved; and what his Resentments were, will appear by this Memorial following.

Whitehall, Decemb. 30. 1621.

Fac. 19.

HIS most Excellent Majesty coming this day to the Council, the Prince his Highness, and all the Lords and others of His Majesties Privy Council sitting about Him, and all the Judges then in London, which were six in Number, there attending upon His Majesty; the Clerk of the Commons House of Parliament was called for, and commanded to produce his Journal-Book, wherein was noted, and Entries made of most Passages that were in the Commons House of Parliament; and amongst other things, there was written down the Form of a Protestation concerning sundry Liberties, Priviledges and Franchises of Parliament; with which Form of Protestation His Majesty was justly offended. Nevertheless His Majesty, in a most Gracious manner there expressed, That he never meant to deny that House of Commons any Lawful Priviledges that ever they had enjoyed; but whatsoever Priviledges or Liberties they had by any Law or Statute, the same should be inviolably preserved unto them; and whatsoever Priviledges they enjoyed by Custom, or uncontrolled and lawful Precedent, His Majesty would be careful to preserve. But this Protestation of the Commons House, so contrived and carried as it was, His Majesty thought fit to be razed out of all Memorials, and utterly to be annihilated, both in respect of the manner by which it was gained, and the matter therein contained. For the manner of getting it, first, in respect of the time: For after such time as His Majesty, out of His Princely Grace, and to take away all mistakings, had directed His Letters to Secretary Calvert, Dated at Royston, 16 Decembris, and therein had so explained himself in the point of maintaining the Priviledges of the House of Commons, as that most of the said House rested fully satisfied, and freed from any scruple of having their Liberties impeached; And after that, by His Majesties Letters, directed to the Speaker, Dated 18 Decembr. being Tuesday, His Majesty, at the humble Suit of the House of Commons, condescended to make this Meeting a Session before Christmas, and for that purpose had assigned Saturday following. Now upon this very Tuesday, and while the Messengers from the House of Commons were with His Majesty at Theobalds, to return thanks unto His Majesty, and therewith an excuse from them not to make it a Session, in respect of the strait of time whereunto they were driven: which deferment His Majesty admitted of at their desires, and thereupon gave order for the Adjournment of the Parliament unto the Eighth of February next, which was the first day formerly appointed by his Majesty for the Meeting together of the Parliament: And whilst their Messengers were with His Majesty, and had received a gracious Answer to return unto their House, even that afternoon a Committee was procured to be made for taking their Liberties into consideration: and this afternoon a Protestation was made (to whom, appears not) concerning their Liberties; and at six a clock at night, by candle-light, the same Protestation was brought into the House by the Committee, and at that time of night it was called upon to be put to the question, there not being the third part of the House then present; whereas in all matters of weight, their usual custom is, to put nothing of importance to the Question till the House be full: And at this time many of them that were present, expected the Question would have been deferred to another day, and a fuller House; and some then present stood up to have spoken to it, but could not be seen or heard in that Darkness and Confusion. Now for the matter of the Protestation, it is penned in such ambiguous and general words as may serve for future times to invade most of Rights and Privileges annexed to the Imperial Crown; the claim of some Privileges being grounded upon the words of the Writ for Assembling the Parliament, where, in some words, viz. Arduis Regni, are cunningly mentioned; but the word quibusdam, which restraineth the generality to such particular Cases, as His Majesty pleaseth to consult with them upon, is purposely omitted.

These things considered, His Majesty did this present day, in full Assembly of His Council, and in the presence of the Judges, declare the said Protestation to be invalid, annulled, void, and of no effect: And did further, manu sua propria, take the said Protestation out of the Journal-Book of the Clerk of the Commons House of Parliament, and Commanded an Act of Council to be made thereupon, and this Act to be entered in the Register of Council-Causes.

On the 6th. of January following, the King by Proclamation dissolves the Parliament, by the uniform Consent of his Council, shewing that he needs not give an account to any thereof; for that things of this nature are confessedly in his power; but that he had done it, for that they took upon them there to treat of things not belonging to them, being Matters of his Prerogative, speaking with too little respect of Foreign Princes, and spending their time only in quarrelling about their Privileges, never, or little regarding the Kingdoms wants. And that some evil-tempered Spirits sowed Tares among the Corn, and by their cunning devices have imposed upon him a necessity of discontinuing this present Parliament, without putting unto it the name or period of a Session. And lastly, he declared, That though the Parliament be broken off, yet he intended to govern well, and shall be glad to lay hold on the first occasion to call a Parliament again at convenient time.

These ill-tempered Spirits so called by the King, were some of the House of Commons: Sir Edward Cook, Sir Robert Philips were committed to the Tower; Mr. Seiden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallery, to other Prisons and Confinements. Order was given for the sealing up the Locks and Doors of Sir Edward Cook's Chambers in London, and in the Temple, for the seizing of his Papers. And the Council debating about the General Pardon that should have passed this last Parliament, had consulted about the ways of excluding him from that benefit, either by preferring a Bill against him before the Publication of the Pardon, or by exempting him by name, whereof, they said, they had Precedents.

Likewise Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Nathanael Rich, and Sir James Perrot, for punishment, were sent into Ireland, joyned in Commission with others, under the Great Seal of England, for the enquiry of sundry matters concerning his Majesties Service, as well in the Government Ecclesiastical and Civil, as in point of his Revenue and otherwise, within that Kingdom.

The People had now taken a great liberty of Speaking too boldly of Matters above their reach, whereupon the King directed the Judges now in their Circuits to put the Laws in force against this sort of People. In the mean time the Palsgrave is despoiled of his hereditary Dominions, the Upper Palatinate quite subdued, and the Lower at the same point also; notwithstanding the King still persists in his Mediation to the Emperor for him; the Terms by the King offered, were such as these:

‘That he shall for himself and his Son renounce all pretence of Right and Claim to the Crown of Bohemia: That he shall from henceforth yield all constant due devotion to the Imperial Majesty, as do other obedient Princes Electors of the Empire: That he shall crave pardon of the Imperial Majesty: That he shall not hereafter any manner of way demean himself unsuitably toward the Imperial Majesty, nor disturb his Kingdoms and Countreys: And that he shall, upon reasonable conditions, reconcile himself to other Princes and States of the Empire, and hold all good correspondence with them; and he shall really do whatsoever like things shall be judged reasonable and necessary.

King James requested of the Empeor the acceptance of these Conditions, as a notable testimony of his Imperial Majesty's Goodness and Grace, which, he said, should be by himself acknowledged in all willing Service, and unfeigned Friendship to the Emperor himself, and the most Renowned House of Austria. But if these his just Demands, and well-willed Presentations shall not find acceptance, or be slightly waved by some new tergiversation, or a pretence of that long and tedious way of Consultation with the Princes of the Empire, he is resolved to try his utmost power for his Childrens Relief; judging it a foul stain to his Honour, if he shall leave them and their Partizans without Counsel, Aid and Protection.

The Emperor answers hereto; That in this exulcerate Business, so much moderation and respect of Justice and Equity hath shined forth in the King of Great Britain, that there is not any thing that he should refuse to render thereunto, reserving his Cæsarean Authority, and the Laws of the Empire; yet that person whom it most concerns hath given no occasion, by the least sign of Repentance, to a condescension to this Treaty of Pacification; for he is still so obstinate, as by continual Machinations by Jagerndorf and Mansfeld, and other cruel Disturbers of the publick Peace, to call up Hell, rather than to acquiesce in better Counsels, and desist from the usurped Title of a Kingdom. Howbeit, in favour of the King of Great Britain, he shall consent to a Treaty to be held at Bruxels wherein he would devolve his power upon the

The terms which K. James desires the Emperor to accept, in behalf of the Palatine.

Fac. 19.

Anno 1621. Illustrious Eliz. Clara Eugenia, Infanta of Spain. This Treaty was accepted of by the King, and Sir Richard Weston sent thither; in the mean time the lower Palatinate was quite lost, a Peace being made between Bethlem Gabor and the Emperor, the later whereof was now at leisure to employ all his Force on that side; about this time died Philip the 3d King of Spain, whither the L. Digby is sent to condole his death, and to forward the Match, having the dispatches subjoyned delivered him by the King and Prince to the succeeding King and to his Counsellor Don Balthazar de Zuniga.

K. James, to Philip the Fourth of Spain. Most Serene and Potent Prince, Kinsman, and dearly beloved Friend, When we heard of the death of your Majesty's Father, Philip the Third, with whom we had great Amity, and, by our Amity, managed very important Matters, which, he being dead, could not but of necessity be interrupted: It was no less grief to us, than if he had been our own natural and most intimate Brother: Which grief we have certified both to your Majesty by our Letters, Fac. 19. as was fitting, and intimated to our people in a solemn and due manner. And thus far we have satisfied our selves; but in the next place we must also give Custom its due. For which end we send unto your Majesty our Publick Ambassador and Messenger of this our grief, the Baron John Digby, our Counsellor and Vice-chamberlain, adjoyning unto the rest of his Instructions, this our wish, That your Serenity may rule your Father's Kingdoms, which you have received under a most prosperous Star, with his and our Ancestors Prudence, and that we may really find that love which alway passed between your Father, of most happy memory, and us, propagated with the same candor unto you his Successor, the which we also hope.

JAMES, &c. To the most Serene and most Potent Prince and Lord, Philip the Fourth, &c.

K. James his Letter to the King of Spain. Most Serene and Potent Prince, Kinsman, and Well-beloved Friend; Forasmuch as some years ago (for our near Alliance, and the good of the whole Christian World) we had resolved to make a Marriage between our Well-beloved Son, Charles Prince of Wales, and the most Illustrious Infanta, the Lady Mary, your Serenities youngest sister, which in the life-time of your Father, King Philip the Third, of most happy memory, was so far advanced, that if he had not died, it had been brought to perfection long ere now: We have therefore thought good, to treat now again with your Serenity, that at length you would put a period to a work so well begun, and crown our by-past Deliberations with an expected issue. The age of our Son arrived now to maturity, and he our only Son (besides the condition of the times, and our affairs) doth require him to marry. And we being at the brink of old age, it would rejoyce us to see the day, wherein our Posterities Friendship should be bound up in this most desired Bond of Affinity. We have therefore sent unto your Serenity our Extraordinary Ambassador, the Right Honourable the Lord John Digby, Baron of Sherborn, our Counsellor, and Vice-Chamberlain, who has formerly deserved well of this Alliance, and the honour of the House of Austria; unto whom, together with our Ordinary Ambassador, we have entrusted the remainder of this business, to be treated, transacted, and finished, and shall be ready to ratify and approve here, whatever they shall agree upon. We wish likewise, that your Serenity, out of your goodness, would ease our care touching the Palatinate, which concerns our Daughter and Son in Law, and their innocent Children, banished from their Ancestors Inheritance. How gladly would we owe this good turn solely to your Serenity, who have already done us so many friendly offices in that business! No oblivion shall ever blot out of our mind, the acknowledgment of so great a favour; and we will endeavour to transmit to our Posterity that Hereditary good Will wherewith we have ever affected your Serenity, and your Royal Father of most worthy memory, and shall ever affect you. One thing remains, That if this our Ambassador shall propose

Most Serene and Potent Prince, and well-beloved Kinsman; some years ago, our most Serene Parents began to treat about a Match between us and the most Serene, our dearly beloved Princess, the Lady Mary, your Majesty's most honoured Sister. The condition and success of which affair and Treaty, our most Serene and honoured Lord and Father, out of his Fatherly affection towards us, was pleased, upon all occasions, so much the more willingly to impart unto us, by how much greater propension and apparent signs of true affection he discovered in us thereunto; for which cause, the Baron Digby, his Majesty's Vice-Chamberlain, and Extraordinary Ambassador, and one of our Privy Chamber, being now bound for Spain, with most ample Instructions to bring unto an happy issue, that which was prosperously begun, and advanced, before your most gracious Father, our Uncle, of happy memory, departed this life: We thought it no less becoming us, by these our Letters, most affectionately to salute your Majesty; who, if you shall persuade your self, that we highly esteem of your affection, as we ought to do, and that by a most dear bond of affinity, we desire to have it enlarged and confirmed towards us, that very persuasion will not a little add to the measure of our love. It remains, that we intreat your Majesty to give full credit to such further Proposals, as the Baron Digby shall make in our name. In the mean time, we will hope for such a success of the principal business, as may give us occasion to use a more familiar stile hereafter in our Letters, as an argument of a nearer relation; which if it shall happen, this will also follow, That we shall most readily embrace all occasions, whereby to evidence unto you Majesty the progress and increase of our affection, as well towards your self, as your most Serene Sister.

The most great and good God preserve your Majesty long in safety.

loving Kinsman,

To the Right Honourable, the Lord Balthazar of Zuniga.

Right Honourable, and Well-beloved Friend,

Because we have divers times been informed by your Friends, of your singular propension and zeal towards our affairs, we neither will, nor ought to leave you unsaluted at this time, you have so well deserved of us: But it will be no small accession of your good-will, if you continue as you have begun, to promote, by your assistance, our concerns with his Majesty our Well-beloved Brother, which, by what way it may best be done, our Ambassador the Baron John Digby will be able to direct you, to whom we have intrusted the residue of that matter. And if, during his residence there, he may make use of your singular humanity and favour with the King, in his Negotiation, it will be most acceptable to us, and render us, who were, by your deservings, already forward to oblige you, most forward for the future to deserve well of you; which we shall most willingly testify, as occasion offers; not only in word, but in deed.

Now the Treaty of Marriage is solely in the Hands of the Lord Digby, and an overture being made in Spain of a Match with the Infanta with the Emperors Son, the Emperors Ambassador was answered that the King of Spains Hands were tyed by the Treaty now on Foot with his Majesty of Great Britain. At the same time Presidents in the Tower were searched for, as concerned the Levies of Men at the Publick charge of the Country, from the times of Edw. 3. till the present; and likewise Letters wrote hereupon to the Judges as followeth.

What endeavours his Majesty hath used by Treaty, and by all fair and amiable ways to recover the Patrimony of his Children in Germany, now for the most part with-holden from them by force, is not unknown to all his loving Subjects, since his Majesty was pleased to communicate to them in Parliament his whole proceedings in that business. Of which Treaty, being of late frustrate, he was enforced to take other resolutions; namely, to recover that by the Sword, which by other means he saw no likelihood to compass. For which purpose, it was expected by his Majesty, that his People in Parliament would (in a cause so nearly concerning his and his Childrens interest) have cheer-fully fully contributed therunto. But the same unfortunately failing, his Majesty is constrained, in a case of so great necessity, to try the dutiful affections of his loving Subjects in another way, as his Predecessors have done in former times, by propounding unto them a voluntary contribution. And therefore, as your selves have already given a liberal and worthy example (which his Majesty doth take in very gracious part) so his pleasure is, and we do accordingly hereby authorise and require your Lordships, as well to countenance and assist the service by your best means, in your next Circuits, in the several Counties where you hold General Assizes; as also now presently, with all convenient expedition, to call before you all the Officers and Attorneys, belonging to any his Majesty's Courts of Justice; and also all such others of the Houses and Societies of Court, or that otherwise have dependance upon the Law, as are meet to be treated withal in this kind, and have not already contributed; and to move them to joyn willingly in this Contribution in some good measure, answerable to that your selves and others have done before us, according to their means and fortunes: Wherein his Majesty doubteth not, but beside the interest of his Children, and his own Crown and Dignity, the Religion professed by his Majesty, and happily flourishing under him, within this Kingdom, (having a great part in the success of this business) will be a special motive to incite and perswade them therunto. Nevertheless, if any person shall, out of obstinacy or disaffection, refuse to contribute herein, proportionably to their Estates and Means, you are to certify their names unto this Board.

And so recommending this service to your best care and endeavour, and praying you to return unto us Notes of the names of such as shall contribute, and of the sums offered by them, We bid, &c.

And Letters were directed to the Sheriffs of the respective Counties, and Mayors of the Towns, to the same effect, and that a Schedule of the Contributors should be return'd, and likewise of those who refused.

Archbishop Abbot, by a casual shot, in Bramzill Park, out of a Cross-bow, kills the Keeper in stead of the Deer; of which accident a question was raised whether his Grace by that mischance was irregular or not? Which was referr'd to the Lord Keeper Williams, the Bishops of London, Winton, Rochester, St. Davids, and Exeter, Justice Doderidge, Sir Henry Martin, and Dr. Stuart; and he was not judged irregular for that Casual Homicide.

About this time Dr. Laud was preferred to the See of St. David's, then void, betwixt whom and Dr. Robert Abbot then Doctor of the Chair in Oxon, there had been several bickerings about the Quinquarticular Controversie, and so must he forsooth, as the Collector would have it, be said to incline to Popish Tenets; but how much he hated Confarreation with that Party, his most Learned Book against Fisher doth abundantly testifie.

Now also the King thought fit upon good securities to release the Poorer sort of Recusants out of the several Goals in the Kingdom where they lay, whereupon the Lord Keeper wrote to the Judges in manner following.

That the King having, upon deep Reasons of State, and in expectation of the like correspondence from Foreign Princes to the Professors of our Religion, resolved to grant some grace to the imprisoned Papists, had commanded him to pass some Writs under the Broad Seal for that purpose: Wherefore it is his Majesty's pleasure, that they make no niceness or difficulty to extend his Princely favour to all such, as they shall find Prisoners in the Goals of their Circuits, for any Church Recusancy, or refusing the Oath of Supremacy, or dissenting of Popish Books, or any other point of Recusancy that shall concern Religion onely, and not matters of State.

And offence being taken hereat, the Lord Keeper truly satisfies the World as to the Reasons of it.

AS the Sun in the Firmament appears to us no bigger then a Platter, and the Stars are but as so many Nails in the Pummel of a Saddle, because of the enlargement and disproportion between our Eye and the Object: So is there such an unmeasurable distance between the deep resolution of a Prince, and the shallow apprehensions of common and ordinary people; that as they will ever be judging and censuring, so they must needs be obnoxious to error and mistaking. The King is now a most zealous Intercessor for some ease and refreshment to all the Protestants in Europe, which were unreasonable, if he did now execute the rigour of his Laws against the Roman Catholics.

Our Viperous Countreymen, the English Jesuits in France, had many moneths before the favour granted, invited the French King, by writing a malicious Book, to put all the Statutes in execution against the Protestants in those parts, which were enacted in England against the Papists, and (as they falsely informed) severely executed. Besides, these Papists are no otherwise out of Prison, than with their shackles about their heels, sufficient Sureties, and good Recognizances, to present themselves at the next Assizes; and their own demeanor, and the success of his Majesty's Negotiations must determine, whether they shall continue in this grace.

But to conclude, from the favour done to the English Papists, that the King favours the Romish Religion, is a composition of Folly and Malice, little deserved by a gracious Prince, who by Word, Writing, Exercise of Religion, and Acts of Parliament, hath demonstrated himself so resolved a Protestant.

As for his own Letter to the Judges, he said, it recited only four kinds of Recusancy, capable of the King's clemency, not so much to include them, as to exclude many other Crimes, bearing the name of Recusancy, as, using the Function of a Romish Priest, seducing the King's Liege people from the established Religion, aspersing the King, Church, or State, or the present Government.

All which Offences, being outward practices, and no secret motions of the Conscience, are adjudged, by the Law of England, to be merely Civil and Political, and are excluded by the Letter from the benefit of those Writs.

And because of the excessive liberty taken by both the Parties engaged in the Quinquarticular Controversie, the King wrote to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and sent the Directions following to be enjoyned the Clergy.

The Kings Letter to the Archbishop for regulating the Clergy.

Most Reverend Father in God, Right trusty and intirely beloved Counsellor, we greet you well.
Forasmuch as the abuses and extravagancies of Preachers in the Pulpit, have been in all times suppressed in this Realm by some Act of Council, or State, with the advice and resolution of grave and learned Prelates; insomuch that the very licensing of Preachers had the beginning by an Order of Star-Chamber, the Eighth day of July, in the Nineteenth year of the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, our Noble Predecessor: And whereas at this present, divers young Students, by reading of late Writers, and un-grounded Divines, do broach many times unprofitable, unsound, seditious, and dangerous Doctrines, to the scandal of the Church, and disquiet of the State and present Government. We, upon humble representation unto us of these inconveniencies by your self, and sundry other grave and reverend Prelates of this Church, as also of our Princely care and zeal for the extirpation of Schism and Dissention growing from these seeds, and for the setting of a Religious and peaceable Government, both in Church and Commonwealth, do by these our special Letters, straitly charge and command you, to use all possible care and diligence, that these Limitations and Cautions herewith sent unto you, concerning Preachers, be duly and strictly from henceforth put in practise, and observed by the several Bishops within your Jurisdiction. And to this end our pleasure is, that you send them forthwith Copies of these Directions, to be by them speedily sent and communicated unto every Parson, Vicar, Curate, Lecturer, and Minister, in every Cathedral or Parish Church, within their several Dio-cesses; and that you earnestly require them, to employ their utmost endeavours in the performance of this so important a business; letting them know, that we have a special Eye unto their proceedings, and expect a strict accompt thereof, both from you and every of them. And these our Letters shall be your sufficient Warrant and discharge in that behalf.

sor, &c.

Directions concerning Preachers, sent with the Letter.

Directions concerning
Preachers

I. That no Preacher, under the Degree and Calling of a Bishop or Dean of a Cathedral, or Collegiate Church (and they upon the King's days, and set Festivals) do take occasion, by the expounding of any Text of Scripture whatsoever, to fall into any set discourse, or common place, otherwise than by opening the Coherence and Division of the Text; which shall not be comprehended and warranted in Essence, Substance, Effect, or Natural Inference, within some one of the Articles of Religion, set forth, One thousand five hundred sixty and two; or in some of the Homilies, set forth by authority of the Church of England: Not only for a help for the Non-preaching, but withal for a pattern and boundary (as it were) for the Preaching Ministers.
And for their further Instructions for the performance hereof, that they forthwith read over and peruse diligently the said Book of Articles, and the two Books of Homilies.

II. That no Parson, Vicar, Curate, or Lecturer, shall preach any Sermon or Collation hereafter, upon Sundays and Holidays in the afternoon, in any Cathedral or Parish Church throughout the Kingdom, but upon some part of the Catechism, or some Text taken out of the Creed, Ten Commandments, or the Lord's Prayer, (Funeral Sermons only excepted.)

And that those Preachers be most encouraged and approved of, who spend the Afternoon's Exercise in the Examination of Children in their Catechism, which is the most antient and laudable custom of Teaching in the Church of England.

III. That no Preacher of what Title soever, under the Degree of a Bishop, or Dean at the least, do from henceforth presume to preach in any popular Auditory the deep Points of Predestination, Election, Reprobation, or of the Universality, Efficacy, Resistibility, or Ir-resistibility of God's Grace; but leave those Themes rather to be handled by the Learned Men, and that Moderately and Modestly by way of Use and Application, rather than by way of Positive Doctrines, being fitter for the Schools, than for simple Auditories.

IV. That no Preacher, of what Title or Denomination soever, from henceforth, shall presume in any Auditory within this Kingdom, to declare, limit, or bound out, by way of Positive Doctrine, in any Lecture or Sermon, the Power, Prerogative, and Jurisdiction, Authority or Duty of Sovereign Princes, or otherwise meddle with matters of State, and the differences between Princes and the People, than as they are instructed and presided in the Homilies of Obedience, and the rest of the Homilies and Articles of Religion, set forth (as before is mentioned) by publick Authority, but rather confine themselves wholly to those two Heads of Faith and Good Life, which are all the subject of the Antient Sermons and Homilies.

V. That no Preacher, of what Title or Denomination soever, shall presume causlessly, or (without invitation from the Text) to fall into bitter Invectives, and undecent railing Speeches against the persons of either Papists or Puritans, but modestly and gravely, when they are occasioned thereunto by the Text of Scripture, free both the Doctrine and the Discipline of the Church of England from the aspersions of either Adversary, especially where the Auditory is suspected to be tainted with the one or the other infection.

VI. Lastly, That the Archbishops and Bishops of the Kingdom (whom his Majesty hath good cause to blame for their former remissness) be more wary and choice in their Licencing of Preachers, and revoke all Grants made to any Chancellor, Official, or Commissary, to pass Licences in this kind: And that all the Lecturers throughout the Kingdom of England (a new body severed from the antient Clergy, as being neither Parsons, Vicars, nor Curates) be Licenced henceforward in the Court of Faculties, by Recommendation of the party, from the Bishop of the Diocese, under his Hand and Seal, with a Fiat from the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, a Confirmation under the Great Seal of England. And that such as do transgress any one of these Directions, be suspended by the Bishop of the Diocese, or in his default, by the Archbishop of the Province, ab officio & beneficio, for a year and a day, until his Majesty, by the advice of the next Convocation, shall prescribe some further punishment.

Sir

Anno 1621. Sir Richard Weston finds no real intent in the Infanta at Bruxels (to whom the matter was referred) to restore the Palatinate. The Palsgrave in the mean time, to remove all obstacles on his part, retires to Bouillon to his Uncle, and Mansfeld goes for Holland, whiles in the mean time Heydelburgh is besieged by the Emperor and Bavaria, and is taken and followed by the loss of Mannheim and Frankendale.

Mr. Gage returns from Rome with new Clogs to the Match: the Pope demands a publick Church in London, a Person in Episcopal Orders to exercise Jurisdiction there, and the Ecclesiasticks to be subject to no Laws, but of their own Superiors; that the Children be under the Mother's government till fourteen years, and a farther demonstration of favour for the Romanists in England. To the first, The King answers 'tis more than he himself had: she might have a Chappel where in a publick manner her Religion might be professed. To the second, That he would leave it to the King of Spain. The third, He utterly denied it, for it was not so in other Catholick Countries. And to the fourth, He answered he would not permit his Grandchildren to be brought up till years of Marriage in a Religion contrary to that he professed. And to the last, That he cannot grant any other favours, as to any Toleration, beyond what is already granted. And this resolution he sends to Digby in Spain, to be communicated accordingly.

Right Trusty and Well-beloved,

The King sends his resolution to Digby in Spain, now made Earl of Bristol. OUR pleasure is, that immediately you crave Audience of that King, and present unto him the merit that we may justly challenge to our self, for our sincere proceedings with the Emperor and him: Notwithstanding the many Invitations and Temptations we have had to engage our self on our Son in Law's part. That we have both from the Emperor, and from him, hopes given us from time to time of extraordinary respect, (howsoever our Son in Law had deserved) which we have attended and expected, even to the last, with much patience, and in despite, as it were, of all opposition, which might shake our resolution in that behalf: If now, when all Impediments are removed, and the way is so prepared, as that the Emperor may give an end unto the War, and make some present Demonstrations of his respect towards us, in leaving us the honour of holding those poor Places, which yet remain quietly and peaceably, until the general Accommodation, the same shall nevertheless be violently taken from us; What can we look for, if the whole shall be in his hands and possession, who amuzing us with a Treaty of Cessation, and protracting it industriously (as we have reason to believe) doth in the mean time seize himself of the whole Countrey? Which being done, our Ambassador shall return with scorn, and we remain in dishonour: And therefore, as we have heretofore sundry times promised, in testimony of the sincerity of our proceedings, and of our great desire to preserve the Amity inviolable between us and the whole House of Austria; that in case our Son in Law would not be governed by us, that then we would not only forsake him, but take part and joyn our Forces with the Emperor's against him: So you may fairly present unto that King, That in like manner we have reason to expect the same measure from him: That upon the Emperor's averfeness to a Cessation, and Accommodation, he will likewise actually assist us for the recovery of the Palatinate, and Electoral Dignity to our Son in Law, as it hath been oftentimes intimated from Spain. Yet our meaning is, to carry all things fair with that King, and not to give him any cause of distrust or jealousy, if you perceive that they intend to go really and roundly on with the Match: Wherein, nevertheless, we must tell you, That we have no great cause to be well pleased with the diligence used on that part, when we observe, that after so long an expectance of the Dispensation, upon which the whole business, as they will have it, depends, there is nothing yet returned but Queries and Objections.

We have thought fit to let you know, how far we are pleased to enlarge our self concerning those points demanded by the Pope: And further than that, since we cannot go without much prejudice, inconvenience, and dishonour to our Self, and our Son; we hope and expect, that the King of Spain will bring it instantly to an issue, without further delay, which you are to press with all diligence and earnestness: But if respite of time be earnestly demanded, and that you perceive it not possible for them to resolve, until an answer come from Rome, We then think it fit, that you give them two moneths time after your Audience, that we may understand that Kings final Resolutions before Christmas next at the furthest.

And now our King doth plainly see the Tergiversations of the Spaniards and Imperialists, and their delusory dealings with him; for whiles his Embassadors is treating at Bruxels, for the Palsgraves restitution, Heydelburgh and the rest of the Towns are taken; and the Emperor calls a Diet at Ratisbone for the Translation of the Electorate to the House of Bavaria irrevocably, and a Letter is said to have been wrote by the King of Spain to Conde Olivares, and Conde's Answer followeth.

THE King my Father declared at his death, that his intent never was to marry my Sister, the Infanta Donna Maria with the Prince of Wales, which your Uncle Don Balthazar understood, and so treated this Match ever with intention to delay it; notwithstanding, it is now so far advanced, that considering all the averfness unto it of the Infanta, it is time to seek some means to divert the Treaty, which I would have you find out, and I will make it good whatsoever it be. But in all other things, procure the satisfaction of the King of Great Britain, (who hath deserved much) and it shall content me, so that it be not in the Match.

SIR, Considering in what estate we find the Treaty of Marriage between Spain and England, and knowing certainly how the Ministers did understand this business, that treated in the time of PHILIP the Third, that is in Heaven, that their meaning was never to effect it, but by enlarging the Treaties and Points of the said Marriage, to make use of the Friendship of the King of Great Britain, as well in matters of Germany, as those of Flanders: And imagining likewise, that your Majesty is of the same opinion (though the Demonstrations do not shew so) joyning to these Suppositions; that it is certain the Infanta Donna Maria is resolved to put her self into a Monastery the same day that your Majesty shall press her to this Marriage: I have thought fit to represent unto your Majesty that which my good Zeal hath offered me in this occasion, thinking it a good time to acquaint your Majesty withal, to the end you may resolve of that which you shall find most convenient, with the Advice of those Ministers you shall think fit to make choice of.

The King of Great Britain doth find himself at this time equally engaged in two Businesses; the one is, this Marriage, to which he is moved by the Conveniencies he finds in your Majesties Friendship, by making an Agreement with those Catholicks that he thinks are secretly in his Kingdom; and by this, to assure himself of them; as likewise to marry his Son to one of the House of Austria; knowing, that the Infanta Donna Maria is the best born Lady in the world. The other business is the restitution of the Palatinate, in which he is more engaged; for beside that his Reputation is at stake, there is added the love and interest of his Grand-Children, Sons of his only Daughter; so that both by the Law of Nature, and Reason of State, he ought to put that forward, whatever Inconveniences might follow by dissembling what they suffer.

I do not dispute, whether the King of Great Britain be governed, in this Business of the Palatinate, by Act or Friendship; I think a man might say, he used both; but as a thing not precisely necessary to this Discourse, I omit it. I hold it for a Maxim, that these two Engagements in which he finds himself, are inseparable; for although the Marriage be made, we must fail of that which in my way of understanding is most necessary, the Restitution of the Palatinate.

This being supposed, having made this Marriage in that form as it is treated, your Majesty shall find your self, together with the King of Great Britain, engaged in a War against the Emperor and the Catholick League; a thing which to hear, will offend your Godly Ears; or declaring your self for the Emperor, and the Catholick League, as certainly your Majesty will do, then you will find your self engaged in a War against the King of England, and your Sister Married with his Son; with the which, all whatsoever Reasons of convenience that were thought upon in this Marriage, do cease. If your Majesty shall shew your self Neutral, as it may be some will propound; That, first will cause very great scandal, and with just reason, since in matters of less opposition, than of Catholicks against Hereticks, the Arms of this Crown have taken the Godly part against the contrary party; and at this time the French-men, fomenting the Hollanders against your Majesty, your Piety hath been such, that you have sent your Arms against the Rebels of that Crown, leaving all the great considerations of State, only because these men are Enemies to the Faith, and the Church.

It will oblige your Majesty, and give occasion to those of the League to make use of the King of France, and of other Catholick Princes, ill-affected to this Crown; for it will be a thing necessary for them to do so: And those even against their own Religion, will foment and assist the Hereticks for hatred to us. Without doubt they will follow the other party, only to leave your Majesty with that blemish, which never hath befallen any King of these Dominions. The King of England will remain offended and enraged, seeing that neither Interest, nor Helps do follow the Alliance with this Crown, as likewise with pretext of particular resentment; for having suffered his Daughter and Grand-Children to be ruined for respect of the said Alliance.

The Emperor, though he be well-affected, and obliged to us in making the Translation at this time, as businesses now stand (the Duke of Bavaria being possessed of all the Dominions) although he would dispose all according to our conveniencies, it will not be in his power to do it, as your Majesty, and every body may judge: And the Memorial that the Emperor's Ambassador gave your Majesty yesterday, makes it certain; since in the List of the Souldiers, that every one of our League is to pay, he sheweth your Majesty, that Bavaria for himself alone, will pay more than all the rest joyned together; the which doth shew his power and intention, which is not to accommodate matters, but to keep to himself the Superiority of all in this broken time, the Emperor is now in the Diet, and the Translation is to be made in it.

The Proposition in this Estate, is, by considering the means for a Conference, which your Majesties Ministers will do with their Capacities, Zeal and Wisdom; and it is certain, they will herein have enough to do. For the difficulty consists to find a way to make the present estate of affairs straight again, which with lingring, as it is said, both the power and time will be lost. I suppose the Emperor, as your Majesty knoweth by his Ambassador, desires to Marry his Daughter with the King of England's Son. I do not doubt but he will be likewise glad to Marry his Second Daughter with the Palatine's Son: Then I propound, that these two Marriages be made, and that they be set on foot presently; giving the King of England full Satisfaction in all his Propositions, for the more strict Union and Correspondency, that he may agree to it. I hold for certain, that all the Conveniences that would have followed the Alliance with us, will be as full in this: And the Conveniences in the great Engagement are more by this; for it doth accommodate the matter of the Palatinate, and Succession of his Grand-Children with Honour, and without drawing a Sword, and wasting Treasure. With this Interest, the Emperor, with the Conveniences of the King of England, and the Palatinate, the only means, in my way of understanding, to hinder those great dangers that do threaten, may accommodate the Business, and not sever himself from the Conveniences and Engagements of Bavaria; and after I would reduce the Prince Elector, that was an Enemy, to the obedience of the Church, by breeding his Sons in the Emperor's Court with Catholick Doctrine.

The Business is great, the Difficulties greater perchance than have been in any other case,

Anno 1622. 'case. I have found my self obliged to present this unto your Majesty, and shall shew, if you command me, what I think fit for the disposing of the things, and of the great Minister which your Majesty hath. I hope with the particular Notes of these things, and all being helped with the good Zeal of the Conde Gondomar, it may be God will open a way to it, a thing so much for his, and your Majesties Service.

The Kings sincere intention in the Match was dayly obviated by new Conditions added to the former Demands, by the Pope and the King of Spain: the King and Prince both assented that the Children of the Match should continue under their Mothers Government till the Age of Ten, but no longer. And that the Ecclesiastical Superior do take notice of the Offence that shall be committed, and according to the merit thereof, either by Degradation deliver him to Secular Justice, or banish him the Kingdom.

But in the middle of these Treaties for the Match, Manheim is lost, and Heydelsbergh taken, and the Emperor in the Diet at Ratisbone confers the Electorate to the Duke of Bavaria; the Protestant Princes and States protest and declare against it as a thing contrary to the Agreements in the Capitulation Royal, and Fundamental Laws of the Empire: That his Brother and Children had not offended; who by the providence of their Ancestors, before the Fact of their Father, had an hereditary Right thereto. This thing was of very ill consequence to the rest of the Hereditary Electors; whose turn may be the next none knows, &c. The Catholics reply, That the Electorate is devolved upon the Emperor; that he may dispose of it as best pleaseth him; that as his Crime was great, his punishment ought to be proportionable; and that the Count Mansfeld is still in the Field, and openly prosecutes the Cause, &c. The other party re-assumes the Argument,

'That the security of the Imperial Dignity, and the safety of the Empire, consisted in the Concord between the Emperor and the Princes Electors; and if his Imperial Majesty shall use this rigor, the Princes of Lower Saxony are of opinion, that there can be no Peace established: But this desired Reconciliation will give the Emperor a quiet possession of the Provinces recovered by the aid of the Electors and Princes; otherwise there is a fair pretention left for the renewing of the War; for that the Palatine's Sons and Brother are passed by in the translation of the Elector; and the King of Great Britain cannot but take it ill, to see his endeavours produce no better effect, but that his only Daughter and her Children are left in Exile.

But all in vain; for the Emperor utterly refuseth the Palgrave's Restitution, or to shew any Favour to his Children; but saith he will no longer defer to compleat the Number of the Electors: And of the Emperors intention Sir Dudley Carleton gives the King from the Hague the Judgment which was there made of his Actions, which was no other than this, That he never really intended the Restauration of the Elector; for that the Emperor was not content to have chased the Palgrave out of Germany; but in the Propositions of the former Diet, made this an Article, to make War upon the United Provinces, because (among other Quarrels) they gave Refuge to the expelled Palatine.

And now the Match, as to the carrying it on, is put into the Hands of the Prince himself: who, together with the Marquess of Buckingham, Sir Francis Cottington, Mr. Cottington, Mr. Porter and Mr. Graham, hazard a Journey into Spain, by the way of France, and Land at Bologne, and thence Post for Paris, and had sight of a Mask there, and the first view of the Princess Henrietta Maria, his after-Queen and Consort, in Anno 1625. From thence in haste, and some difficulty, to Bordeaux, and after to Bayon, the Confines of France; and from thence, no sooner gone, but that the Governour Count Graismon had notice by the Carrier, (who carried the Advice from hence to the King of Spain) that the Prince of Wales was gone thither.

Where he arrived at Madrid, Friday the 7th. of March at Eight a Clock at Night, in thirteen Days from Paris, seven hundred and fifty Miles, and alighted at Bristol's House, the Extraordinary Ambassador, and Sir Walter Aston Lierger, intrusted under-hand to overlook the others actions, in this particular, being hitherto suspected of the Prince, to be too much Catholick there. So that this sudden arrival startled Bristol, that was a stranger to the Journey; which met with such success afterwards, as the measure of his Malice did mete out; together with Gondamores regret (on the Spanish party) who with all his wisdom, more by estimation than merit, was abused also at home to credit what was commanded to him, who thought nothing more sure than now to be effected.

The next Morning the Arrival of Buckingham was willingly discovered to Gondamore, and so to the Conde Olivares, the Spanish Favourite, and by him to the young King Philip, who gave him leave to visit the Marquess, and Order to be brought to the King in private, to whom he delivered King James his Letters, and discovered that the Prince was come; and therefore with the Ambassadors was returned Olivares with the King's Salutations of Honour and Welcom. Where it was observed that Olivares would not be covered, though the first Grandee of Spain, who are not bare to their own King.

The next Sunday-Afternoon, though in Lent, upon design for the Princes desire to take view of his Mistress, the King, Queen, the Infanta, and the Infantes (Don Carlos and Don Ferdinand, his two Brothers) with a great Train of Coaches, took Air upon the Prado, a Publick Place of Recreation, where the Prince likewise (Disguised) in the Duke of Cea's Coach, with his English Train, made divers Turns, and so had sight of the Infanta, not refraining though to salute each other with seemly Congies.

The King desired to visit and embrace the Prince at the Earl of Bristol's House. But to avoid that disadvantage, the Prince would not be denied to pass to the King, who therefore appointed half way, where he staid, and there they met.

The King got out of his Coach first, and embracing the Prince with wonderful kindness, made incomparable professions of Love and Honour.

In the strict Obligations which the King his Father, and His Highness Himself had cast upon him, by that singular Act of Confidence and Favour.

To which the Prince Replied,

That he was Royally recompenced by the Honour he receiveth, to be his own Advocate in this His High Design to visit His Majesty and His Princely Sister.

And taking Coach together, He forced the Prince therein first on the right hand, Bristol interpreting between them (for the Kings of Spain do not descend to give honour to the French Tongue) and return home by Torch-light.

On Monday the Prince was visited by Olivares, to let him know the Kings Publick Devotion unto the Monastery La Merced, attended on Horseback with a glorious Train, of which the Prince had sight, and so passed that Day in Recreation abroad.

The next Day the King sent two Dukes to visit the Prince, with this Complement.

That seeing the good Service of the Conde Gondamore had imprinted such a singular Character in the King of Great Britain's affection, to trust so excellent a Treasure into Spain, as his Highness, therefore he could not suffer any Subject of His unadvanced, who had been so Graciously accepted in England; for which cause he was resolved to make him Counsellor of State, though he accounted him indeed as an Englishman: Nay, rather for that respect, that they might be the more confident of his Proceedings, and Privy to the Inmost Actions; and the Prince was empowered to establish him therein.

For which Gondamore falls down at his Feet, and being by His Highness addressed to the Court, was instantly sworn.

General Pardon proclaimed.

Not long after was proclaimed a General Pardon of all Offences, and all Prisoners within the Continent of Spain released; and all English Slaves for Pyrracy or Mortal Crimes, were set at Liberty, and manifested to be done in contemplation of the Prince.

His Entry in Triumphant.

The 16th. of March appointed for the Prince's Triumphant Entry through Madrid, the day before, were presented two Barb-Gennets of excellent value, for the Prince to chuse, and the other for the King.

The Morning come, four Counsellors of State were sent to attend, and to conduct him to the Monastery St. Jeronimo near Madrid; from whence the Kings of Spain make their solemn Entries of Coronation; where he was Feasted privately at Dinner by the King's Appointment.

Afternoon was spent by the Prince in giving Audience to the Inquisitor General, and to all the several Bodies of Counsels (which continually reside in the Court at Madrid) except only the Council of State, which never makes Visit in Corps; the rest did: being of Castile, Arragon, Portugal, Italy, Militia, Indies, Treasury and Exchequer, &c.

The Corridor and Regidores of Madrid (the Governors) had Audience likewise.

About Four a Clock in the Even, comes the King; whom the Prince receives at the Gate; and all things in order, they dispose to be going: They came in Coaches, but now all Mount on Horse-back in Magnificent manner; and riding to the Entry of the Liberties of Madrid, there attended twenty four of the Regidores, with a large Canopy of Tyssue, rich imbossed (being their Office to bear it) were apparelled in rich Cloth of Tyssue, lined with Crimson Cloth of Gold; They both came under the Canopy, the Prince alwayes on the right hand; before them the Courts and Ministers of Justice; then the Grandees, and all the principal Noblemen, in excellent Bravery, attended by their Followers in rich Equipage and Liveries (a Custom in that Countrey, wherein they have excess.)

Next after the Canopy, followed the Marques Buckingham, and the Conde Olivares, as Masters of the Horse to them both, with eithers Cloth of State; which Canopy was presented to Buckingham, as a Fee to him in that Office, and serving for the Prince, in whose Honour that days Action was performed. Then the Earl of Bristol, between two of the eldest Counsellors of State, and a Gentleman of the Bed-chamber; Sir Walter Aston following them in like manner accompanied; the rest of the Council of State and Bed-chamber next after. Then that goodly Guard de los Archeros, bravely clad in gallant manner; then numbers of gallant youth followed, being of the Glory of that Court and Kingdom.

The Windows decked (you may believe) with the painted Beauties of the most Famous Donna's, the Houses outwardly furnished with Hangings of Arras and Pictures; the Streets Scaffolded, and here and there in more eminency were raised Temporary Buildings, whereon the several Bodies of the Councils sate, to see and do reverence; and by the way several Pageants, Representations of the rare Comedians and Dancers; and all to give content to that Royal Pair, as they passed by, until they came to the Court-Gate.

The Queen and Infanta were Spectators, but soon retired to the Palace, to receive the Visit; the King and Prince embracing, passed up to the Queens Quarter; whom She received at Her Chamber-Door; and conducted him to and under the Cloth of State; they sate on three equal Chairs, the Queen in the midst, the Prince on the Right Hand, the King on the Left.

The Room richly furnished; but more, by those excellent Beauties, the living Tapestry of Ladies, Noble-mens Children, called Menines.

Madam (said the Prince) the Honour of this Days Solemnity is due to your Majesty, which conveys Me hither to kiss your Princely Hand.

And so stooped to her Knee.

Sir (said She) It is to your Highness, and in such manner as to the Royalty of Spain, due and done to your excellent Merit.

And so passing half an hours Complement in French, which is natural to her, she brought them back to Her Chamber-Door.

The King conducting the Prince to his Lodgings, a Quarter of the Court prepared for him with all Magnificence. At the Entrance, stood the Infantes his two Brothers, and so all three conducted the Prince into his Bed-chamber. And then the King took the Right Hand; because (said he) your Highness is now at home; and so left him to his peculiar Attendants, and other Officers of Honour, especially Grandees mixt amongst them to wait the Princes pleasure.

And

And within an hour comes the Comte de Benavente, as Major Domo to the Queen, with a present. Annals 1622. A Fair Bason of Massie Gold, born by two Men, a curious imbroidered Night Gown laid double in it,
 Two great Trunks bound with bands of pure Gold, Rich Presents to the Prince studded very thick with nails of Gold, and Locks and Keys of the same. The Coverings and Linings were of Amber Leather, filled with several Delicacies, curious Linments, rich Perfumes. A rich fair Desk, full of Rarities in each Drawer.

And Buckingham was remembered by a Present from the Countess Olivares.

Triumphant Fire-Works.

Fire-works were made, and Torch-Triumphs in all Houses and Windows for three Nights together by Proclamation, with wonderful acclamations Night and Day, crying, Vive el Principe de Galles, Vive el Principe, &c.

And thus settled at his home, attended with all the like Officers as the King, and of the same rank and quality, with the one half of his Guard with golden Keys of the Court to dispose to such English as the Prince was pleased to intrust. Great Triumphs in preparation, and the principal Nobility in Arragon sent for to honour the Court, and for the glory and lustre of the same, the Edict for restraint of all excess in point of apparel was suspended.

Takes the Ring in presence of his Mistresses.

Some daies after invited to run at the Ring, in presence of his Mistress, he took it at the first course, with acclamations of joy and honour; The glory of which challenged fate to finish his desires with good success in the Infanta's favour. And although some daies had passed with utmost extremities of gallantry, yet saw he not his Mistress, but at those distances; which was excused by Olivares, That the custom of the Nation in Princely Overtures with Infanta's, was not to take view of nearer affections, till the dispensation from Rome should come to admit them Lovers. Yet (as a Prince) he had access often in presence of the King (for privacy is not admitted between Brother and Sister of Royal descent) yet the Prince at these interviews, spake to her by Bristol his Interpreter.

Buckingham
created Duke.

By this time the Court of Spain was changed into English Lords, and Buckingham created Duke by Patent, carried over by Viscount Doncaster, lately made Earl of Carlisle, and every day brought thither the affluence of fresh Gallants of English Nobility, the Earl of Denbigh, Viscount Rochford, the Lord Kensington, Cecils, Herberts, Howards, not a Noble Family that failed to tell posterity what he had seen in Spain.

And now the Prince, so great was the zeal of the Romanists, must needs be importuned to become of their Religion, and the Pope himself writes to the Prince the Letter following.

The Popes Letter to the Prince of Wales.

Most Noble Prince, We wish you the health and light of God's grace. Forasmuch as Great Britain hath always been fruitful in virtues, and in men of great worth, having filled the one and the other World with the glory of her renown, she doth also very often draw the thoughts of the holy Apostolical Chair to the consideration of her praises. And indeed, the Church was but then in her infancy, when the King of Kings did choose her for his inheritance; and so affectionately, that 'tis believed, the Roman Eagles were hardly there, before the Banner of the Cross. Besides that, many of her Kings instructed in the knowledge of the true Salvation, have preferred the Cross before the Royal Scepter, and the Discipline of Religion before Covetousness; leaving examples of piety to other Nations, and to the Ages yet to come; so that having merited the Principalities, and first places of blessedness in Heaven, they have obtained on Earth the triumphant ornament of Holiness. And although now the state of the English Church is altered, We see, nevertheless, the Court of Great Britain adorned and furnished with Moral virtues, which might serve to support the Charity we bear unto her, and be an ornament to the name of Christianity, if withal she should have for her defence and protection the Orthodox and Catholick truth. Therefore by how much the more the glory of your most noble Father, and the apprehension of your Royal inclination delighteth us, with so much more zeal we desire, that the gates of the Kingdom of Heaven might be opened unto you, and that you might purchase to your self the love of the Universal Church.

Moreover, it being certain that Gregory the Great, of most blessed memory, hath introduced to the people of England, and taught to their Kings the Law of the Gospel, and the respect of Apostolical authority; We, as inferior to him in holiness and virtue, but equal in name and degree of dignity, think it very reasonable, that we following his blessed footsteps, should endeavour the salvation of those Provinces, especially at this time, when your design (most noble Prince) elevates us to the hope of an extraordinary advantage. Therefore, as you have directed your journey to Spain towards the Catholick King, with desire to ally your self to the House of Austria, we do commend your design, and indeed, do testifie openly in this present business, that you are he that takes principal care of our Prelacy: For, seeing that you desire to take in marriage the Daughter of Spain, from thence we may easily conjecture, that the ancient seeds of Christian piety which have so happily flourished in the hearts of the Kings of Great Britain, may (God prospering them) revive again in your Soul. And indeed it is not to be believed, that the same man should love such an Alliance, that hates the Catholick Religion, and should take delight to oppress the Holy Chair. To that purpose we have commanded that most humble Prayers be made continually to the Father of lights, that he would be pleased to put you as a fair Flower of Christendom, and the only hope of Great Britain, in possession of that most noble Heritage which your Ancestors purchased for you, to defend the Authority of the Sovereign High-Priest, and to fight against the Monsters of Heresie. Remember the days of old, enquire of your Fathers; and they will tell you the way that leads to Heaven, and what way the Temporal Princes have taken to attain to the Everlasting Kingdom. Behold the Gates of Heaven opened! The most holy Kings of England, who came from England to Rome accompanied with Angels, did come to Honor and do homage to the Lord of Lords, and to the Prince of the Apostles in the Apostolical Chair; their Actions and their Examples being as so many voices of God, speaking and exhorting you to follow the course of the lives of those, to whose Empire you shall one day attain.

Is it possible that you can suffer that the Hereticks should hold them for impious, and condemn those whom the faith of the Church testifies to reign in the Heavens with Jesus Christ,

Anno 1622. and have command and authority over all Principalities and Empires of the Earth? Behold how they tender you the hand of this truly happy Inheritance, to conduct you safe and sound to the Court of the Catholick King, and who desire to bring you back again into the lap of the Roman Church; beseeching with unspeakable sighs and groans the God of all mercy for your Salvation, and to stretch out to you the Arms of the Apostolical Charity to embrace you with all Christian affection, even you that are her desired Son, in shewing you the happy hope of the Kingdom of Heaven. And indeed, you cannot give a greater consolation to all the people of the Christian World, than to put the Prince of the Apostles in possession of your most noble Island, whose Authority hath been held so long in the Kingdom of Britain for the defence of Kingdoms, and for a Divine Oracle. The which will easily come to pass, and that without difficulty, if you open your heart to the Lord that knocks; upon which depends all the happiness of that Kingdom. It is from this our great Charity, that we cherish the praises of the Royal Name, and that which makes us desire that you and your Royal Father may be stiled with the names of Deliverers and Restorers of the ancient and paternal Religion of Great Britain.

This is it we hope for, trusting in the goodness of God in whose hands are the hearts of Kings, and who causeth the people of the Earth to receive healing, to whom we will always labour with all our power to render you gracious and favourable. In the interim take notice by these Letters of the care of our Charity, which is none other than to procure your happiness: and it will never grieve us to have written them, if the reading of them stir but the least spark of the Catholick faith in the heart of so great a Prince; whom we wish to be filled with long continuance of Joy, and flourishing in the glory of all Virtues.

Given at Rome in the Palace of S. Peter, the 20th of April, 1623. in the third Year of our Pope-dom.

His Holiness also writes to the Duke of Buckingham, the Letter following.

Gregorius P. P. XV. Duci Buckinghamiæ.

Nobilis Vir, salutem & lumen Divinæ gratiæ. Autoritas qua Nobilitatem tuam in Britannia Regia florere accipimus, non modo meritum præmium, sed virtutis patrocinium habetur. Egregium plane decus, atque adeo dignum, cui populi illi addi cupiant diuturnitatem: verum vix dici potest quantus ei cumulus gloriæ in orbe terrarum accederet, si (Deo favente) foret Catholicæ religionis præsidium. Facultatem certe nancisceris, qua te eorum Principum conciliis inferere potes, qui hominis immortalitatem adepti ad cælestia regna pervenerunt. Hanc tibi a Deo tributam, & a Pontifice Romano commendatam occasionem, ne elabi patiare, Nobilis Vir. Non te præterit, regalium consiliorum conscium, quæ in loco Britannia res hac ætate sit, quibusque Spiritus Sancti loquentis vocibus, Principum tuorum aures quotidie personet. Quæ gloria esset nominis, si te hortatore ac suatore, Anglicani Reges cælestem illius gloriæ hereditatem recuperarent, quam Majores eorum amplissimam in iis regnis reliquerunt, divini cultus incrementa curando & Pontificiæ autoritatis ditione, non solum tuenda, sed etiam propaganda! Multi fuerunt, atque erunt in posterum, quos benevolentia Regum perituris divitiis locupletavit, & invidiosis titulis auxit; atque ut id Nobilitas tua consequatur, non ideo sempiternis laudibus nomen tuum memor posteritas colet; At enim si consilia tua potentissimos Reges populosque ad Ecclesiæ premium reduceret; scriberetur nomen tuum in libro viventium quos non tangit tormentum mortis, ac te Historiarum Monumenta in eos sapientes referrent, in quorum splendore Reges ambulerunt. Quibus autem te præsentis vitæ solatiis & futuræ præmiis remuneraretur Deus ille, qui dives est in misericordia, omnes facile provident quibus nota est ars, & vis, qua Regnum Cælorum expugnatur. Tantæ te felicitatis compotem fieri ut cupiantus efficit non solum Pontificia

Pope Gregory to the D. of Buckingham.

Right honorable, we wish you health and the light of Gods grace. The authority which we understand you have in the Court of England, is accounted not only the reward of Merit, but the patronage of Vertue. A remarkable honor indeed, and of such worth, that the people there ought to pray for its continuance: but it can scarce be exprest what an access of glory it would receive in the World, if by the grace of God it should become the safeguard of the Catholick Religion. You have the means to ingraft your self into the assembly of those Princes, who having obtained an immortal name, have purchased the heavenly inheritance. Suffer not, Honorable Sir, this occasion to slip out of your hands, afforded you by God, and recommended to you by the Pope of Rome. You are not Ignorant, as intimate in the Kings Counsels, in what condition the affairs of England are in this our Age, and with what voices of the Holy Ghost speaking, the ears of your Princes daily tingle. How greatly would you be renown'd, if by your perswasion and admonition the Kings of England should obtain the heavenly inheritance of that glory which their Ancestors left them most ample in those Kingdoms, by taking care of the increase of Gods worship, and not only defending, but propagating the Dominions of the Popes authority! There have been, and will be many hereafter, whom the favour of Kings hath much enriched with wealth that fadeth away, and honored with envious titles; and if your Honor attain this, Posterity will therefore adore your memory with everlasting praises: But if your advice should reduce Potent Kings and Nations to the Lap of the Church, your name would be written in the Book of the Living, whom the pangs of death assault not; and the Records of Historians would number you among those Sages in whose light and conduct Kings have walked. And with what comfort of the present life and reward of the future, that God who is rich in mercy would recompence you, they easily foresee who are acquainted with the skill and violence by which the Kingdom of Heaven

Heaven is conquered. That we wish you to be partaker of so great happiness, not only our Papal Charity moves us (to whose care the salvation of mankind belongeth) but also the Piety of your Mother, who having brought you forth to the World, desires to bring you forth again to the Church of Rome, whom she acknowledges for her Mother. Therefore Didacus de la Fuente our beloved Son, a Fryer, who hath prudently managed the most important affairs of your Princes here in Rome, being to go to Spain, we have commanded him to wait upon your Honour, and to deliver you those Apostolical Letters to evidence the greatness of our Papal Charity, and our desire of your salvation. You may be pleased to hearken to him, as the interpreter of our mind, and one adorned with those virtues, which have been able to purchase the love of Foreign Nations to a Catholick and a Religious Priest. Truly he hath spoken such things of you in this Country of the World, that he is worthy whom you should cherish with a singular affection, and protect with your Authority, as one studious of the glory and safety of the King and People of Great Britain. We will pray the Father of Mercies, that he would open the doors of the Kingdom of Heaven to your Honour, and afford you frequent evidences of his Clemency.

To which the Prince is said to return an Answer as followeth.

CAROLUS Princeps Gregorio P. P. XV.

Prince CHARLES to Pope Gregory XV.

Sanctissime Pater,

There is another Copy of the Princes Letter to the Pope published by several hands, somewhat different from this.

Beatitudine Vestræ Literas non minore gratitudine & observantia accepimus, quam exigit ea qua novimus exaratas insignis benevolentia, & pietatis affectus. Atque illud imprimis gratum fuit, nunquam satis laudata Majorum exempla inspicienda Nobis a vestra Sanctitate atque imitanda fuisse proposita: Qui licet multoties omnium fortunarum & vitæ ipsius discrimen advenirent, quo fidem Christianam latius propagarent, haud tamen alacriori animo in infestissimos Christi hostes, Crucis Christi vexilla intulerunt, quam nos omnem opem & operam adhibebimus ut quæ tam diu exultavit pax & unitas, in Christianam Rempublicam postliminio reducatur. Cum enim Discordiarum Patriæ malitia inter illos ipsos qui Christianam profitentur Religionem tam infelicia seminarit dissidia, hoc vel maxime necessarium ducimus ad Sacrosanctam Dei & Salvatoris Christi gloriam feliciter promovendam. Et minori nobis honori futurum existimabimus, tritam Majorum Nostrorum vestigiis insistentes viam, in piis ac religiosis susceptis illorum æmulos atque imitatores extitisse, quam genus nostrum ab illis atque originem duxisse. Atque ad idem nos istud plurimum inflammat perspecta nobis Domini Regis ac Patris nostri voluntas, & quo flagrat desiderium ad tam Sanctum opus porrigendi manum auxiliatricem, tum qui Regium pectus exedit dolor, cum perpendit quam sævè exoriantur strages, quam deplorandæ calamitates ex Principum Christianorum dissensionibus. Iudicium vero quod Sanctitas vestra tulit de nostro cum demo ac Principe Catholica Affini.

Most Holy Father,

WE have received your Letter with no less thankfulness and respect, than is due to the singular good will and godly affection wherewith we know it was written. It was most acceptable unto us, that the never enough Renowned Examples of our Ancestors were proposed to us by your Holiness for our inspection and imitation; who, though they often hazarded their lives and fortunes to propagate the Christian Faith, yet did they never more chearfully display the Banners of the Cross of Christ against his most bitter enemies, than we will endeavour to the utmost, that the Peace and Union which so long triumphed, may be reduced into the Christian World, after a kind of Elimination or Exile. For since the malice of the Father of discords hath sowed such unhappy divisions amongst those who profess the Christian Religion, We account this most necessary thereby to promote with better success, the glory of God and Christ our Saviour; nor shall we esteem it less honor to tread in their footsteps, and to have been their Rivals and Imitators in holy undertakings, than to have been descended of them. And we are very much encouraged to this as well by the known inclination of our Lord and Father, and his ardent desire to lend a helping hand to so pious a work, as by the anguish that gnaws his Royal breast, when he considers what cruel destructions, what deplorable calamities arise out of the dissensions of Christian Princes. Your Holiness's conjecture of our desire to contract an Alliance and Marriage with a Catholick family and Prince, is agreeable both to your Wisdom and Charity; for we would ne-

Therefore your Holiness may be assured, That we are, and always will be of that Moderation, as to abstain from such actions, which may testifie our hatred against the Roman Catholick Religion; we will rather embrace all occasions whereby through a gentle and fair procedure all sinister suspitions may be taken away; That as we all confess one Individual Trinity and one Christ Crucified, we may unanimously grow up into one Faith. Which that we may compass, we little value all Labor and Watchings, yea, the very hazard of our lives. It remains, that we render thanks to your Holiness for your Letter; which we esteem as a singular present, and wish your Holiness and all prosperity and eternal happiness.

But these solicitations were all in vain, for the Prince was too well settled in his Religion, than to be gained upon by these Letters or the Spanish complements either; and now at last comes the Dispensation from Rome, but clogg'd with a Clause that was like to be the break-neck of the whole Match.

'That whereas there were certain Articles condescended unto by the King of England, in favour of the Roman Catholicks in his Dominions, Caution should be given for the performance of those Concessions. The King answers, That he could give no other Caution, than his own and the Princes Oath, exemplified under the Great Seal of England. But this would not satisfy, unless some Sovereign Catholick Prince would stand engaged for them. Hereupon the frame of things was like to fall a sunder, and a rumor went, that the Prince intended to get away covertly.

At last the King of Spain himself, by the advice and approbation of his own Divines, engageth for the King and the Prince that they should perform the points stipulated. So all difficulties being at last surmounted, and the following Articles, in order to the Match, were sworn unto by the King, Prince and Privy Council.

Articles
sworn to by the King, Prince, and Privy Council.

I. 'That the Marriage be made by Dispensation of the Pope, but that to be procured by the endeavor of the King of Spain.

III. 'That the most Gracious Infanta, shall take with her such Servants and Family as are convenient for her service; which Family, and all persons to her belonging, shall be chosen and nominated by the Catholick King: So as he nominate no Servant which is Vassal to the King of Great Britain, without his will and consent.

That the said Oratory, Chappel and Church, shall be adorned with such decency as shall seem convenient to the most Gracious Infanta.

VI. 'That the Men-servants, and Maid-servants of the most Gracious Infanta, and their Servants, Children, and Descendants, and all their Families of what sort soever serving her Highness, may be freely and publickly Catholicks.

VIII. That the Chappel, Church, and Oratory may be beautified with decent Ornaments of Altars, and other things necessary for Divine Service, which is to be celebrated in them according to the Custom of the Holy Roman Church, and that it shall be lawful for the said Servants and others to go to the said Chappel and Church at all hours, as to them shall seem expedient.

IX. That the Care and Custody of the said Chappel and Church shall be committed to such as the Lady Infanta shall appoint, to whom it shall be lawful to appoint Keepers, that no body may enter into them to do any un-decent thing.

X. That to the Administration of the Sacraments, and to serve in Chappel and Church aforesaid, there shall be Four and twenty Priests and Assistants, who shall serve weekly or monthly, as to the Infanta shall seem fit, and the Election of them shall belong to the Lady Infanta, and the Catholick King. Provided, That they be none of the Vassals of the King of Great Britain; and if they be, his Will and Consent is to be first obtained.

XI. That there be one Superiour Minister or Bishop, with necessary Authority upon all occasions which shall happen belonging to Religion; and for want of a Bishop, that his Vicar may have his Authority and Jurisdiction.

XII. That this Bishop or Superior Minister may correct and chastise all Roman Catholicks who shall offend; and shall exercise upon them all Jurisdiction Ecclesiastical: And moreover also the Lady Infanta shall have power to put them out of her Service, whensoever it shall seem expedient to her.

XIII. That it may be lawful for the Lady Infanta and her Servants to procure from Rome Dispensations, Indulgences, Jubilees, and all Graces, as shall seem fit to their Religion and Consciences; and to get and make use of any manner of Catholick Books whatsoever.

XIV. That the Servants and Family of the Lady Infanta, who shall come into England, shall take the Oath of Allegiance to the King of Great Britain: Provided, That there be no Clause therein which shall be contrary to their Consciences, and the Roman Catholick Religion; and if they happen to be Vassals to the King of Great Britain, they shall take the same Oath that the Spaniards do.

XV. That the Laws which are or shall be in England against Religion, shall not take hold of the said Servants; and only the foresaid Superior Ecclesiastical Catholick may proceed against Ecclesiastical persons, as have been accustomed by Catholicks: And if any Secular Judge shall apprehend any Ecclesiastical person for any offence, he shall forthwith cause him to be delivered to the aforesaid Superior Ecclesiastick, who shall proceed against him according to the Canon-Law.

XVI. That the Laws made against Catholicks in England, or in any other Kingdom of the King of Great Britain, shall not extend to the Children of this Marriage; and though they be Catholicks, they shall not lose the Right of Succession to the Kingdom and Dominions of Great Britain.

XVII. That the Nurses which shall give suck to the Children of the Lady Infanta, (whether they be of the Kingdom of Great Britain, or of any other Nation whatsoever) shall be chosen by the Lady Infanta, as she pleaseth, and shall be accounted of her Family, and enjoy the privileges thereof.

XVIII. That the Bishop, Ecclesiastical and Religious persons of the Family of the Lady Infanta shall wear the Vestment and Habit of their Dignity, Profession, and Religion, after the Custom of Rome.

XIX. For security that the said Matrimony be not dissolved for any Cause whatsoever; the King and Prince are equally to pass the Word and Honour of a King; and moreover, that they will perform whatsoever shall be propounded by the Catholick King for further confirmation, if it may be done decently and fitly.

XX. That the Sons and Daughters which shall be born of this Marriage, shall be brought up in the Company of the most Excellent Infanta, at least, until the Age of Ten years, and shall freely enjoy the Right of Successions to the Kingdoms, as aforesaid.

XXI. That whensoever any place of either Man-servant, or Maidservant, which the Lady Infanta shall bring with her (nominated by the Catholick King her Brother) shall happen to be void, whether by Death, or by other Cause or Accident, all the said Servants of her Family are to be supplied by the Catholick King, as aforesaid.

XXII. For security that whatsoever is capitulated, may be fulfilled, the King of Great Britain and Prince Charles are to be bound by Oath; and all the King's Council shall confirm the said Treaty under their hands: Moreover, the said King and Prince are to give their Faiths in the Word of a King, to endeavour, if possible, That whatsoever is capitulated, may be established by Parliament.

XXIII. That conformable to this Treaty, all these things proposed, are to be allowed and approved of by the Pope, that he may give an Apostolical Benediction, and a Dispensation necessary to effect the Marriage.

The Oath taken by the King and Prince, was as followeth.

VVE Ratifying and confirming the aforesaid Treaty, and all and every Capitulation contained and specified in the same, do approve, applaud, confirm, and ratifie of our certain knowledge, all and every of these things in as much as they concern our Selves, our Heirs, or our Successors: And we promise by these presents in the word of a King, to keep, fulfil, and observe the same; and to cause them to be kept, fulfilled, and observed inviolably, firmly, well and faithfully, equally, Bona fide, without all exception, and contradiction. And we confirm the same with an Oath upon the Holy Evangelists, in the presence of the Illustrious and Noble John de Mendoza, Charles de Colona, Ambassadors of the most Gracious Catholick King, residing in our Court.

The Private Articles were said to be these that follow; but they must be taken intirely upon the Credit of the Historical Collector; and so must the Oath of the Privy Counsellors too.

JAMES by the Grace of God, of Great Britain King, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom this present Writing shall come, Greeting. Inasmuch as among many other things which are contained within the Treaty of Marriage between our most dear Son Charles Prince of Wales, and the most Renowned Lady Donna Maria, Sister of the most Renowned Prince, and our well beloved Brother Philip the Fourth, King of Spain, It is agreed, That We, by our Oath, shall approve the Articles under-expressed to a word:

Private Articles sworn to by the K. in favour of Roman Catholics,

1. 'That particular Laws made against Roman Catholics, under which other Vassals of our Realms are not comprehended, and to whose observation all generally are not obliged; as likewise general Laws, under which all are equally comprized, if so be they are such which are repugnant to the Romish Religion, shall not at any time hereafter by any means or chance whatsoever, directly or indirectly be commanded to be put in execution against the said Roman Catholics; and we will cause that our Council shall take the same Oath as far as it pertains to them, and belongs to the execution which by the hand of them, and their Ministers is to be exercised.

2. 'That no other Laws shall hereafter be made anew against the said Roman Catholics, but that there shall be a perpetual Toleration of the Roman Catholic Religion, within private Houses throughout all our Realms and Dominions, which we will have to be understood as well of our Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as in England, which shall be granted to them in manner and form as is capitulated, decreed and granted in the Article of Fac. 21. the Treaty concerning the Marriage.

3. 'That neither by us nor any other interposed person whatsoever, directly or indirectly, privately or publicly, will we treat (or attempt) any thing with the most Renowned Lady Infanta Donna Maria, which shall be repugnant to the Romish Catholic Religion; neither will we by any means persuade her that she should ever renounce or relinquish the same in substance or form; or that she shall do any thing repugnant or contrary to those things which are contained in the Treaty of Matrimony.

4. 'That We and the Prince of Wales will interpose our Authority, and will do as much as in us shall lie, that the Parliament shall approve, confirm and ratifie all and singular Articles in favour of the Roman Catholics, capitulated between the most Renowned Kings by reason of this Marriage: And that the said Parliament shall revoke and abrogate particular Laws made against the said Roman Catholics, to whose observance also the rest of our Subjects and Vassals are not obliged; as likewise the general Laws under which all are equally comprehended, to wit, as to the Roman Catholics; if they be such as is aforesaid, which are repugnant to the Roman Catholic Religion, and that hereafter we will not consent that the said Parliament should ever at any time enact or write any other New Laws against Roman Catholics.

Moreover I Charles Prince of Wales, engage my self (and promise that the most Illustrious King of Great Britain, my most honoured Lord and Father, shall do the same both by word and writing) That all those things which are contained in the foregoing Articles, and concern as well the suspension as the abrogation of all Laws made against the Roman Catholics, shall within three years infallibly take effect, and sooner if it be possible; which we will have to lie upon our Conscience and Royal Honour. That I will intercede with the most Illustrious King of Great Britain, my Father, that the ten years of the education of the Children which shall be born of this Marriage with the most Illustrious Lady Infanta their Mother, accorded in the 23 Art. (which term the Pope of Rome desires to have prologued to twelve years) may be lengthened to the said term: And I promise freely and of my own accord, and swear, That if it so happen that the entire power of disposing of this matter be devolved to me, I will also grant and approve the said term.

Furthermore I Prince of Wales oblige my self upon my Faith to the Catholic King, That as often as the most Illustrious Lady Infanta shall require that I should give ear to Divines or others whom her Highness shall be pleased to employ in Matter of the Roman Catholic Religion, I will hearken to them willingly without all difficulty, and laying aside all excuse. And for further caution in point

Anno 1623. point of the free exercise of the Catholick Religion, and the suspension of the Law above-named, I Charles Prince of Wales, promise and take upon me in the word of a King, that the things above promised and treated concerning those Matters, shall take effect, and be put in execution as well in the Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as of England.

In taking the Oath, the King made some Scruple at the Pope's Title [Most Holy ;] as also did the Constable of Castile, at his being present at our Service ; but both of these were at last adjusted ; and now comes the Bishop of Calcedon by Title, to exercise Jurisdiction over the Catholics of this Kingdom, and the Chappel of St. James's was building for the Infanta ; where Don Carlos de Colonna laid the first Stone ; and her Picture was every where exposed, and the Dissenters from this Match, particularly Mr. Alured in a Letter to the Duke of Buckingham, is said to have perswaded him to break it off.

Now France thought it high time to unite its strength against the House of Austria ; and the Protestants that were banished, were permitted to return, and to rebuild their ruin'd Churches ; and this Benefit did this overture of a Match with Spain produce for that people. Gregory the 15th. now dies, and Cardinal Barbarino, by the Name of Urban the 8th. succeeds ; who, upon his Promotion, addresses the Two Letters following, one to the King, the other to the Prince.

Serenissimo JACOB O Magnæ Britanniae Regi Illustri, Urbanus P.P. VIII.

Serenissime Rex, Salutem & Lumen Divinae Gratiae. Scotiae regnum quod inclytos terris Reges, sanctissimosque caelo cives peperit, cum ad Cardinalatus nostri patrocinium pertinuerit, laetitiae simul ac mœoris uberem nobis materiam afferebat. Exultabamus gaudio, cogitantes in ea Regione, quam Romanorum Arma expugnare omnino non potuerunt, Romanae Ecclesiae fidem feliciter triumphasse, Scotorumque Regem nullum hactenus extitisse, qui Pontificiae auctoritatis hostis obierit. At enim vertebatur in luctum cythara nostra, cum ad praesentium temporum miseriae, oculos lachrymis manantes converteremus : Videmini enim laborante discordiarum patre, obliti esse eum qui nutrit vos, & contristati nutricem vestram Hierusalem. Quare Apostolica sedes, quae populos istos jampridem Christo genuit, mœore conficitur, dum tam praecalam hereditatem verti videt ad extraneos, damnique sui magnitudinem Britannorum Regum laudibus istarumque Provinciarum gloria metitur. Id vero praeter caetera dolendum orbi Christiano videtur, Jacobum Regem Catholicorum Regum prolem, & sanctissimae Parentis filium, a Pontifice Maximo atque a Majoribus suis in Religionis cultu dissentire. Si enim sublime istud ingenium, quod literarum studiis & prudentiae artibus Rex celeberrimus excoluisti, affulgenti Patri luminum assentiretur, facile conjicit Christiana Respublica quanto publicae concordiae bono factum esset, ut Nationes istas Insulasque, aut montium claustris aut Oceani gurgitibus dissitas, Scoticus Rex imperio jungeres. Videtur enim Majestas tua ob eam rem facta esse tot Provinciarum domina, ut ab eo, cui parent, facilius celeriusque Regna ista medelam ac salutem acciperent. Quare assiduis precibus jam tum eum venerabamur, qui dat salutem regibus, ut tot Divinae clementiae beneficia, quibus in conspectu Potentium admirabilis es, ad Britanniae incolumitatem & Ecclesiae gaudium conferret. Affulsit autem nobis non ita pridem beata spes oriens ex alto, cum te Austriacae affinitatis cupidum cognovimus, ex Catholica matre progigni exoptantem eos, qui tuam hereditatem adire populosque istos ditione tenere debent. Proin vix dici potest

To the Most Illustrious Prince, JAMES, King of Great Britain.

Most Serene King, We wish you Health and the Light of God's Grace. When the Kingdom of Scotland which hath brought forth famous Kings to earth, and most holy Citizens to heaven, was under our protection, whilst we were yet Cardinal, it afforded us plentiful matter of joy and sorrow. We were exceeding joyful when we considered, that the Faith of the Roman Church hath happily triumphed in that Countrey which the Roman Armies could never conquer ; and that there was never yet King of Scotland, who died an enemy to the Popes Authority. But our Harp was turned into mourning, when we cast our eyes, flowing with tears, upon the Miseries of the present times ; for you seem (while the Father of Discords is active) to have forgotten him who nourished you, and to have made sad your Nurse, Jerusalem. Wherefore the Apostles fear which brought forth that people to Christ, is pierced with sorrow, while it beholds so famous an inheritance to be given away to strangers, and measures the greatness of its loss by the praises of the British Kings, and the glory of those Dominions. But this, above all, ought most to be lamented by the Christian world, that King James, the off-spring of Catholick Kings, and the Son of a most holy Mother, should dissent from the Pope of Rome, and from his own Ancestors in point of Religious Worship. For if those eminent parts which you a most famous Prince have polished with Learning and Arts of Prudence, would assent to the Father of Lights illuminating the Christian World, we easily apprehend how much it would conduce to the Publick Peace, that being King of Scotland, you should joyn in one Kingdom those Nations and Islands, divided either by the Bars of the Mountains, or by the Depths of the Ocean. For your Majesty seems for that very reason to be made Lord of so many Provinces, that they might more easily and quickly receive healing and salvation from him whom they obey. Wherefore we even then besought God by continual Prayers, who gives Salvation to Kings, that so many Blessings by his Grace conferred upon you, by which you are admirable in the sight of Potentates, might bring safety to Britain, and joy to the Church. A blessed hope from above not long ago shined upon us, when we understood that you were desirous of a Catholick Alliance, and that the Issue test quod nobis solatium obtulit sanctissimæ recordationis Pontifex Gregorius XV. Prædecessor noster, dum nos in eorum Cardinalium cœtum ascivit quos Anglicani matrimonii causam cognoscere voluit. Enituit in nobis tantum negotium dissidentibus singularis quædam propensio in Majestatem tuam, cujus cum faveremus laudibus, felicitati etiam consultum cupiebamus. Nunc autem cum per Apostolici senatus suffragia ad hanc stationem pervenimus, ubi pro omnibus terrarum regibus excubandum est, non satis explicare possumus quanta nobis cura & desiderium sit Magnæ Britannię, ac tanti Regis dignitas. Divinitus vero accidisse videtur, ut primæ literæ quæ nobis in B. Petri sede regnantibus redderentur, eæ fuerint quas Prædecessori nostro Nobilissimus Carolus Walliæ Princeps scripserat, testes suæ in Romanos Pontifices voluntatis. Nunc autem cum venerabile illud Conjugium, benedicente Domino, perfici cupiamus, alloqui te decrevimus, nullis Majestatis tuæ literis expectatis. Charitas enim Pontificii Imperii decus est, & quamvis in sede hac potentissimorum Regum obsequiis culti commoremur, magnificum tamen nobis existimamus, suadente charitate, ad humiles etiam preces descendere, dum animas Christo lucremur: Primum ergo credere omnino te volumus nullum esse in orbe Christianum Principem, a quo plura expectare possis paternæ benevolentię documenta, quam a Pontifice Maximo, qui te desideratissimum filium Apostolicæ charitatis brachiis complecti cupit. Scimus quibus te litoris nuper ad tantum decus adipiscendum excitavit Gregorius XV. Cum in ejus locum venerimus, ejus in te propensionem non imitabimur solum, sed etiam superabimus. Speramus enim Nuntios a Britannia propediem allatum iri, qui Majestatem tuam rei Catholicæ favere testentur, Catholicosque isthic commorantes, quos Pater misericordiarum asseruit in libertatem filiorum Dei, pœnarum formidine liberatos, Regali tandem patrocínio perfrui. Remunerabitur ille qui dives est in misericordia, ejusmodi consilium, illustri aliqua felicitate, Tum nomini Majestatis tuæ plaudent regna terrarum, & militabunt acies cœlestis exercitus: Frendant licet dentibus suis peccatores, minetur seditione potens impietas, sperat Europa se visuram Jacobum Regem in Romana Ecclesia triumphantem, & Majorum suorum exempla novis pietatis operibus augentem. Non diffidimus adesse jam tempus Divini beneplaciti, quo illi qui Britannicæ Religionis laudes monumentis consignant, non semper alterius seculi facta loquentur, sed præsentis etiam Principatus decora consequentibus ætatibus proponere poterunt ad imitandum. Majores illi tui te vocant, qui tibi tantæ claritudinis & potentię hæreditatem reliquerunt, qui cœlestis regni fores Pontificiis clavibus generi humano patefieri crediderunt. Certe fieri non potest, ut Majestas tua tot sæculorum fidem, & Regum de te præclare meritorum, judicium aut contemnere audeat, aut condemnare. Nonne vides sententia Majestatis tuæ iis omnino cœlum eripi, qui tibi regnum reliquerunt, dum eos in Religionis cultu aberrasse contendis? Ita fieret, ut quos universa Ecclesia cives cœli & cohæredes Christi in æterna patria dominari credit, tu ex ipsorum sanguine prognatus tuo suffragio e cœlo detraheres, atque in errorum abyssum, & pœnarum carcerem detruderes. Nonne sentis tanti cogitatione facinoris ingrati animi tui Viscera perhorrescere? Nonne ejusmodi consiliis Regalis ingenii indoles reclamitat? quam tamen tot Europæ Nationes, which should succeed in the Inheritance and Government of those Nations might be begotten of a Catholic Mother. We can scarcely express how much joy Gregory the Fifteenth of Blessed Memory, our Predecessor, brought us, when he made us one of the Congregation of those Cardinals whom he would have to take cognisance of the English Match: While we discoursed of a Matter of so great importance, we expressed a singular propension of mind towards your Majesty, and were both tender of your praises, and desirous to provide for your happiness. And now being by the consent of the Apostolical Senate advanced to this Station, where we are to watch and ward for all earthly Monarchs, we cannot sufficiently declare what a care and desire we have of Great Britain, and the Honour of so great a King. It seems to have been a special providence of God, that the first Letters which we received reigning in the Seat of St. Peter, were those which the most Noble Charles Prince of Wales wrote to our Predecessor, as a testimony of his affection to the Popes of Rome. And since we now desire that this venerable Marriage should by the Blessing of God be perfected, we resolved to write unto you, without expecting Letters first from you; for Charity is the honour of the Papal Empire; although most powerful Kings do homage to us in this Seat, yet we account it glorious (Charity so persuading) to descend to humble Prayers, so that we may gain Souls to Christ. First therefore, we desire you to persuade your self, that there is no Prince in the Christian world, from whom you can expect more evidences of fatherly affection than from the Pope, who desires to embrace you, a most desired Son, with the Arms of Apostolical Charity. We know with what a Letter Gregory the Fifteenth excited you to obtain so great a Glory: And since we have succeeded him, we will not only imitate his Inclinations towards you, but will exceed them. We hope we shall shortly have News out of England, that your Majesty is favourable to the Catholic Interest; and that the Catholics who live there, whom the Father of Mercies hath vindicated into the liberty of the Sons of God, being freed from the fear of Punishment, enjoy your Royal Protection. He who is rich in Mercy, will reward such a purpose with some signal happiness: The Kingdoms of the Earth will applaud your Majesty, and the Host of Heaven will wage war for you: Though sinners gnash their Teeth, and Impiety powerful to raise Sedition, threaten, yet Europe hopes she shall see King James triumphing in the Roman Church, and increasing the example of his Ancestors by new works of Piety. We do not distrust that the time of God's good pleasure is now at hand, when they who recommend to History the praises of the British Religion, shall not always speak of the deeds of another Age, but may be able to propose the present Government as a pattern of imitation to the Ages following. Your Ancestors call upon you, who have left you so powerful and so famous an inheritance; who believed that the Gates of the Kingdom of Heaven were opened to mankind with the Popes Keys. Certainly it cannot be, that your Majesty should dare either to condemn or condemn the belief of so many Ages, and the judgment of so many Kings, who have deserved well of you. Do you not see, that by your Majesties Opinion they are deprived of Heaven, who left you a Kingdom, while you contend that they erred in the worship of their Religion? By this means it would be, that whom the Universal Church believes to be Citizens of Heaven, and to reign as Co-heirs with Christ in that everlasting Countrey, you, who are descended of them, should snatch them out of Heaven, and thrust them into the bottomless pit of Error, and the prison of hellish Torments. Do not you

Pope Urban's Letter to Prince Charles. Nobilissime Princeps, salutem & lumen Divinæ gratiæ. Primæ literæ, quæ Nobis ad Apostolatus solium elatis redditæ sunt, illæ fuerunt quas ad Sanctissimæ memoriæ Gregorium Decimum-quintum Predecessorem nostrum ex Hispania misisti. Manus ad cœlum sustulimus, & Patri misericordiarum gratias egimus, cum in ipso nostri Regiminis exordio Pontificem Romanum ex Officii genere colere Britannus Princeps inciperet. Singulari nostri quadam animi propensione rei Anglicanæ jamdiu favemus, quo factum est, ut in hoc Antistitum Conventu, & Nationum Patria, Scoti tui, dum Cardinalem ageremus, se in nostram potissimum fidem ac clientelam contulerint. Patrocinium autem tam splendidæ Provinciæ suscipientes, identidem majorum tuorum res gestas, & Britannicarum Insularum laudes contemplamur. Eos autem quo illustriores orbi terrarum antea ætates ostentabant, eo nos impensius cupiebamus consimilibus Christianæ pietatis triumphis hæc tempora illic insigniri. Cum autem Magnæ Britannia Rex, Pater tuus, non minorem ex disciplinarum fama, quam perceive your Bowels yearn at the thought of so ungrateful an Offence? Are not such deliberations repugnant to your Royal temper? Which nevertheless so many Nations of Europe are forced to reprehend, while it dissent from the Seat of the Apostles. Let the splendor of so great glory allure your eyes, which looks out of Heaven upon you, and reaches you out a hand ready to reduce, by your means, the Kingdom of Britain into the Sanctuary of God, with the conduct of Angels, and acclamations of men. A long time ago, Christian Religion lay all along in the World squalid and deform'd with anguish, affrighted with the threats of Tyrants: but that Emperor whom we owe to Great Britain, Constantine the Great, the Defender of the Popes authority, and the Avoucher of the Roman Faith, did not only bring her out of her lurking places, but called her to an Empire. He is a fit pattern of imitation for your Majesty, not those Kings who have transgressed and dissipated the Everlasting Covenant. We call you, O most wished for Son, from this Watch-Tower of the World, into the Society of his Glory: Add one day to your past years, which all posterity may celebrate with a grateful memory. Put a Mitre of Eternal Glory upon your Head, that in the time of your Reign, we may say with the holy Apostle, I have seen a new Heaven in Britain, and a new City descending from Heaven, and a Guard of Angels upon her Walls. If that should come to pass, we shall make reckoning, that our Reign hath been happy to mankind. This our sollicitude, we believe, will be so grateful unto you, that we verily hope, upon the receipt of our Letter, you will forthwith increase the advantage of the Catholics which live there: Which if you shall do, you will exceedingly oblige us, and we shall consign to you the King of Kings, debtor of so great benefits, who so long as he shall preserve your Royal Family in eminent happiness, shall second the wishes of the Roman Church, and bring joy to the holy Prelates.

Dated at Rome at St. Peter's, sub annulo Piscatoris 15 Octob. 1623. The first year of our Reign.

To the most Noble Pr. CHARLES, Pope Urban the Eighth.

Most Noble Prince, we wish you health, and the light of Gods grace. The first Letters which were delivered to us, after we were preferred to the Throne of the Apostleship, were those which you sent out of Spain to Gregory the Fifteenth, of famous memory, our Predecessor. We lifted up our Hands to Heaven, and gave thanks to the Father of Mercies, when in the very entry of our Reign, a British Prince began to perform this kind of obedience to the Pope of Rome. We have been a long time favourable to England by a natural bent and inclination, whence it came to pass, that your Scotchmen recommended themselves to our especial Trust and Patronage in this Assembly of Prelates, and Countrey of all Nations, while we were yet Cardinal. When we undertook the protection of so famous a Kingdom, we did often contemplate the Exploits of your Ancestors, and the Elogies of the British Islands; and by how much former Ages did represent them more glorious to the World, by so much did we more earnestly desire, that those times might there be made remarkable with the like triumphs of Christian Piety: And seeing the King of Great Britain, your Father, loveth quam ex potentia vi gloriam concupierit, optavimus semper, supra quam dici potest, ei divinitus insignem aliquam offerri occasionem generis humani demerendi, & celestis hereditatis adipiscendæ. Nunc autem advenisse tempus credimus quo votis nostris frui liceat, cum ad tantum decus potentissimo parenti aditum patefacere in præsens videaris, Filius in maximarum rerum spem genitus. In ea enim sententia sumus ut arbitremur, tantum quo flagras, Catholici conjugii desiderium, quandam Dei te vocantis & suaviter omnia disponentis, vocem esse. Nam opus Omnipotentis non est tonare semper voce magnitudinis suæ, quia ipsa arcana consilia dirigentia mortales in viam salutis, verba sunt quibus æterna sapientia loquitur, & jubentis Numinis mandata declarat. Quare omni semper studio elaboravimus, ut conjugium hoc honorabile, benedicente Domino, perficeretur. Hinc conjicere potes, non potuisse alium ad sacrum hoc rerum humanarum fastigium provohi, a quo plura sperare possis documenta benevolentia & beneficentia fructus. Te enim Principem Nobilissimum Pontificia charitati commendant Majores tui, Hæreticæ Impietatis domitores, & Romana Hierarchia non cultores modo, sed vindices. Ii enim cum dogmatum novorum portenta in ea Septentrionalis Oceani propugnacula irrumperent, impiorum conatus salutaribus armis compescuerunt, nec commutaverunt veritatem Dei in mendacium. Quod si, ut scribis, reipsa magis gloriaberis de avitæ imitatione Religionis, quam de Regii sanguinis Hæreditate, facile prospicimus quantum ejusmodi verba, in libro viventium exaranda, Romana Ecclesiæ lætitiâ, & Britannicis Regnis felicitatem polliceantur. Hæc a te beneficia, desideratissime Fili, exigit atque expectat venerandum illud Regum Scotorum Concilium, quorum facta absque dubio condemnant qui ab illorum Religione desciscit. Hoc a te Catholici totius Europa Reges flagitant; quomodo enim eorum concordia potest votum esse sollicitudinis tuæ, donec ab eis in maxima re, id est, in Sacrorum cultu dissentias? Romana Ecclesia, quam Magistrâ veritatis Anglia tam diu coluit, cujus fidem tibi non invisam esse fateris, cupit tibi celestis Regni fores quam primum patefacere, & te in Majorum tuorum possessionem reducere. Cogita te nunc in Hispania Regia spectaculum esse factum Deo & hominibus, semperque fore desiderium & curam Pontificatus nostri. Cave ne Consilia eorum, qui terrenas rationes celestibus anteferunt, obdurent cor tuum, Nobilissime Princeps. Lætifica tandem Militiam Celestis Exercitus, in tuis castris dimicaturam, ac faventibus Angelis hominibusque plaudentibus, redi, Fili exoptatissime, ad Ecclesiæ te cupientis amplexus, ut in Matrimonio tuo gestientes gaudio canere possimus, Dominus regnavit, & decore indutus est. Omnino qui Catholicæ Virginis nuptias concupiscis, Celestem etiam illam Sponsam tibi assumere debes, cujus forma se captum fuisse Solomon ille Regum sapientissimus gloriatur. Hæc enim sapientia est, per quam Reges regnant, cujus dos est splendor gloriæ, & Principatus sempiternus. Eam vero a terrarum contagione secretam, atque in sinu Dei recubantem, in Romana Ecclesiæ Sanctuario Majores tui quæsierunt. Qui tibi has hortationes conscribimus, & benevolentiam Pontificiam testamur, cupimus perpetuis Historiarum Monumentis nomen tuum commendari; atque in eos Principes referri, qui præclare merentes in terra de Regno Celesti, sunt posteritati virtutis exemplar & votorum no less the glory of Learning, than that of Might and Power; we have always heartily wished, above Fac. 21. what we are able to express, that God would be pleased to put into his hand some eminent occasion, whereby to oblige Mankind, and obtain an eternal Inheritance. And now we believe the time is come to enjoy our wishes, since you seem at present to open the way for so great a fame to your most Noble Father, a Son begotten unto the hope of the greatest concerns; for we are of opinion, that your so vehement desire of a Catholick Marriage, is a certain voice of God calling you, and disposing all things sweetly. For it is not necessary, that the Omnipotent should always thunder with the voice of his greatness; because secret Counsels themselves, directing men into the way of Salvation, are words by which the eternal Wisdom speaks and declares the command of a Deity. Wherefore we have ever endeavoured, to the utmost of our power, that this Honourable Marriage, by the blessing of God, might be finished. From hence you may perceive, that none could have been advanced to this height of humane Affairs, from whom you may expect more expressions of good-will or fruits of bounty. For your Ancestors, which tamed Heretical impieties, and not only revered, but vindicated the Roman Hierarchy, do recommend you a most Noble Prince, to the Papal Charity: For when Monsters of new Opinions broke into the Bulwarks of the Northern Ocean, they bridled the endeavours of the wicked with wholsom arms, and did not change the truth of God into a lie. And if you, as you write, shall in good earnest glory more in the imitation of your Ancestors, than that you are descended of Kings, we easily foresee how great joy to the Church of Rome, and how great felicity to the British Kingdoms these words do promise, which deserve to be written in the Book of Life. Such good turns, O most desired Son, the venerable Assembly of the Scottish Kings exacts and expects from you; whose actions, without doubt, he condemns, who revolts from their Religion. The Catholick Kings of all Europe require this of you; for how can their Concord be the Vow of your care, as long as you dissent from them in a matter of the greatest importance, that is, in the veneration of holy Rites? The Roman Church, which England revered long ago, as the Mistress of Truth, whose belief you confess you have not, desires forthwith to open unto you the Gates of the Heavenly Kingdom, and to bring you back into the possession of your Ancestors. Think that now in Spain you are become a Spectacle to God and Men, and that you shall always be the desire and care of our Reign. Take heed, most Noble Prince, that the counsels of those who prefer worldly interests before heavenly, do not obdure your heart. Make glad the Host of Heaven, which will fight in your Camps; and return, O most wished for Son, into the embraces of the Church, which desires you with the applause and favour of Men and Angels; that so rejoicing in your Marriage, we may sing with joy, The Lord hath reigned, and put on comeliness. Certainly you, who desire the Marriage of a Catholick Virgin, ought to espouse the heavenly Bride, with whose beauty Solomon, the wisest of Kings, boasts himself to have been enamoured. For this is the wisdom by which Kings reign, whose Dowry is the splendor of Glory, and an eternal Principality; and your Ancestors sought her in the Sanctuary of the Roman Church, severed from the contagion of the World, and reposing in the wisdom of God. We, who write to you this Exhortation, and testify our Papal Charity, desire to have your name renowned in the Histories of all Ages, and that you may be recorded amongst those Princes, who deserving well on Earth of the Kingdom of Heaven,

 Pontificatus nostri Anno Primo.*

However the Match began for all this to tend towards a breach, and though several methods were drawn up, and means made use of to give ease to the English Roman Catholics; yet it did not relish with the generality of the Kings Subjects, and in Spain during the Princes abode there Sir Edmund Verney struck a Sorbon Doctor for endeavouring to pervert one of the Princes Pages, and the Duke himself as to his carriage and garb, as being too much French, was not relished, and the Earl of Bristol was by the Spaniard vogueed as the more able Minister, and the truth is Buckingham and Bristol were of very different opinions in this matter; But this stay of the Match was not in the least acceptable to the English Papists, and 'tis said, that Sir Toby Matthews in particular did openly declare, that Spain by their delays would draw on unspeakable miseries on the Catholics of this Kingdom, if the Match should at last end in a rupture.

And now the Prince prepares for his departure from the Court of Spain, and leaves a Proxy in the Hands of the Earl of Bristol, and withal contrary Orders that it should not be made use of till further directions from him. There had hapned some private disgusts between the Duke of Buckingham and the Conde de Olivares, which also gave some hindrance to the progress of this great affair; however the Prince was universally esteemed in Spain for his great Affability, Constancy and Gravity, as well as unparalleled Beauty. He departs from Madrid on the 12th of September, where the Queen and Infanta are pre-par'd in great magnificence to receive his Fare-wel; and he is accompanied by the King of Spain onwards of his way towards the Escorial and feasted, where the King declared 'The Obligation which the Prince had put upon him, by 'putting himself into his Hands, a thing not 'usual with Princes; protesting that he earnestly 'desired a near Conjunction of Brotherly affecti'on, for the more intire unity betwixt them.
 'The Prince replied to him, magnified the high 'favours which he found, during his abode in 'his Court and presence; which had begotten
 'such estimation of his worth, that he knew not
 'how to value; but he would leave a Mediatrix
 'to supply his own defects, if he would make 'him so happy as to continue him in the good 'opinion of her, his most fair and most dear
 'Mistress.

A great Train of the Spanish Nobility attends the Prince to his Ship, where they are Treated by him on board; who afterwards bringing them back ashore is surprized by a sudden storm, and with extreme difficulty exposing a light from a Ship, one of the outmost of the Fleet, is with ven, are become the example of Virtue to Posterity, and the measure of wishes. We beseech the Father of of Lights, that this blessed hope, by which he promi-sesh us the return of so great a Prince, by the conduct of the holy Ghost, may forthwith fructifie and bring Salvation to Great Britain, and joy to all the Christian World.

great hazard imbarqued, and is said to have,
 amongst others, spoke these words at his arti-val, 'That it was a great weakness and folly in 'the Spaniard, after they had used him so ill, to 'grant him a free departure.

He arrived at Portsmouth the Fifth of October following, where with the universal joy of the People he is welcomed and received, and at his arrival at London, the City (so numerous were the Bonfires) seemed all on a flame; after the Princes departure a rumor was spread in the Court of Spain that the Ratification was come from Rome, which gave occasion to that party with whom the orders were left, that the Proxy should not be delivered till farther order from the Prince, to deliver his Instructions to Bristol, who was very much troubled thereat, but said 'twas very advisable that all these matters should be kept very private, lest the Prince should be stopped by the Spaniards. Bristol however gives not over this matter, but solicites it afresh at the Court in England, by his Letters to the Prince, and adds for Arguments the greatness of the Infanta's Portion 2000000 of Money, that this match would bring on an universal Peace and the restitution of the Palatinat, settle the two Monarchies in amity for ever; but if a breach should happen, he left it to his Highness to consider of the consequents thereof. But all in vain, for the Prince and Buckingham hast to the King and give him a perfect Narration of all, as well the Spaniards delays as Bristols miscarriages. And now the King by advice of the Privy Counsel absolutely insists upon the restitution of the Palati-nat, thanks the King for the Magnificent entertainment of his Son whilest in Spain, and he acquaints Bristol that he thinks one of the Holydays in Christmases to be the fittest time for the celebration of the Marriage, it being a time of Festivity. But these Advices please not Bristol, who writes again in an Argumentative way against them to the King, but prevails nothing; for the King, Prince, Duke and People, seem now nothing so forward as formerly, but on the contrary a Parliament is resolved to be called for their advice in the Princes Match, and Bristol is again positively commanded to follow his new instructions. The King in the mean time makes some overtures and proposals to the Palgrave, as that upon a due submission to the Emperor, which might be noble too, the Emperor might be induced to bestow the Electorate upon his Son, and if a Match 'twixt the Emperor's Daughter and his Son should ensue, he might live in the Court of England with the Prince of Wales and Infanta, and so all objection about his Education be removed, and so all things might at last settle on their old

old bottom. But these matters were not at all acceptable to the Elector, who gave reasons against those from the present conjuncture of Affairs in Germany, as that all the Protestant Princes had declared the Restitution of the Palatinate to be the only means to restore Peace to Germany, and their hearty cheerfulness to this good work was sufficiently testified by the Duke of Brunswick's Levies, and that the most part of those who fought under the Imperial Banner were of a contrary Religion and affection; that the King of Denmark was ever ready to joyn Arms with his Majesty of Great Britain, whereby in all probability a restitution of all would at last be infallibly obtained: And there were not wanting those here at home who were ever forward to put the King on in this War, though the Parliament was not at all forward in the advance of Moneys towards it; Vote indeed they did to assist the King herein with their Lives and Fortunes, but then the matter of Grievances, Religion, Liberty and Property always interpose, and some quarrel or other, upon one of these accounts, is ever started and managed by some popular and Tribunitial Orators of the Lower House to the spoiling of all, ever bringing a Dissolution of that Parliament with them; and then at their recess into the Country, the Peoples ears are fill'd with misrepresentations of these matters, and jealousies and fears by all ways and means every where stir'd up.

Endeavours were now used to piece up the old and antient Union 'twixt us and the United Netherlands, which of late Years, by reason of Barneveldt's influence on those States, were very much shaken and not quite broke; for in stead of those submissive Answers usually given him and the late Queen, their best Friends, their stile grew now to become lofty, high and peremptory, not over grateful in respect of those constant Friendships and supports ever in the greatest straits afforded them always here, and one matter which encouraged them hereto, was that the King had surrendred up their Cautionary Towns, a strong bridle ever on that People, too mutinous and not ever over thankful. The matters were heartily and on very good grounds as to the antient things represented to the King, but for that time laid aside, for indeed the grand matter of the Match took up all our Debate now at this time; and the Ratifications in the beginning of December arrived from Rome in Spain, to the Universal joy of that People, which their Bonfires and great Ordinance declared. The King of Spain to manifest his readiness, prepares for the Espousals, settles the Infanta's Family and Officers, she applies her self dayly to the learning of the English Tongue, our Embassadors demean themselves to her as Subjects, and Bristol provides costly Equipage for the Solemnity; but all is in pieces by the opening the new Instructions, the Infanta discontinues the study of our Language, and was no longer treated or stiled the Princess of England. And thus ended this great Treaty which was so many years carrying on, and now seemed to be brought to perfection, in the beginning whereof the Spaniards sincerity was very questionable, but in the end he appeared very hearty and real: But our King being not willing to play an aftergame, as to the restitution of the Palatinate, insisting upon its immediate delivery, did on that account break it of.

Bristol (for which afterwards he was called home, as we shall in the sequel of this History manifest) having demurr'd (as is before intimated) upon the new Instructions, sends his Apology to the King, which is not admitted, for that Buckingham played the surer and more acceptable game at the Court, and procures his revocation from his Embassie, which being communicated by him to the Conde de Olivares, and having desired of him a day to take his leave of his Majesty of Spain, he is said in the presence of Sir Walter Aston, and Conde Gondomar, thus to bespeak the Earl, That the King had received large advertisements, with what malice and rancor his Enemies did prosecute him, and how powerful they are in England; And in regard that the envy which was drawn upon him proceeded from his earnest endeavours to accomplish the Match; and that the particular fault laid to his charge, was, in point of delivering the Proxies deposited in his hands, that his Majesty takes it to Heart, and judgeth himself touched in his Honour, if for this cause his enemies shall prevail so far, as to work his ruine or disgrace: And therefore he will write to the King of Great Britain, and send a particular Ambassador, if it be needful, to mediate for him; for that he had served his Master with that exactness and fidelity, which deserved not only to be assisted by all good Offices, but to be rewarded and published: And his Majesty, for the example of his own Subjects, and for encouragement of all such as should serve their Princes with the like Loyalty, had sent him a Blank, signed by himself, wherein he might set down his own Conditions, both in point of Title and Fortune. And this he did in no wise to oblige another Prince's Subject, but only to give encouragement to honest and faithful proceedings: And therefore he would not make these offers in private, but open and justifiable to all the World: And would accompany all that he should do with a Declaration or Patent, That what he had done for the Earl of Bristol, was for the fidelity wherewith he had served his own Master.

Whereunto the Earl answer'd, That he was sorry, and much afflicted to hear such language; and desired that they should understand, that neither this King nor Spain were beholding to him; for, whatsoever he had done, he thought the same to be fittest for his Master's service, and his own honour, having no relation to Spain; and that he served a Master, from whom he was assured both of justice and due reward; and nothing doubted, but his own innocency would prevail against the wrong intended by his powerful Adversaries: And were he sure to run into imminent danger, he had rather go home, and cast himself at his Master's Feet and Mercy, and therein comply with the duty and honour of a faithful Subject, though it should cost him his Head, than be Duke or Infantado of Spain: And that with this resolution he would imploy the utmost of his power to maintain the amity between the two Kings and their Crowns, and to serve his Catholick Majesty.

After he had taken his leave, a Sum of Money was offered him, which was told him he might receive, for that no body knew of it, and so it could not be discovered. But he replied, 'Yes, one would know it, who, he was assured, would reveal it to his Majesty, viz. the Earl of Bristol himself; and it would make him not so clear in his own Heart as now he was: And so he refused the offer.

The Match was now quite broken, yet the Treaty

Olivares offers Bristol large Preferments in the Kings name, when he was to take his leave.

Bristol's Answer to those Proffers.

Anno 1623. Treaty kept, seemingly on foot, the Spaniards expect a War from England, and prepare for it; the Jewels were not restored, but ready to be returned: and they now receive News of an intended Marriage with France, with the Lady Henrietta Maria, now carrying on by the Ambassador the Lord Kensington, now Earl of Holland, who gave a very fair and favourable account of the kind reception his Embassie met with; as that the Princess her self was observed to be very chearful of countenance at his first appearance; That the Queen, though her self a Daughter of Spain, was very free in it; and the Queen Mother very hearty, so far as might stand with her Daughters honour; the Statists there judge it very adviseable, it being a most fit Expedient to put a stop to the growing greatness of Spain, being in confederation with Holland and the Duke of Brunswick; and that their hearts are not capable of more content, than to see this Motion upon a publick Commission, and all that may touch upon the way of Spain dissolved. Neither are they like to strain us to unreasonable Conditions in favour of the Roman Catholicks in his Majesties Dominions: For in that matter their Pulse beat so temperately, as to promise a good Crisis therein. And in case his Majesty be drawn to banish the Priests and Jesuits, and to quicken the Laws against other Catholicks, to keep a good intelligence with his Parliament; yet, they say, they hope he will not tie his hands from some moderate favour, to flow hereafter from the mediation of that State, which is all they pretend unto for the saving of their Honour, who otherwise would hardly be reputed Catholicks.

Holland adviseth Expedition in the Match, lest it might be intrigued by the Spaniard; who, no doubt would endeavour somewhat of that nature: Hereupon our King adviseth on the Calling of a Parliament in good earnest, and upon very fair and probable Circumstances; but before, endeavours to settle his Kingdoms in a strict alliance with those to whom Neighbourhood, or Alliance, or the common Interest of State and Religion had any way linked him; and accordingly the Parliament is summoned Feb. 19. at Westminster; and the King thus bespeaks them.

The Kings
Speech to the Parliament.

I Have Assembled you at this time, to impart to you a Secret, and Matter of great importance, as can be to my State, and the state of my Children; wherein I crave your best and safest Advice and Counsel according as the Writ whereby you were Assembled, imports; That the King would advise with you in Matters concerning his Estate and Dignity. And as I have ever endeavoured, by this and the like ways, to procure and cherish the Love of my People towards me, so I do hope, and my Hope is exceeded by Faith; for I do fully now believe, that never any King was more beloved of his People; whom, as you, my Lords and Gentlemen, do here represent, so would I have you truly to represent all their Loves to me; that in you, as in a true Mirrour or Glass, I may perfectly behold it; and not as in a false Glass, that represents it not at all, or otherwise than it is indeed. Give me your free and faithful Counsels in the Matter I propose, of which you have often heard, the March of my Son: wherein, as you may know, I have spent much time, with great Cost, in long Treaties, desiring always therein (and not without great reason, hoping to have effected my Desires) the advancement of my State and Children, and the General Peace of Christendom, wherein I have constantly laboured, depending upon fair Hopes and Promises. At the earnest instance of my Son, I was contented (although it was of an extraordinary Nature) to send him to prosecute his desires in Spain; and for his more safety, sent Buckingham (in whom I ever reposed most trust of my person) with him; with this Command, Continually to be present with him, and never to leave him, till he had returned again safely unto me. Which he performed, though not with that effect in the business that I expected, yet not altogether without profit; for it taught me this point of wisdom, Qui versatur in generalibus, is easily deceived; and that Generality brings nothing to good issue; but that before any matter can be fully finished, it must be brought to particulars: For, whenas I thought the Affair had been before their going, produced to a narrow point, relying upon their general Propositions, I found, when they came there, the matter proved to be so raw, as if it had never been treated of; the Generals giving them easie way to evade, and affording them means to avoid the effecting of any thing.

The Particulars that passed in the Treaty, I mean not now to discover to you, the time being too short; I refer you to Charles and Buckingham, and the Secretaries Reports, who shall relate unto you all the Particulars. And after that, super totam materiam, I desire your best assistance to advise me, what is best and fittest for me to do for the good of the Commonwealth, and the Advancement of Religion, and the Good of my Son, and my Grand-Children of the Palatine. And of your Estate, I know you cannot but be sensible, considering that your welfare consists in ours; and you shall be sure to have your share in what misery shall befall us: And therefore I need to urge no other Argument to you in this behalf, in offering me your wisest and surest Counsel and furtherance. And I assure you in the Faith of a Christian King, that it is res integra presented unto you, and that I stand not bound, nor either way engaged, but remain free to follow what shall be best advised.

To plant is not sufficient, unless, like good Gardners, you pluck up the Weeds that will choak your Labours; and the greatest Weeds among you, are Jealousies; root them out. For my Actions, I dare avow them before God; but Jealousies are of a strange Depth. I am the Husband, and you the Wife; and it is subject to the Wife to be jealous of her Husband: Let this be far from you. I can truly say, and will avouch it before the Seat of God and Angels, that King never governed with a purer, sincerer, and more incorrupt heart, than I have done, far from all will and meaning of the least error or imperfection of my Reign.

It hath been talked of my Remissness in maintenance of Religion, and suspicion of a Toleration: But, as God shall judge me, I never thought nor meant; nor ever in word expressed any thing that favoured of it. It is true, that at times, for reasons best known to my self, I did not so fully put those Laws in execution, but did wink and connive at some things, which might have hindered more weighty Affairs; but I never

'never in all my Treaties, ever agreed to any thing, to the overthrow and disagreeing of those Laws; but had in all a chief preservation of that Truth, which I have ever professed. And, as in that respect, I have a charitable conceit of you, I would have you have the like of me also, in which I did not transgress: For it is a good Horse-man's part, not always to use his Spurs, and keep strait the Reins, but sometimes to use the Spurs, and suffer the Reins more remiss; so it is the part of a wise King, and my Age and Experience in Government hath informed me, sometimes to quicken the Laws with straight Executions, and at other times, upon just occasion, to be more remiss; And I would also remove from your thoughts all Jealousies, that I might, or ever did question or infringe any of your Lawful Liberties or Priviledges; but I protest before God, I ever intended you should enjoy the fulness of all those that former Times give good warrant and testimony of; which, if need be, I will enlarge and amplify.

'Therefore I would have you, as I have in this place heretofore told you, as St. Paul did Timothy, avoid Genealogies and Curious Questions, and nice Querks and Jerks of Law, and idle Innovations; and if you minister me no just occasion, I never yet was, nor ever shall be curious or captious to quarrel with you: But I desire you to avoid all doubts and hindrances, and to compose your selves speedily and quietly to this weighty Affair I have propos'd; for that I have found already, Delays have proved dangerous, and have bred distraction of this business; and I would not have you by other occasions to neglect or protract it. God is my Judge, I speak it as a Christian King, Never any wayfaring man, that was in the Deserts of Arabia, and in danger of Death, for want of Water to quench his Thirst, more desired Water, than I thirst and desire the good and comfortable success of this Parliament, and blessing upon your Counsels, that the good issue of this may expiate and acquit the fruitless issue of the former, And I pray God, your Counsels may advance Religion and the publick weal, and the Good of me and my Children.

Speaker;
who made this Sp.

'Since I cannot bring an Olive-Branch in my mouth, as a Sign of my Peace, and that God (in whose hauds are the hearts of Kings) without whose Providence a Sparrow doth not fall to the ground, whom no man can resist, hath inclined your Majesty to cast your eye of Grace on me & to confirm me in this place; I am taught in the best School, that Obedience is better than Sacrifice. And I will only say with a Learned Father, Da Domine quod jubes, & jube quod vis. Otherwise I have great cause to be affraid of such a Charge, to be executed before so great a Majesty, and in so great an Assembly, but that I hope your Majesty will extend your Scepter of Grace, as Ahasuerus did, to sustain me in my fainting.

'Your Majesty is Princeps Hereditarius, descended from both the Roses, and hath united both the Kingdoms: At your first Entrance you wrought a wonder in the Tumult of our Cares,

'and Cloud of our Fears, happening upon the Death of the late Queen, by the bright Beams of your Sun-shine, which a Poet elegantly expressed, Miracano, Sol occubuit, Nox nulla secuta est. There was a David in Hebron, and no Ishboseth to disturb your peaceable Entrance; but the Acclamations of all your Subjects and Commons, concurring to express their great contentment. This was no sudden Flash of Joy, but a constant blessing, by the continuance of the Gospel and true Religion, maugre the Malice and hellish invention of those, who would have blown up all at once; but God laughed them to scorn, and they fell into their own Trap. These things I leave to your Majesties Royal Remembrance, as a Duty to be practised, and to be expressed by our thankfulness to our holy God; for it is a good thing to be thankful: Non est dignus dandis, qui non agit gratias pro datis.

'Since my designment to this place, I called to mind these Statutes of late times, and find two of especial note; the first, of 32 H. 8, which was called Parliamentum doctum, for the many good Laws made for the settling of Possessions. The other, 39 Eliz. which by a Reverend Divine was called Parliamentum pium; because the Subjects thereby were enabled to found Hospitals without Licence of Mortmain, or ad quod damnum, and other charitable Laws, which I omit, being not perpetual. And I likewise called to mind many glorious offers made by your Majesty, and other good Provisions at the two last Meetings. Now your Majesty hath stretched forth your Scepter to call us to you again, and hath made Declaration, that all Jealousies and Distractions might be removed, and the memory of Parliament-Nullities might be buried. And my desire is, that your Majesties influence may distil upon us, and you proceed in such a sweet harmony and conjunction, that Righteousness and Peace may kiss each other; and that Mercy and Truth may meet; and the world may say, Ecce quam bonum & quam jucundum Regem & Populum convenire in unum.

'And, for perfecting of this work, the good Bills against Monopolies, Informers, and Concealers may now pass, and receive strength, with General, Liberal, and Royal Pardon, according to the bounty of the late Queen; that so this Parliament may be called Felix, Doctum, & Pium; which will be good to your Subjects, and no diminution to your Revenue, or derogation to your Prerogative, which in your Majesties hands is a Scepter of Gold, but in others hands is a Rod of Iron. I need not speak in the praise of the Fundamental Common Laws: Veritas Temporis filia; Time hath sufficiently justified them. Monarchy is the best Government; and of Monarchies, those which are hereditary. The best supply of your Majesties wants is in Parliament, where the Subject is bound by his own consent; other courses of Benevolence come heavily. The Subjects enjoy the Gospel freely by your protection, and your Majesty may be safe in their Loyalty; other Safeties are but as Ajax his Shield, a weight rather than a defence. Their desire is, that the good Laws for Religion may be confirmed; and that the generation of Locusts, the Jesuits and Seminary Priests, which were wont to creep in corners, and do now come abroad, may be, by the execution of these good Laws, as with an East-wind, blown over the

the Sea. Our late Queen Elizabeth lived and Anno. died in peace; the Pope cursed her, but God 1623 blessed her: And so shall your Majesty, having God to your Friend, find safety in the Ark of true Religion, and when you are old and full of days, Land you in Heaven; and then your hopeful Prince, which sprang out of your own Loins, shall sway that Scepter, which you must leave, to enjoy a Crown Celestial; and God in his due time will restore the distressed Princess, her Husband and Royal Issue, to that Inheritance which is now possessed by the usurping Sword of their Enemies; whereof we are the more confident, because that Countrey was heretofore a Sanctuary in our distress, when Religion was here persecuted. Caro was wont to say, Hoc sentio, & Carthago destruenda est, But I say, Hoc sentio, & Palatinatus recu- perandus est.

The Question was put to a Latēdemonian, Why their City wanted Walls? who answered, Con- cord was their Walls. Your Majesty, under God, is a sole and an entire Monarch, whose Walls are the Ocean without, and fortified within with a Wall of Brass, the Bond of Unity and Religion: And happy is that place, of which it may be said, as of Jerusalem, It is a Ci- ty at Unity within it self. Neither is your Government, confined within the Limits of this Kingdom, but extends it self to Ireland, where your Majesties care and pains in our late Employment, gave divers provident Directions for the setting forth of Religion, the reforming of Courts of Justice, and the inflicting punishment on the Disturbers of the publick Peace: And I was Ocularis Testis, that you have made these ample Endowments of Churches out of your own Escheated Revenue, as will be to your honour in all posterity. But my desire is, as well in the beginning, as in all other our proceedings, our words may be vera, paucā, & ponderosa.

Therefore with your gracious favour, according to ancient Presidents, we are humble Suitors, that you would be pleased to allow our ancient privileges. And that for our better attendance, our Persons, Goods, and necessary Attendants may be free from Arrests; and that we may have liberty of free Speech, not doubting but we shall confine our selves within the Limits of Duty. And because this great business may give us occasion often to resort to your Majesty, that upon our publick Suit, you will be pleased to give us your own fit time of access; and that all our actions may have a benign interpretation, and a good acceptance and opinion.

Lastly, That I may not only be a Speaker, but an humble Suitor, protesting by the great God, by whom Kings do reign, that whatsoever I have said, hath proceeded from a Loyal heart; I therefore desire that may be covered with the Vail of your Gracious Construction, or acquitted by Gracious Pardon.

And the whole Match being put by the King into the Parliaments Hand, the Duke of Buckingham did by the Narrative following, which the Prince likewise attested, acquaint the Houses
 as followeth:

In this Narration it self, his Grace observed six distinct and several Parts. The first was,

The Motives of the Prince's Journey to Spain.
 The second, The Treaty of the Marriage set Feb. 21.
 on foot in Spain, severally and by it self.
 The third, The Treaty of the Marriage and Restitution, united together by a reciprocal Subordination. The fourth, The Prince his Highness Return from Spain. The fifth,
 His Majesties subsequent Proceedings in both Treaties since the Return. The last was, The stating of the Question, super totam materi- am, wherein both the Houses were to offer unto his Majesty their humble Advice and Counsel. Of these Parts his Grace spake very distinctly and orderly.

I. The Motives of the Prin- ces Journey to Spain.

THE Negotiation of Master Chancellor of the Exchequer with the Arch-Dutcheſs, ministred unto his Majesty the first occasion of Jealousie, and made a kind of discovery of the Spaniards indirect dealing with this State:
 Then was read the aforementioned Letter of the Third of October, 1622. from the King to the Earl of Bristol, wherein Bristol was required to let the King of Spain know, how sensible King James was of the Emperor's proceedings towards him; and that he should demand of the King of Spain a Promise under Hand and Seal, that Heidelberg should be delivered within seventy dayes after Audience, and the like for Manheim and Frankendale, if they be taken; and if this be denied, to press to have leave to march through the King of Spain's Territories with an Army, for the recovering of his Childrens Patrimony; and that the King of Spain should assist us with his Forces.

The Duke desired the Houses to take for truth whatever he should say, granted and attested by the Princes presence; and declared, That this Letter was not put home to the uttermost of Bristol. Hereupon a Dispatch was sent away to my Lord of Bristol, expressly commanding him to press his Directions more home than yet he had done, and in case he should be denied or delayed by the King of Spain, then to take his leave, and come away: This was not so fully exacted by my Lord of Bristol.

Porter, that carried these Letters, was commanded not to stay above Ten days; who, after he had been there some four or five days, and saw nothing towards a Dispatch, went himself to the Conde Olivares (having been his Creature) and desired him he would speed his Dispatch. Olivares asked him what he would have?
 Who replied, No more than what had been formerly promised, that in case the Emperor should deny the Restitution of the Palatinare, the King of Spain should assist our King by Arms to recover it, or else give way to our Forces to march thither through his Countrey. Olivares replied, That this was a preposterous Demand;
 What, to assist with Arms against the Kings Uncle, and the Catholick League! Porter speaking to him of the Marriage of our Prince with the Infanta of Spain, he told him, That he understood not a word of it.

Porter acquainted Bristol herewith; he said, He would call Olivares to an account, if he held his Language with him, and would make him understand, That an Earl of England was as good a man as a Conde of Spain. But sending for Porter the next day, he changed his Resolution, and concluded to carry the Business more calmly; and said, the Conde was so reserved, because he was shy and dainty to report those Mysteries with that freedom to him, who was not qualified as a publick Minister. The Conde was angry with Porter, for communicating what he said to Bristol. Mr. Porter returned with a Dispatch fraught with Generalities, without any one Particular or Certainty at all made in relation to the Princes Highness; who thereupon took his resolution to go in person to Spain, and gave himself these Reasons for the Enterprize.

He saw his Father's Negotiation plainly deluded, Matters of Religion gained upon, and extorted; his Sisters Cause more and more desperate; and that this was the way to put things off or on; and that in this Particular, Delay was worse than a Denial; and that according to the usual Proverb, A desperate Disease must have a desperate Remedy.

Hereupon the King commanded the Duke to accompany his Highness in his Journey.

II. The Treaty of the Marriage severed, and by it self.

When the Prince had arrived at Madrid, the Conde gave him a Visit, magnified exceedingly the Princes Journey, amplified the Obligations his Highness had put upon that King; and said, That now without all peradventure, it must be a Match, and we must part and divide the whole World between us.

The next day the Conde taking the Duke into his Coach, and Mr. Porter for his Interpreter, falling into Discourse of the Match, he said unto the Duke, Let us dispatch this Match out of hand, and strike it up without the Pope:

The Duke answered, He liked the manner very well, but desired to understand the Means. The Means, quoth the Conde, is very easie; it is but the Conversion of the Prince; which we cannot conceive but his Highness intended upon his Resolution for this Journey.

The Duke answered forthwith, That with freedom they came thither, and with freedom they would return again; they were no Juglers, neither came they to Spain to make new Bargains; that the Prince was settled in his Religion; his Conscience was troubled with no Scruples in that kind; if they struck any more upon that string, they would mar all the Harmony. Then said the Conde, There is no way but to send to Rome to hasten the Dispensation: To which the Duke assented. Hereupon the Conde wrote his Letter to the Cardinal Lodovisia, the Popes Nephew; which being shewed to the Duke, seemed to him to be very heavy; the Duke therefore desired to quicken it with this Post-script; That now the Prince being arrived, must not be sent back without a Wife; That delay to a Suitor is a kind of Refusal; That clogging Instructions would amount to a Denial, and new Conditions, to an absolute Breach. The Conde fell into Choler, said directly it could not be done. This the Prince affirmed to be acted in his presence; but the Earl of Bristol made a more benign Construction thereof, the Duke a downright Conclusion, That this People never intended either Match or Restitution; and so wished his Highness fairly at home again: However the Messenger was dispatched to Rome.

Four or five days after his Highness was placed to see his Mistress in her passage through the Streets, as she made her Visits from Church to Church; but pressing for Access, he was delayed; but at last obtained a Visit; but a very strange one: He was not suffered to speak unto her, but as they had set it down in Words and Syllables in writing; saying, They were no Astrologers, and could not foresee the Event of this Marriage: and therefore they resolved to admit him as a Prince only, and not as a Suitor. But the Conde salved this up with a Complement, That if the Dispensation were once returned, he should lie with her even that very night; nay, have her he should upon any Terms. If he could not be qualified to enjoy her as a Wife, he should have her as a Mistress.

Soon after, riding in a Coach, it was urged by the Conde, That the Infanta was of a tender Conscience, and if she should come into England, and find the Prince an Enemy to her Religion, it would quite dishearten her. His Highness consented to hear her upon this Subject; because he was as like to convert her, as she was to pervert him. A Conference with Divines was pressed upon his Highness, which he refused; and said, If after Disputation with them, they should not prevail against a young man, they would remain much disgusted, and ill-affected to the whole Negotiation. This kind of importunity was still used toward the Prince, till the return of the Dispensation.

Six weeks after the Princes Arrival, came the Dispensation; but his Highness understood from Rome by Mr. Gage, that the Dispensation was returned much clogged in Matter and Manner, especially with the annexed new Condition. The King of Spain before the receiving of the Dispensation, was to take an Oath to see all the Articles performed; whereupon Faculty was issued, really performed, or else to make War in case of any failure, upon the King of England.

His Highness signified his Resolution unto them, that he neither could nor would add or alter any thing of the first Articles sent to England.

A Junta of Divines are appointed to meet, and consider, whether the King might safely take the Oath. By this time the Prince had gone through all the Articles, sitting in person with the Committee; only leaving three undiscussed; That of the Church, that of the Nurse, and that of the Education of the Children; which his Highness reserved till he should speak with the King. Then said the Conde, now the Business is in a better way than ever it was; a Match, and without more ado she was his Wife.

But the next day came Gondomar, and spake unto the Prince of the same Matter as of a new thing; and told him plainly, that unless his Highness came to all the Conditions of the Dispensation, as they were sent from Rome, clearly and entirely, nothing would be done; for they had no power to remove or alter a word of false Latin. Whereupon his Highness was justly distasted, Anno 1623. distasted, and offered to break. Then they presented the Prince, that he would be pleased to stay twenty days, until the King of Spain might receive an Answer from England. The Prince resolved to stay upon condition that Sir Francis Cottington might be dispatched away within two dayes, and some Messenger that might overtake him with the Articles that should be sent after, as soon as ever they could be made ready; but the two dayes of their hammering spun out to twenty; at the end thereof they brought them with new Additions.

The Articles being at last sent to England, the Juncto of Divines delivered their Opinions, that the Infanta could not be sent over before the Spring; at which his Highness was offended; but the Conde prevailed with him to stay until their Ambassador should certify out of England, that the Articles were assented unto by King James, and put in execution, and then the Lady should go with the Prince.

The Bishop of Segovia was pleased to say to the Duke, That he had heard something of the Estate of our Kingdom, and had received it from good hands; That our King could not make a Toleration without a Rebellion, and easily believed it; because the King of Spain is not able in his Dominions to effect the least Enterprize, without incurring the like danger; therefore he concluded, it was unsafe to send the Lady thither at this time; because we having granted as much in effect as a Toleration, it was very probable she should be welcomed with a Rising and Rebellion. To which the Duke replied, That if the Favours which the King his Master had exhibited to his Catholicks at the Mediation of that King, and the Advice of that very Committee of which that Bishop was one, be of so dangerous a consequence; it seems their Lordships who gave the Advice for that Article, though they pretended Religion, intended plain and open Rebellion. But you must know, quoth the Duke, if his Highness had been of my Lord Bishop's opinion, That these Conferences had amounted to a Toleration, he had never accepted of these Articles to have gained any allowance: For what was agreed unto, was but a Temporary Suspension of Penal Laws, but no Toleration; for that could not be done, but by consent of Parliament. Then Gondomar hereupon said, that for his part, he did not hold it fit to send the Infanta thither, before the Articles be perfectly put in execution. And Gondomar privately infused to the Prince his Highness, being incensed against the Duke, That the Duke was in heart (as he said all his Kindred were) a Roman Catholick; and he said to a Jesuit of great account and zeal in those parts, that the Duke was a most obstinate, perverse and refractory Puritan.

About this time it was reported, that the Prince intended to steal away; whereupon they laid in wait to intercept him: Hereupon the Duke was sent to tell them, That although they had stolen thither out of love, they would never steal thence out of fear.

About this time, the Prince sent a Message to his Father, That if he should receive any Advertisement, that he was detained by that State as a Prisoner, he would be pleased for his sake, never to think upon him any longer as a Son, but reflect upon the Good of his Sister, and the Safety of his own Kingdoms. Fac. 21.

III. The Treaty of the Match and Restitution reciprocally subordinated.

IT is fit to observe this Passage, which is the thing whereupon all his Highness subsequent Actions are turned and moved. He had never staid a seven-night longer in Spain; he had never left any Proxy with Bristol; he had never taken any Oath at the Escorial; or ever so much as written a Letter of Complement to the Lady; but that he had still before his eyes; as his Cynosure, the Promise made by the Conde, for the Restitution of the Palatinate.

To hasten the Delivery of the Lady, the Duke presented unto the Conde, how his Master was now in years, the Prince his only Son; and he would suffer in Honour and Reputation, to return home without his Wife. The Conde consented hereunto, and desired the Prince would name a day for his Departure.

This News came to the Infanta, who seemed to be apprehensive of the Princes going away, and prevailed with his Highness to return this Complement unto her, That rather than he would give her Alteza any disgust, he would stay for seven years.

By this time Sir Francis Cottington is arrived with all things perfected by the King, and Letters from the Ambassadors of full satisfaction, and a Command from the King to his Highness, to make his Return within one Month.

Now began the Conde to enter into a Treaty for the Restitution of the Palatinate; saying, The Lady should by no means go to England, before that Business was accommodated. And it was projected, That there should be a Restitution of the Land to the Prince Palatine, upon a Condition of Marriage with the Emperors Daughter, and that he should be bred in the Emperors Court. The Prince demanding of the Conde, whether in case the Emperor proved refractory, the King his Master would assist him with Arms, to reduce him to reasonable Terms? The Conde answered negatively; because they had a Maxim of State, That the King of Spain must never fight against the Emperor; for they would not employ their Forces against the House of Austria.

Hereupon his Highness made his Protestation to the Conde; Look to it Sir, for if you hold your self to that, there is an end of all; for without this, you may not rely upon either Marriage or Friendship.

By this time the Prince is grown cheap and vulgar in the Court of Spain, so that they will scarce bestow a visit upon him; and the Conde came very seldom to him: and two Letters came to the Dukes hands, which shewed, that all that the Conde did, was nothing but Flashes and Lightning; notwithstanding he seemed at this time

1623. to be in a good humour, and told the Duke, that now certainly it must be a Match, and the Devil could not break it: The Duke replied, He thought so: and the Match had need be very firm and strong, it had been seven years in soldering. The Conde denied, and said plainly, it had not been really intended seven Months; and said, I will fetch that out of my Desk that shall assure you thereof; and so produced two Letters; the first was written with the King of Spain's own Hand, Dated the Fifth of November 1622. And the other from the Conde Olivares, of the Eighth of November, 1622. Both which Letters are mentioned before.

IV. The Princes Return from Spain.

And now the Prince returning for England, being engaged to leave his Proxy, did deposite the same in the hands of the Earl of Bristol, who was to keep it, and use it as his Procurator; that is, as he should receive his Highness his Direction from time to time: His words for the present were (said the Duke) That if the Confirmation came from Rome, clear and entire, (which it did not) then within so many days he should deliver it to the King of Spain.

The second Direction sent to him, was by a Letter which his Highness sent him between his Departure from the Escorial, and coming to the Sea-side, to this effect; That for fear a Monastery should rob him of his Wife, he should stay the Delivery of the Powers until the Doubts were cleared; and that his Highness would send him in the Premises some further Directions: Here, because my Lord of Bristol in his Letter of the First of November, 1623. doth press so vehemently the Prince his Highness concerning this Proxy, and the Prince vowed openly before both Houses, that he had never by Oath or Honour engaged himself not to revoke the Powers more than by the Clause De non revocando Procuratore, inserted in the Instrument it self, and that he conceived the Clause to be matter of Form; and although Essentially of no binding Power; yet usually thrust into every such Instrument; and that the Civilians do hold; That it is lawful by the Civil and Canon Law, for any man to revoke his Proxy of Marriage, notwithstanding it hath the Clause, De non revocando Procuratore, inserted in it. Therefore, as to this Point, the Duke concluded, That the Earl of Bristol in charging this Matter so highly on the Prince, had much forgot himself.

V. The subsequent Proceedings of His Majesty in both the Treaties, since the Return of his Highness.

The Prince by the Mercy of God came to Royston, and made his Relation to the King of all that had passed. His Majesty was glad, and told him, That he had acted well the part of a Son; and now the part of a Father must come upon the Stage, which was to provide with all circumspection, That his only Son should not be Married with a Portion of Tears to his only Daughter. And therefore his Majesty commanded by an express Dispatch, the stay of the Proxy in the Earl of Bristol's hands, until he had some better assurance of the Restitution of the Palatinate.

Then was read his Majesties Letter to the Earl of Bristol, Dated the Eighth of October, 1623. wherein the Earl of Bristol was positively required by the King, That before he deliver the Powers, he move to the Contract, to procure from the King of Spain a direct Restitution of the Palatinate, and the Electoral Dignity, or to assist with Arms within a time limited.

You would perceive that by this Dispatch, Bristol would lay hold on all Hints and emergent occasions to put off the Desponsarios without this required Assurance by Arms first obtained; but the truth is he did not so.

For first, The Confirmation came from Rome, clogg'd and mangled; and instead of challenging thereupon, he labours with no small strength of wit to hide and palliate the same.

Secondly, In the Temporal Articles, the Portion was altered, six hundred thousand pounds in ready Cash, to Eighty thousand pounds in Money, and a few Jewels, and a Pension of two thousand pounds per annum. Instead of quarrelling with this main Alteration, he seems to approve and applaud the payment.

Thirdly, For the assurance of Restitution of the Palatinate, the main Foundation both of Match and Friendship, he is so far from providing for it before (which was the Method prescribed him by the King) that he leaves it to be Mediated by the Infanta after the Marriage.

Lastly, Instead of putting off the Contract, as any man in the world (upon the Dispatch from Royston) would have done, he comes to prefix a precise day for the Desponsarios.

Now from this rash fixing of the Day for the Desponsarios in Spain, which was controlled again by an Express, from hence issued an unnecessary Discourtesie put upon the King, and in a manner upon the Infanta, by the Earl of Bristol: From that proceeded a greater Affront put upon the Prince; the taking away the Title La Princesa from the Infanta, and the debarring of our Ambassadors from any further Access to her person.

Then was produced an Answer of the King of Spain to the Memorial of the Ambassador, implying a Refusal to assist by Arms for the Recovery of the Palatinate, in case the Emperor consent not to a Restitution; which we have inserted in Series of Time.

VI. The

Anno 1623.VI. The stating of the Question super totam Materiam.

THIS Question the Duke stated on this manner, Whether this being the full effect and product of all the Negotiation, which I have opened unto you, be sufficient Super totam Materiam, for his Majesty to rely upon with any safety; as well for the Marriage of his only Son, as for the relief of his only Daughter: Or, that these Treaties set aside, his Majesty were best to trust in his own strength, and to stand upon his own feet? So the Duke ended with this conclusion, That if the bringing us from darkness to light, did deserve any thanks, we owe it, and must wholly ascribe it to the Prince his Highness.

The Spanish Ambassador here takes great exception at the Duke's Narrative, but it being attested in every particular by the Prince, the Houses of Parliament acquit the Duke in every point in the Narrative following.

YOur Majesties most Loyal Subjects, the Lords, Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, Assembled at this time in both Houses of Parliament, being informed of a Complaint made unto your most Excellent Majesty against the Duke of Buckingham, That in the Narrative, which by your Majesties command, he made unto both Houses the four and twentieth of February last, he should let fall some passages, grievous to the Honour of the King of Spain, and inferred to be of so high a nature, as if the same had been delivered by any Subject of that King against your Majesty, it could not otherwise have been expiated than with the loss of his Head that spoke it: Taking this into their mature deliberation, and conceiving that this Accusation doth in an oblique manner fasten an Aspersions upon themselves also; do in all submission and humility make unto your Majesty a Threefold Representation: First, Concerning that great King; Secondly, Concerning that eminent Lord; Thirdly, Concerning themselves.

First, Concerning that King, they do with unanimous Vote of both Houses, absolutely acquit, and clear the Lord Duke from letting fall any words at all derogatory to the Honour of that King.

For the second, That concerns my Lord, they do in the like humility attest unto your most Sacred Majesty, That if my Lord the Duke had omitted any matter represented unto them that day, he had for so much failed in the performance of that duty and fidelity which he oweth unto your Majesty, and to the business, and unto both Houses.

For the last, Which concerneth themselves, they make bold in like humility to represent unto your Majesty, That they do much honour my Lord the Duke for that Narration, and do render unto him all possible thanks, for that fidelity and industry expressed therein; and so without your further trouble, Do humbly beseech your most Excellent Majesty, to interpret fair of this their Representation, which they held themselves bound to offer unto your Majefty, for the clearing of so eminent a person, who, as they verily believe, hath in his Negotiation, well deserved of your Majesty and the Commonwealth: So they heartily pray unto God to preserve your most Excellent Majesty.

To which Representation his Majesty returned this Answer.

MY Lords and Gentlemen all, I might have reason to speak nothing in regard of the person whereof you speak; but in regard of your Motion, it were not Civil: For if I be silent, I shall wrong neither my self, nor that Nobleman, which you now speak of, because he is well known to be such an one, as stands in no need of a Prolocutor, or Fidejussor, to undertake for his fidelity, or well carrying of the business: and indeed to send a man upon so great an Errand, whom I was not resolved to trust for the carriage thereof, were a fault in my discretion scarce compatible to the love and trust I bear him. It is an old and true saying, That he is a happy Man that serves a good Master; and it is no less truth, That he is a happy Master that enjoys a faithful Servant.

The greatest fault (if it be a fault) or at leastwise the greatest error. I hope he shall ever commit against me, was his desiring this Justification from you; as if he should have need of any Justification from others towards me, and that for these Reasons.

First, Because he being my Disciple and Scholar, he may be assured I will trust his own Relation.

Secondly, Because he made the same Relation unto me, which he did afterwards unto both Houses; so as I was formerly acquainted both with the matter and manner thereof: And if I should not trust him in the carriage, I was altogether unworthy of such a Servant. He hath no Interest of his own in the business; he had ill thoughts at home for his going thither with my Son, although it was my command, as I told you before. And now he hath as little thanks for his Relation on the other part; yet he that serveth God and a good Master, cannot miscarry for all this.

I have noted in his Negotiation these three markable things, Faith, Diligence, and Discretion, whereof my Son hath born record unto me; yet I cannot deny, but as he thought to do good service to his Master, he hath given ill example to Ambassadors in time to come, because he went this long journey upon his own charges. This would prove an ill example, if many of my Ambassadors should take it for a President. He ran his Head into the yoke with the People here, for undertaking the journey; and when he there spent above Forty or fifty thousand pounds, never offered his accompt, nor made any demand for the same, or ever will. I hope other Ambassadors will do so no more. I am a good Master, that never doubted of him; for I know him to be so good a Scholar of mine, that I say without vanity, he will not exceed his Masters Dictates; and I trust the report not the worse he made, because it is approved by you all; yet I believe an honest man, as much as all the World, and the rather, because he was a Disciple of mine. And I am glad he hath so well satisfied you, and thank you heartily for taking it in so good part, as I find you have done.

And

And now both the Houses concur in one Vote, Anno That the King cannot honourably go on in the 1623. Treaty with Spain for the restitution of the Palatinate, which they fortifie with the subsequent Reasons and Addresses following.

May it please your Most Excellent Majesty,

WE are come unto you, imployed from your most faithful Subjects, and Servants, the Lords and Commons assembled in this present Parliament.

And First, They and we do give most humble and hearty thanks unto Almighty God, that out of his Gracious goodness he hath been pleased now at last to dispel the Clouds and Mists which for so many years have dimmed the eyes of a great part of Christendom, in the business whereof we do now consult.

And secondly, We acknowledge our selves most bound unto your Majesty, that you have been pleased to require the humble Advice of us your obedient Subjects in a Case so important as this is, which hitherto dependeth between your Majesty and the King of Spain, Which we joyntly offer from both Houses, no one person there dissenting or disagreeing from the rest. And it is upon mature consideration, and weighing many particulars of sundry natures, that finding so much want of sincerity in all their proceedings We, super totam Materiam, present this our Address unto your Majesty; That the Treaties both for the Marriage and the Palatinate may not any longer be continued with the honour of your Majesty, the safety of your People, the welfare of your Children and Posterity, as also the assurance of your antient Allies and Confederates.

Reasons were also presented, to fortifie this Vote.

Whereas the Propositions of the Match were at the first no more than Liberty of Conscience to the Infanta and her Family, which the King might in honour grant; the Spaniards taking advantage of the Prince's being in Spain, importuned a General Connivance of Religion, to the diminution of the King's Sovereignty and against the usage of other Catholick Princes in the like Treaties, and to the discouragement of all his well-affected Subjects. And this they have laboured with the Pope, being of mischievous consequence. During this Treaty, the Popish Faction hath mightily increased: and whereas heretofore they were wont to be divided, some taking part with the Secular Priests, and some with the Jesuites, they are united; which is a matter of great consequence, considering they do as well depend on Spain for Temporal matters, as on Rome for Spiritual: And they cannot be suppressed, as long as the Treaty holds.

They have by this Treaty devoured our Allies, and the Protestant Party in Germany and elsewhere, to the decay of true Religion, and to the jealousy of our Friends beyond the Seas. During this Treaty of Love, they have spoiled his Majesties Son-in-law of his Lands and Honours; and notwithstanding promises of Restitution, still invaded his Rights and at length turned pretended Difficulties into apparent Impossibilities. They have deluded our King, and offered indignity to our Prince, by im-tuning him again and again to a Conversion, contrary to the Law of Hospitality, and the Priviledge of Princes.

The insincerity of their Proceedings is to be seen by that former Overture of Marriage for the late Prince Henry, which after many specious Motions, was followed with a disavowing of their own Ambassador, and a scornful Proposition made to the King, of the Prince's altering his Religion. As also by the Treaty of Bruxels, where the Lord Weston found nothing but delays and deceit; and after divers peremptory Commands from Spain for his Majesty's satisfaction, it wrought no other effect than the besieging and taking of Heidelberg; insomuch that the Ambassador was forced to Protest, and return.

To these things were added, the Translation of the Electorate to the Duke of Bavaria, and the Letter of the King of Spain to Conde Olivares, with the Conde's answer, which imported, that the Match was never intended. And also, after the Prince had taken a hazardous Journey, they devised a shift, by a Juncto of Divines, to let him come home without the Lady.

Upon these Reasons the King comes to Parliament, and adviseth with the Houses about the means and manner to carry on the intended War. His Speech followeth,

My Lords and Gentlemen all,

I Have cause first to thank God with all my Heart, and all the faculties of my Mind, that my Speech which I delivered in Parliament hath taken so good effect amongst you, as that with an unanimous consent you have freely and speedily given me your advice in this great Business, for which I also thank you all as heartily as I can.

I also give my particular thanks to the Gentlemen of the Lower House, for that I heard, when some would have cast jealousies and doubts between me and my People, they presently quelled those motions, which otherwise might indeed have hindred the happy Agreement I hope to find in this Parliament. You give me your advice to break off both the Treaties, as well concerning the Match as the Palatinate: And now give me leave, as an old King, to propound my Doubts, and hereafter to give you my Answer.

First, It is true, that I, who have been all the days of my life a peaceable King, and have had the honour in my Titles and Impresses to be stiled Rex Pacificus, should be loth, without necessity, to embroil my self with War, far from my Nature, and from my Honour, which I have had at home and abroad, in endeavouring to avoid the effusion of Christian Blood, of which, too much hath been shed, and so much against my heart; I say, that unless it be upon such a necessity, that I may call it, as some say merrily of Women, Malum necessarium, I should be loth to enter into it. And I must likewise acquaint you, that I have had no small hope given me of obtaining better Conditions for the Restitution of the Palatinate; and that even since the sitting down of the Parliament; But be not jealous, nor think me such a King, that would, under pretence of asking your advice, put a scorn upon you, by disdain and rejecting it: for you remember, that in my first Speech unto you, for proof of my love to my People, I craved your advice in this great and weighty affair; but in a matter of this weight, I must first consider how this course may agree with my Conscience and Honour; and next, according to the Parable uttered by our Saviour, after I have resolved of the necessity and justness of the Cause, to consider how I shall be enabled to raise Forces for this purpose.

As concerning the Cause of my Children, I am now old; and as Moses saw the Land of Promise from an high Mountain, though he had not leave to set his foot on it, so it would be a great comfort to me, that God would but so long prolong my days, as if I might not see the Restitution, yet at least I might be assured that it would be; that then I might, with old Simon, say, Nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine, &c. Otherwise it would be a great grief unto me, and I should die with a heavy and discomforted heart. I have often said, and particularly in the last Parliament, and I shall ever be of that mind, That as I am not ambitious of any other mens Goods or Lands, so I desire not to enjoy a Furrow of Land in England, Scotland, or Ireland, without restitution of the Palatinate: And in this mind I will live and die.

But let me acquaint you a little with the Difficulties of this Cause. He is an unhappy man, that shall advise a King to War; and it is an unhappy thing to seek that by Blood, which may be had by Peace. Besides, I think your intentions are not to engage me in War, but withal you will consider, how many things are requisite thereunto.

I omit to speak of my own necessities (they are too well known:) Sure I am, I have had the least help in Parliament of any King that ever Reigned over you this many years. I must let you know, that my Disabilities are increased by the Charge of my Son's Journey into Spain; which I was at for his Honour, and the honour of this Nation: By sending of Ambassadors, by maintaining of my Children, and by assisting of the Palatinate, I have incurred a great Debt to the King of Denmark, which I am not able yet to pay.

The Low Countries, who, in regard of their nearness, are fittest to help for the Recovery of the Palatinate, are at so low an ebb, that if I assist them not, they are scarce able to subsist. The Princes of Germany, that should do me any good, are all poor, weak, and disheartned, and do expect Assistance from hence. For Ireland, I leave it to you, whether that be not a Back-door to be secured. For the Navy, I thank God, it is in a better case than ever it was, yet more must be done; and before it can be prepared as it ought to be, it will require a new Charge, as well for its own strength, as for the securing of the Coasts.

My Children, I vow to God, eat no Bread but by my means; I must maintain them, and not see them want. In the mean time, my Customs are the best part of my Revenues; and in effect, the substance of all I have to live on; all which are farmed out upon that condition, That if there be War, those Bargains are to be dissolved, which enforce a great defalcation.

Subsidies ask a great time to bring them in: Now, if you assist me that way, I must take them up before-hand upon Credit, which will eat up a great part of them. This being my Case, to enter into War, without sufficient means to support it, were to shew my Teeth, and do no more. In the mean time, I heartily thank you for your Advice, and will seriously think upon it; as I pray you to consider of those other parts.

My Treasurer, to whose Office it appertains, shall more at large inform you of those things that concern my Estate. Thus freely do I open my heart unto you; and having your Hearts, I cannot want your Helps; for it is the Heart that openeth the Purse, not the Purse the Heart. I will deal frankly with you: shew me the Means how I may do what you would have me, and if I take resolution by your Advice to enter into a War, then your selves, by your own Deputies, shall have the disposing of the Money; I will not meddle with it; but you shall appoint your own Treasurers; I say not this with a purpose to invite you to open your Purse, and then to slight you so much as not to follow your Counsel, nor engage you before I be engaged myself. Give me what you will for my own Means, but I protest, none of the Monies which you shall give for those uses, shall be issued but for those ends, and by men elected by your selves. If, upon your offer, I shall find the Means to make the War honourable and safe, and that I resolve to embrace your Advice, then I promise you, in the word of a King, that although War and Peace be the peculiar Prerogatives of Kings, yet, as I have advised with you, in the Treaties on which War may ensue, so I will not treat nor accept of a Peace, without first acquainting you with it, and hearing your Advice; and therein go the proper way of Parliament, in conferring and consulting with you: and, happily, the Conditions of Peace will be the better, when we be prepared for War; according to the old Proverb, that Weapons bode Peace.

Your kind Carriage gives me much Content; and that comforts me, which my Lord of Canterbury said, That there was not a contrary voice amongst you all; like the Seventy Interpreters, who were led by the Breath of God. I am so desirous to forget all Rents in former Parliaments, that it shall not be in my default, if I am not in love with Parliaments, and call them often, and desire to end my life in that Inter-course between me and my People, for the making of good Laws, reforming of such Abuses as I cannot be well informed of but in Parliament, and maintaining the good Government of the Common-wealth. Therefore go on cheerfully, and advise of these Points, and my Resolution shall then be declared.

The Matter of the Supply is readily entered upon by the Commons, and Sir Edward Sackville, Lord of Dorset, spake thus in the House of Commons concerning it.

Since Supply unto his Majesty is now in question, of which, I hope, there will be no question, I humbly ask leave of this Honourable Assembly to speak my Opinion; assuring you, that when a Treaty of Grievances shall be on foot, it shall appear I will not sit silent, if I find myself able to say any thing that may lead a hand to unload my Country of that heavy burden it now groans under, by reason of the innumerable number of Monopolies, which like so many Incubusses and Succubusses, exhaust the Vital Spirits, and so press down those parts, which which ought to enjoy free respiration, as without some speedy remedy, is like to run to extream hazard. But this I refer to its proper time, and reserve my self for it; and now proceed to the matter in hand.

'Sure I do think, there are very few that serve in this House (if there be any) who do not confidently believe, that the chief Motive which induced his Majesty at this time to Assemble this Parliament, was a meer necessity to be by us enabled for the Recovery of the Patrimony belonging to the King of Bohemia, now almost traversed from him, and in the possession of a powerful Enemy. If there be any who doubt of this truth, I hope he may easily rest satisfied, when I shall assure him (out of my own knowledge) that many dayes before this Session, his Majesty commanded a select number of Noblemen and Gentlemen, the most part whereof have been Commanders in the Wars, and some yet are, to consult together of what number of Men an Army ought to be composed, which might be able to recover the Palatinate, and protect it from a second Invasion. These, according to his Majesties good pleasure, divers days met together at one appointed place, and there contributed their best Endeavours: At least they have finished their task, advised the King of the Number of Souldiers; they have estimated the present Charges his Majesty must be at for the Relieving, Arming, Cloathing, Munition and Habiliments of War; these have likewise calculated the annual Expence for the maintenance of them.

'The first I will now inform you; and for the last point, because of a greater Charge and Consequence, I will allow more time of consideration. Twenty five thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse is the portion they all agree on; and lest they could not consider to be sent, considering they were to combat with an Enemy so far from hence, already in possession of a great part of the Countrey, well fortified in many places, Master of an Army, composed with twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, most Veterane Souldiers, commanded by the best Captains now known in the Christian world, except the Prince of Orange; after whom, to be esteemed second, is the highest praise: I say, all these respects duly weighed, there could not in their Judgments be abated of this proportion: And this Army was framed on that Mould, which the Secretaries of State gave them of the Enemies strength.

'The Issue of Battels is in the hand of God: The eyes of humane Providence cannot see beyond its Horizon; it cannot ascertain future Contingents, it can only judge of what seems fit to be done, guided by the Rules of Probability and Reason. Events happen often contrary, and never more contrary than in Matters of Warfare: yet, admit a sinister success to happen, a Counsel wisely taken ought not therefore to lose the due Commendations.

'Sirs, I have told you the Number; you now expect to know the present Charge, in which I shall deal most truly with you. Believe me, His Majesty must disburse Thirty thousand pounds for provision of Necessities to furnish such an Army to be sent; the most part of the Provisions must be made beyond the Seas; for there, Arms are best, and best cheap. This Army must (if such an Army) go by the end of April.

'It was God that said, Let there be Light, and it was so: Kings (though they be stiled Gods) fac. 21. enjoy no such power, incommunicable to any Kings. Whatever their Ends or Desires are, they must allow time to the consummation of them: They be Sovereigns over us, but subject unto Time. But what need I add Spurs to a forward Horse? In my Conscience, there are few Members in this House, that to that Holy War (as I may justly stile it) would not as willingly and as heartily contribute the Service of their Persons, as the Assistance of their Purfes. I know I speak the Language of all your hearts; let us shew our Faith by our Works: Time was, to have done much better than now we can; Time is, that we may do well; but if we attend somewhat longer, time will be past, so as all we do then, will be so out of season, as it can produce neither any great, nor any good effect. But stay, methinks I hear some say, Why, his Majesty told us, that by way of Treaty he hoped to prevail, as the Palatinate should be restored. I confess I heard so too; and Heaven be pleased to Crown his Actions with success, as the Piousness of his Intentions deserves. But I must be excused, if I doubt it, if I fear it, if I despair of it: For, it is no Article of my Faith to believe in Miracles. But suppose this might be brought to pass; what then? Shall this Gift of ours be lost, or cast away? No sure, it will be well bestowed, if as a Sacrifice of our thankfulness, we offer it unto his Majesty, by whose wisdom that is regained; which certainly by any other course must needs have exposed our Persons to great danger, and our Purfes to much more expence. And in this we shall do, as he that receiveth a rich Present, and returns a small Reward. Perhaps this way may not quadrate with every man's Conceit; if not, then let this which his Majesty demands, to make provision for a Foreign Army, be employed in rearing a Magazine here at home, since so great is the want of Munition, as I wonder we all cry out for want of Money, and never think how to be stored of that, which, of the two, is more necessary; seeing by the one, we are only enabled to live more plentifully and sumptuously; and by the other, our Lives are preserved free from Misery and Slavery. In matters of Moment, I know it is as laudable to use Deliberation before a Resolution, as after that once taken, Celerity in Execution. Counsel is the Compass by which all great Actions ought to be guided; it is the Steer by which wise men do shape their courses. I allow it, I commend it, I advise it; yet to be so slow, so discursive, so long in resolving; all we then can do, will be no more worth; than a Physician after death. Sure such a dulness must needs accuse us of much weakness, if it admit of no worse construction (Bis dat, qui cito dat) freeness in giving, graceth the Gift: Dimidium facti qui bene cepit habet. We have a long journey to go, and to set forward is half the way. How pressing the occasion is, my Tongue faints to tell; (Vox faucibus hæret) The Foxes have Holes, and the Birds of the Air have Nests; but the Daughter of our King and Kingdom scarce knows where to lay her Head; or if she do, not where in safety.

'Lastly, When we had no other Object in our Contemplations, but the memory of her Virtue (which remaineth in durable Characters in the heart of every honest man) what a forwardness and ferventness did we express in these our voluntary

Anno 1625. voluntary contributions, notwithstanding that some base, fordid, and avaritious men, who adored their Mammon, deterred men from that noble and pious work. They were then but Panick terrors, clouds cast before the Sun, which now shines out so bright, as all those mists are vanished. His Majesty calls to us for aid, he invites us to it; and he that was born to Command, now vouchsafes to Entreat us: now if ever, now is the time to do our Countrey good. Do we desire to sweep all Grievances out of this Land? Do we desire to extinguish the core of them, that they may never more germinate in this Commonwealth? Do we desire to destroy those Spiders that spin this Net; Now if ever, now is the time to effect it. And to arrive at this blessing, methinks I discover a plain and easie way; let us please the King first, and I speak it with Faith, he will be graciously pleased to reward us: Prove rich Merchants, and make a brave Return. Great and generous Spirits are then most apt to make requests, when first they have obtained their own. In the Region of Kings, the way to Conquer, is to Submit; and nothing more obligeth an honest Heart to perform what is expected, than to believe and trust in him.

This is the way to make his Majesty not onely love, but fall in love with Parliaments: this is the way to recall them home from exile, and again render them frequent amongst us: This is the way to fix this, until we have purchased present ease, and future happiness to our Countrey. Let his Majesty have Hearts-ease among us, and we shall receive from his Royal hand that Dictandum, which must expel these Arrows that hang in the sides of the Commonwealth.

Thus have I delivered my opinion, which if it be not the same with every one here present, I shall beg that favourable censure which Charity commands me to afford to all. Let him believe I have spoken my Conscience, as I shall of him, though he happen to dissent from my opinion: For, from what Circumference soever the Lines be drawn, the Centre is the same, which is our Countrey's good; at which the desire of every man ought to aim, and the duty of every man ought to desire.

He that would take another course, and have Grievances first preferred; if he wished that out of a good to his Countrey, as unwilling to innovate antient Proceedings; of this man I will only say, Optime sentit Cato, sed nocet interdum Respublica: But if there be any other, who, out of a corrupt and imposthume heart, looking to false and foreign ends, would endeavour to put a Partition-wall between the King and his People, this man I dare pronounce neither good Subject, nor good Englishman, nor good Christian; but the Agent of base and beggerly Promoters, needy and greedy Projectors, and a friend to those Monsters which I hope have no generation; who not born to any Fortune, nor have Virtue nor Industry; by which they might hope to obtain any, yet, like Harpies, greedy to devour other mens Possessions, care not what way they take to become Masters of them, slighting the latter day of Judgment, so they may rest secured from yielding any Account in this World.

I have no more to say, but that God would be pleased to incline our hearts to do that, which may be most for his Glory; next, for the Kings Service; then, for the Countreys Happiness.

The Kings Doubts were answered by a Committee of both Houses, delivered by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Declaration following.

May it please your Sacred Majesty,

WE are come to you again, from your most faithful Subjects, and loyal Servants, the Lords and Commons assembled in this present Parliament.

The Parliaments Answer to the Kings Speech.

And first, We humbly let your Majesty know, how much we hold our selves bounden unto Almighty God, that he hath sent a King to rule and reign over us, who is pleased in the greatest and weightiest Causes to speak and to be spoken to in Parliament, by his good and loving People, which causeth the King to understand them over whom he beareth rule, and them again to understand him: And is a true Bond that tieth the heart of the Sovereign to the Subject, and of the Subject reciprocally to their Liege Lord and Sovereign. And next we rejoyce, that your Majesty hath shewed your self sensible of the Insincerity of the King of Spain, with whom, of late, you have had a double Treaty; and of the Indignities offered by them unto your blessed Son, the Prince, and to your Royal Daughter. And that your Kingly heart is filled with an earnest desire to make Reparation to her Noble Consort, and her self, of the Palatinate, their Patrimonial Possession, which is agreeable to Justice, and to all Laws of God and Man.

For the effecting whereof, to certifye with what Alacrity, with what Expedition and Uniformity of heart, both your Houses of Parliament, in the name of your whole Kingdom, have born themselves unto your Majesty, with offer to give their Loyal Assistance, we have digested it into writing; lest by the Verbal or Vocal Delivery of any Person, it may miscarry, or the expression of our Zeal be weakened or diminished. Which we humbly pray your Majesty to give leave to be read unto you.

Most Gracious Sovereign:

WE your Majesties most humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, do first render to your most Sacred Majesty our most dutiful thanks, for that, to our unspeakable comfort, you have vouchsafed to express your self so well satisfied with our late Declaration made unto your Majesty, of our general Resolution, in pursuit of our humble Advice, to assist your Majesty in a Parliamentary way with our Persons and Abilities.

The Parliament offer his Majesty Three Subsidies, and Three Fifteens if he break off both Treaties.

And whereas your Majesty, in your great Wisdom and Judgment, foreseeing that it will make a deeper impression, both in the Enemies of that Cause, and in your Friends and Allies, if they shall not only hear of the Chearful Offers; but also see the Real Performance of your Subjects to wards so great a Work. Your Majesty was pleased to descend to a particular Proposition, for the advancing of this great Business. We therefore, in all Humbleness, most ready and willing to give your Majesty, and the whole World, an Ample Testimony of our sincere and dutiful Intentions herein, upon mature Advice and Deliberation, as well of the Weight and Importance of this Great Affair, as of the present Estate of this your Kingdom (the Deal and Safety whereof is, in our Judgments, apparently threatened, if your Majesties Resolution, for the dissolving of the Treaties now in question, be longer deferred; and that Provision for defence of your Realm, and Aid of your Friends and Allies, be not seasonably made) have with a cheerful Consent of all the Commons (no one dissenting) and with a full and cheerful Consent of the Lords, resolved, That upon your Majesties publick Declaration, for the dissolution and utter discharge of both the said Treaties, of the Marriage and of the Palatinate, in pursuit of our Advice therein, and towards the support of that War which is likely to ensue, and more particularly for those four points proposed by your Majesty, namely, for the defence of this your Realm, the securing of Ireland; the assistance of your Neighbours, the States of the United Provinces, and other your Majesties Friends and Allies, and for the setting forth of your Royal Navy, we will grant for the present the Greatest Aid which ever was given in Parliament: that is to say, Three intire Subsidies, and Three Fifteens, to be all paid within the compass of one whole year, after your Majesty shall be pleased to make the said Declaration, the Money to be paid into the hands, and expended by the direction of such Committees or Commissioners as hereafter shall be agreed upon at this present Session of Parliament.

And we most humbly beseech your Majesty to accept of these First-Fruits of our hearty Oblation, dedicated to that Work which we infinitely desire may prosper and be advanced. And for the future, to rest confidently assured, That we your loyal and loving Subjects will never fail in a Parliamentary Way, to assist your Majesty in so Royal a Design, wherein your own honour, and the honour of your most Noble Son, the Prince, the antient Renown of this Nation, the welfare and very subsistence of your noble and onely Daughter, and her Consort, and their Posterity, the safety of your own Kingdom and People, and the Prosperity of your Neighbours and Allies, are so deeply engaged.

His Majesty's Reply.

My Lords and Gentlemen all,

His Majesty's Reply I Have nothing to say to the Preamble of my Lord of Canterbury, but that he intimated something in it, which I cannot allow of: for whereas he said, I have shewed my self sensible of the insincerity of those, with whom I had lately to deal, and of the Indignity offered to my Children: In this you must give me leave to tell you, that I have not expressed my self to be either sensible or insensible of the good or bad dealing; it was Buckingham's Relation to you which touch'd upon it; but it must not bar me, nor make Jupiter speak that which Jupiter speaks not: For when I speak any such thing, I will speak it with that Reason, and back it with that Power, which becomes a King. As for the matter of the Declaration unto my Demands, which you have couched in that Paper, which I now heard read unto me, I confess, it is without example, that any King hath had such an offer. And, with your favour, I need fear nothing in this World, having so much the hearts of my People. For the large offer of Assistance, I hold it to be more then millions of Subsidies; and indeed it is an Ample Reward for the Trust and Freedom which I have used with you.

But my Lords and Gentlemen, you must give me leave on the one side to consider the Possibility of the Action: For in this case I must do, as a man that maketh a Fortification, which must have Out-Works and In-Works; so I must not deal only with mine own People, but with my Neighbours Advice, to assist me in so great Business for Recovery of the Palatinate. And in this case it is not sufficient to have the Hearts of my Subjects, without the Help of my Neighbours and Allies: On the other side, unless particular means be set down, it will neither be a Bridle to our Enemies, nor a Comfort to my Friends who shall joyn with me. General words will not carry it, therefore I must resort to particular means, and follow the Counsel of our Saviour Christ in the Gospel, before I begin a War, to see how I can maintain it. God knows it is a longsome Work, yet I desire with Moses, as I said before, but to see the Land of Promise, though I live not till it be recovered. But unless particular means be discovered, it is little to the point: Therefore since you give me such fair general Promises, I will deal freely with you, I will tell you in particular, the way I will propose, either by way of Subsidies, or otherwise; which being done in Parliament, is a Parliamentary way. I would require you to be pleased to bestow upon me Five Subsidies, and Two Fifteens to every Subsidy, for the War: And for mine own Necessities, my crying Debts are so heavy, that no man can bear them with a greater grief of Heart, and sting of Conscience, than I have done, and do. And I now growing old, would be glad to see a means for the satisfying of my Debts, before I go out of the World. And for this end, I desire you would give me One Subsidy and Two Fifteens yearly, until my Debts be paid.

If this may be done, or that I may see a fair Way for it, I will follow your Advice; for I would never have asked your Advice to reject it, or to put a scorn upon you. For the Levying of these Subsidies and Fifteens, I would have you consider how to clear these two Difficulties. If you Levy them too suddenly, it may be heavy for the People; if you stay too long, it will not serve the turn. But this I leave to your consideration: And since I leave it to your selves to receive the Money, and expend it by your own Committees of both Houses, you may be the more secure. And yet I would not have you to Anno 1624. to be too hasty in the Levying of it, that no extremity be shewed to my People by imposing too heavy a Burden upon them, which God forbid. On the other side, the Business will not suffer too long lingring about it. I told you before, I had in this great Business, to look to my Conscience and Honour, as well as to the Means: For the Means, I must have it from you; my Conscience and Honour is mine own, of which I have thought, and do think daily; and how I shall be able to discharge them as a King ought to do, yet not without taking help of your Advice, which I would never have moved, unless I had meant to follow it.

The Prince here declared, That his Majesty was satisfied that he might on good grounds undertake the War; and for the manner of Publishing, he would take the Advice of Parliament.

Then the Duke of Buckingham said, The Reason why his Majesty used these Words, was, That having formerly spoken of his Honour and Conscience, if he should now have left them out, it might have been thought that Money only had drawn him to it: But the King said, He was already satisfied and resolved, yet would have your Advice for the manner of declaring it.

The King again proceeded. 'I told you before, that this was the way to make me in love with Parliaments, and to shew mine inclination to continue them still. My Resolution is to make this a Session for the passing of as many good Laws, as in convenient time may be prepared; and at Michaelmas, or within a few dayes after, to have a new Session, and another at the Spring. And in the mean time, you may go down and acquaint your selves with the Grievances of my People; and you shall see my care to make good Laws, and to reform abuses; that so my Subjects may find the good fruits of Parliaments, and rejoyce in them; and I protest, as I have asked your Advice in these Points, which I needed not to have done; so I will never enter any Agreement or Treaty of Composition for Peace, which is the end of War (else it is unjust and unchristian) without your Advice; and I will help you my self, if we enter into a War, to make it allowable to the World, and Honourable for me.

The King declaring his Resolution to dissolve the Treaties, Bonfires were made in London, and the Parliament granted three Subsidies, and three Fifteens; which he accepts, as followeth.

The King accepts the Aid proffered him.

MY Nobles and Gentlemen, the last time I spake to you anent this great Business, I told you what in my opinion was necessarily required to the beginning of it. The Reasons whereof you have truly set down out of my last Speech, wherein I shewed you what good it would do, and what harm it might free us from; to expresse particular Aids at this time as well as general Promises. It is true, I must confess that how far you declare your selves, is sufficient for the present entrance into the business, though a great deal short of what I told you it would require. But as God bears me record, and I think the hearts of all my Loving Subjects will testify for me, I never did stick for Money, but only desired you to clear your selves by particulars, that I may see how I may be able to go through so great a matter, at least to make a good beginning of the War; for what the end will be, God knows.

So on the other part, I gave you thanks for your general Offer, by which you did engage your selves and your Lives and Estates, which is more than forty Subsidies, if you had named them, and more worth than a Kingdom; for the strength of a King, next under the protection of God, stands in the hearts of his People; and I must needs say, in this particular, it is without example, that ever any Parliament for a beginning, gave to a King so great a Supply to be levied in so short a time: This may well serve for a preparation. And for my part, first, considering your general Offer (which is ten times more to me than all Subsidies) and next considering that these particulars coming from you, be as much as at once you are able to pay in so short a time, being within a year, and as much as may be well expected: Therefore with as much Love, and as great Thanks, as a loving and kind King can give to so loving and dutiful People, I thank you for your Offer, and do accept it.

I told you before, that I would never have craved your Advice to reject it, and so to put a Scorn upon you: Think me not the Man.

It is true, I think no wise King can undertake so great a Bargain, but he must well bethink himself beforehand: and I account it better that a King advise well before he take a Resolution, than advise rashly, and after repent. Therefore my Lords and Gentlemen, I declare unto you, That as I am willing to follow your Advice in the annulling and breach of the two Treaties, both of the Match and of the Palatinate: so on the other part, I assure my self, you will make good what you have said; That what you advise me unto, you will assist me with your Wisdom, and Council, and Forces, if need require.

I pray you have a charitable opinion of me, as you are to have of a King who hath so long ruled and governed over you (and I may vaunt my self thus far to have done it with Justice and Peace. But as I told you before, all my forbearance hath been for sparing the effusion of Christian Blood, and as the most easie and probable way for recovering the Palatinate for my Children. It is true I have been so long delayed, and paid with Generals, that I dare not longer trust unto that which made me err. The Duke of Buckingham made a particular Relation unto me, of all that Business; and I am sure such an Account was never before given in Parliament, that thereby you may know what to trust to. I could in this case have resolved my self; but I thought it could not but be both a strength and honour to me to have the Advice of my People.

My Lords, in the late Parliament I then declared it unto you, that I was resolved without respect of Friendship, or March, or whatsoever, to have the Palatinate one way or other: I hope you remember it.

God is my Judge and Saviour, I never had any other end, and it is pity I should live to have any other end; and for my part, except by such means as God may put into my hands, I may recover the Palatinate, I could wish never to have been born. I am old, but mine only Son is young; and I will promise for my self and him

Anno 1624. both that no means shall be unused for the recovery of it; and this I dare say, as old as I am, if it might do good to the Business, I would go in mine own person, and think my Labour and Travel well bestowed, though I should end my days there. For if I should spare any means possible for the recovery of it, then let me be thought not worthy to Reign over you; and in good faith, I never resolved to live with other mind; and I will say more, there was never any Enemy of my Son-in Law, with whom I talked of the business, or any that ever I spake with of the same, which did not say, and confess I had reason to have the Palatinate one way or other: And when they say that it is good reason, and themselves allowed it, it is a good Spur to him to think on it.

My Lords and Gentlemen, thus far assure yourselves, I will go cheerfully about it, to prepare all things possible for it; and as you have given the Means, so I will employ them toward it.

In the next degree, I hope you will think of me; but that I leave to your own Counsel and Consideration; But I protest to God, a penny of this Money shall not be bestowed but upon this Work, and by your own Committees; And I assure my self, you will think of me for a double Reason; My Customs are likely to fall, by occasion of the War, and my Charges increase; but undertaking the War, I must go through with it one way or other, though I sell my Jewels and all.

In the next Session you will consider how this hath been Husbanded; and according to that, think what is next to be done; and it will spur you the more to enable me for the rest, whereof I speak to you before.

His Majesty further said, I will clear you in some things; for I will not deal with you in any thing, but fairly and clearly as a King; though I have broken the Necks of Three Parliaments, one after another: I hope that in this Parliament you shall be so resolved of the sincerity of my heart, and of your duties and affections, that this shall be a happy Parliament, and make me greater and happier than any King of England ever was.

In my last Speech I promised you, that if I accepted your Offer, I would follow your Advice, and would not after hearken to any Treaty of Peace without first acquainting you, and requiring your Advice; and I likewise promised nothing should be spent of your Monies, but by your own Committees. But I desire you to understand, That I must have a faithful secret Council of War, that must not be ordered by a Multitude; for so many Designs may be discovered before-hand: and one penny of this Money shall not be bestowed, but in sight of your own Committees. But where I shall send twenty Thousand pounds, or ten Thousand pounds; whether by Sea or Land, East or West, by Diversion, or otherwise by Invasion upon the Bavarian, or Emperor, you must leave that to your King.

Assure your selves, my delay hitherto was upon hope to have gotten it without a War. I held it by a hair, hoping to have gotten it by a Treaty; but since I see no certainty that way, I hope that God who hath put it into your hearts thus to advise me, and into my heart to follow your Advice, will so bless it, That I shall clear my Reputation from obloquy; and in de-spight of the Devil and all his Instruments, shew that I never had but an honest Heart. And I desire that God would bless our Labours for the happy Restitution of my Children; and who-soever did the wrong, I deserved better at their hands.

However his Majesty resolved, That this should not be made a War of Religion; as may be seen by his Letter to Secretary Conway.

I Doubt not but you have heard what a stinging Petition against the Papists the Lower House hath sent to the Higher House this day, that they might joyntly present it unto me. Yet know my firm resolution not to make this a War of Religion; and seeing I would be loth to be Cony-catch'd by my People, I pray you stay the Post that is going to Spain, till I meet with my Son, who will be here to morrow morning: Do it upon pretext of some more Letters ye are to send by him; and if he should be gone, hasten after him, to stay him upon some such pretext; and let none living know of this, as you love me, And before Two in the Afternoon to morrow, you shall without fail hear from me; Farewel.

JAMES REX.

The Petition which the King called a stinging one, was intended to be presented to his Majesty from both Houses in Form as followeth; but it was afterward presented and new-Moulded.

May it please your Excellent Majesty,

WE your Majesties most humble and Loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament Assembled, having to our singular Comfort received your Princely Resolution upon our humble Petition, to dissolve the 2 Treaties of the Match and of the Palatinate; and having on our parts with all alacrity and readiness humbly offered our assistance to your Majesty, to maintain the War which may ensue thereupon: yet withal sensibly finding what Seditious and Traiterous Positions those Incendiaries of Rome, and professed Engines of Spain, Priests and Jesuites infuse into your natural born Subjects; what Numbers they have seduced, and do daily seduce, to make their dependance on the Pope of Rome and King of Spain, contrary to their Allegiance to your Majesty their Liege Lord; what daily resort of Priests and Jesuites into your Kingdoms, what concourse of Popish Recusants, much more than usual, is now in and about the City of London, what boldness, yea, what insolency they have discovered out of the Opinion conceived of their Foreign Patronage, what public resort to Masses and other Exercises of the Popish Religion in the Houses of Foreign Ambassadors there is daily to the great grief and offence of your good Subjects, what great preparations are made in Spain, fit for an Invasion, the vent whereof is as probable to be upon some part of your Majesties Dominions, as upon any other place, what encouragement that may be to your Enemies, and the Enemies of your Crown, to have a party, or but the Opinion of a party within your King.

The Petition.

Anno 1624. Kingdoms, who did increase and combine themselves together for that purpose; what disheartning of your good and loving Subjects, when they shall see more cause of fear from their false-hearted Countrey-men at home, than from their professed Adversaries abroad; what apparent dangers by Gods providence and your Majesties wisdom and goodness they have very lately escaped, which the longer continuance upon those Treaties, upon such unfitting Conditions, fomented by your own ill-affected Subjects, would surely have drawn upon your Majesty and your State; do in all humbleness offer unto your sacred Majesty these their humble Petitions following.

I. That all Jesuites and Seminary Priests, and all others, having taken Orders by any Authority derived from the See of Rome, may, by your Majesties Proclamation be commanded forthwith to depart out of this Realm, and all other your Highnesses Dominions: and neither they, nor any other to return or come hither again, upon peril of the severest penalty of the Laws now in force against them; and that all your Majesties Subjects may hereby also be admonished not to receive, entertain, comfort, conceal any of that viperous brood, upon penalties and forfeitures which by the Laws may be imposed upon them.

II. That your Majesty would be pleased to give streight and speedy charge to the Justices of Peace in all parts of this Kingdom, that (according to the Laws in that behalf made, and the Orders taken by your Majesties Privy-Council heretofore for policy of State) they do take from all Popish Recusants legally convicted, or justly suspected, all such Armor, Gunpowder, and Munition of any kind, as any of them have either in their own hands, or in the hands of any other for them, and to see the same safely kept and disposed, according to the Law; leaving for the necessary defence of their house and persons, so much as by the Law is prescribed.

III. That your Majesty will please to command all Popish Recusants, and all other who by any Law or Statute are prohibited to come to the Kings Court, forthwith under pain of your heavy displeasure, and severe execution of your Laws against them, to retire themselves, their Wives and Families from or about London, to their several dwellings or places by your Laws appointed, and there to remain confined within five Miles of their dwelling places, according to the Law of this your Realm: and for that purpose to discharge all by-past Licenses granted unto them for their Repair hither; and that they presume not any time hereafter to repair to London, or within ten Miles of London, or to the Kings Court, or the Princes Court, wheresoever.

IV. That your Majesty would forbid and restrain the great resort and Concourse of your own Subjects, for the hearing of Mass, or other Exercises of the Romish Religion, to the Houses of Foreign Ambassadors or Agents, residing here for the Service of their several Princes or States.

V. That where of late in several Counties in this Realm some have been trusted in the places of Lord Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer; Justices of Peace; and Captains of their Countries, which are either Popish Recusants, or Non-Communicants; by the space of a year now last past, or which do not usually resort to the Church to Divine Service, and can bring no good Certificate thereof; that your Majesty would be pleased to discharge them from these places of Trust, by which they have that power in the Countrey where they live, as is not fit to be put into the hands of persons so affected.

VI. That your Majesty would be pleased generally to put the Laws in due execution, which are made and stand in force against Popish Recusants; and that all your Judges, Justices and Ministers of Justice, to whose care these things are committed, may by your Majesties Proclamation be commanded to do their duty therein.

VII. That seeing we are thus happily delivered from that danger which these Treaties now dissolved, and that use which your ill-affected Subjects made thereof would certainly have drawn upon us; and cannot but foresee and fear lest the like may hereafter happen, and inevitably bring such peril to your Majesties Kingdoms: We are most humble Suitors to your Gracious Majesty, to secure the hearts of your good Subjects by the engagement of your Royal Word unto them; That upon no occasion of Marriage or Treaty, or other request in that behalf from any Foreign Prince or States whatsoever, you will take off or slacken the Execution of your Laws against the Popish Recusants.

To which our humble Petitions, proceeding from our most Loyal and Dutiful Affections toward your Majesty, our Care of our Countreys good, and our confident Perswasion that this will much advance the Glory of Almighty God, the everlasting Honour of your Majesty, the Safety of your Kingdom, and the Encouragement of all your good Subjects: We do most humbly beseech your Majesty to vouchsafe a Gracious Answer.

To which His Majesty returned this Answer.

My Lords and Gentlemen of both Houses,

I Cannot but commend your Zeal in offering this Petition to me, yet on the other side, I cannot but hold my self unfortunate, that I should be thought to need a Spur to do that which my Conscience and Duty binds me unto. What Religion I am of, my Books do declare, my Profession and Behaviour doth shew; and I hope in God I shall never live to be thought otherwise; surely I shall never deserve it; and for my part, I wish it may be written in Marble, and remain to Posterity as a mark upon me, when I shall swerve from my Religion; for he that doth dissemble with God, is not to be trusted with Men.

Anno 1624. My Lords, for my part, I protest before God, that my heart hath bled when I have heard of the increase of Popery; God is my Judge, it hath been such a great grief to me, That it hath been as Thorns in my Eyes, and Pricks in my Sides; and so far I have been and shall be from turning another way. And my Lords and Gentlemen, you shall be my Confessors, that one way or other it hath been my desire to hinder the Growth of Popery; and I could not have been an honest man if I should have done otherwise. And this I may say further, that if I be not a Martyr, I am sure I am a Confessor; and in some sence I may be called a Martyr, as in the Scripture Isaac was persecuted by Ishmael by mocking words; for never King suffered more ill Tongues than I have done; and I am sure for no cause; yet I have been far from persecution; for I have ever thought that no way more encreased any Religion than Persecution, according to that Saying, Sanguis Martyrum Semen Ecclesie.

Now my Lords and Gentlemen, for your Petition, I will not only grant the Substance of what you crave, but add somewhat more of my own; for the two Treaties being already annulled (as I have declared them to be) it necessarily follows of its self, that which you desire, and therefore it needs no more; but that I do declare by Proclamation (which I am ready to do) that all Jesuites and Priests do depart by a day; but it cannot be as you desire by our Proclamation to be out of all my Dominions; for a Proclamation here extends but to this Kingdom.

This I will do, and more; I will command all my Judges, when they go their Circuits, to keep the same Courses for putting all the Laws in execution against Recusants, as they were wont to do before these Treaties; for the Laws are still in force, and were never dispensed with by me: God is my Judge, they were never so intended by me; but as I told you in the beginning of the Parliament, you must give me leave, as a good Horse-man, sometimes to use the Reins, and not always to use the Spurs; so now there needs nothing but my Declaration for the Disarming of them; that is ready done by the Laws, and shall be done as you desired: and more, I will take order for the shameful disorder of the resorting of my Subjects to all Foreign Ambassadors; for this I will advise with my Council how it may be best reformed. It is true that the Houses of Ambassadors are privileged places; and though they cannot take them out of their Houses, yet the Lord Mayor and Mr. Recorder of London may take some of them as they come from thence, and make them Examples; another point I will add concerning the education of their Children, of which I have had a principal care as the Lord of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, and other Lords of my Council can bear me witness; with whom I have advised about this business: for in good faith it is a shame their Children should be bred here as if they were at Rome. So I do grant not only your desire, but more. I am sorry I was not the first mover of it to you; but had you not done it, I would have done it my self.

Now for the second part of your Petition, you have here given me the best Advice in the World; for it is against the Rule of Wisdom, that a King should suffer any of his Subjects to transgress the Laws by the Intercession of other Princes: and therefore assure your selves that (by the Grace of God) I will be careful that no such conditions be foisted in upon any other Treaty whatsoever; for it is fit my Subjects should stand or fall to their own Laws.

The Spanish Ambassadors are resolved to ruine Buckingham if possible; and therefore having an Audience, suggest that the Duke plotted to confine his Majesty to a Country-House, and Pastimes there; and to commit the Mannage of publick Affairs to the Prince and himself; but the King demands particular Proofs; which they declining, it did produce in our King no other effect, than a representation of their Miscarriages herein to the King of Spain, and a demand of Justice upon them; but nothing was done in it; only they were preferred for it: Bristol is not admitted to the King's Presence, but is Committed to the Tower, and protests against the Dukes Narrative; the Sequel of whose Story you may expect hereafter.

May 29. the Parliament is Adjourned, and several Bills passed: The Speaker's Speech followeth.

That God, to his own great Glory, had brought this Session of the Parliament, so happily begun, to so happy an end, that both Houses, and every particular Member thereof, hath given their willing Assent, even with one Voice, unto the Advice which His Majesty was pleased so low to descend, as to demand of them. As there was not an Hammer heard in the Building of the House of God, so in this great Business there was not a Negative Voice, nor any jarring amongst them: But their time was wholly spent in the Business of Parliament, in which they had prepared many Bills profitable for the Common-wealth, and shewed the several natures of those Bills; some for the Service of God, and Restraint of Recusants; some to redress the Enormities of the Common-wealth; others of his Majesties Grace and Bounty to his People; and some concerning the Prince's Highness touching his own Lands; and others to settle strife in particular Estates: All which do wait for, and humbly desire his Majesties Royal Assent.

He shewed also what great joy they all received for the Dissolution of the two Treaties with Spain; and that Commissioners are required to see the Edicts perform'd against Recusants and Jesuits, the Locusts of Rome, wherein will consist his Majesties chiefest Safety. And they do render him humble Thanks for their ancient Privileges, which they fully enjoyed in this Parliament, and their so often access unto his Majesties presence; and more especially for his Majesties general, large, liberal and free Pardon; shewing the Benefit thereof, and reciting the Particulars. He also presented the Bill of three entire Subsidies, and three Fifteens and Tenths granted this Session, and declared the Chearfulness of the Grant thereof; and making his earnest Prayers unto Almighty God to direct his Majesties heart to make his own Sword his Sheriff, to put his Son-in-Law in possession of his Palatinate, the ancient Inheritance of his Royal Grand-children, he ended, humbly craving pardon for himself, and his own Errors committed this Session.

Unto

The Speaker and the Kings Speech at the Adjournment of the Parliament.

Anno 1624. Unto which his Majesty presently made Answer, beginning with the last of the Speaker's Speech, touching their Freedom, which he promised to continue unto them in as large a manner as ever they enjoyed the same. And for the Restitution of his Son-in-Law, protested his continual care thereof, and his great grief if he should not see an assured hope before he died; and vowed that all the Subsidies, for which he heartily thanked them, though it had not been so tied and limited, should have been bestowed that way. His Majesty remembered them, that nothing was given to relieve his own wants; which he expecteth at the next Session the beginning of Winter. He acknowledged the Obedience and good Respect of the Commons in all things this Parliament; for which (as he was pleased to say) he thanks them heartily, and without complement; and if they please to continue the same at the next Meeting, it will make this the happiest Parliament that ever was.

His Majesty spake also of the Grievances presented unto him yesterday by the Commons at Whitehall, promising them a full Answer at their next meeting: That he had looked over them, and was glad they were of no greater importance. His Majesty remembered the House to handle Grievances at their next Meeting, and to hunt after none, nor to present any but those of Importance. He promised to go over them all, and to give a free Answer, such as should be Good for his People, not respecting any Creatures whatsoever; and that he will advise herein with his Council and Judges. At this time his Majesty said, he would shew them his Grievances: First, That they grieve at the Reformation of Building about London with Brick; which he intended only for the Beauty and more Safety of the City; therefore he will go through with it; and if the Commissioners offend herein, let the party aggrieved complain, and he will redress it; and that the form of proceedings used by the Commons in this Parliament is also a Grievance unto his Majesty; for that they did not call the Commissioners, whom they complained of, before them, touching their Complaint against Doctor Aynan; his Majesty said, their Oath of Supremacy forbids them to meddle with Church-matters; besides, they complain against him, and never heard him. Touching their Complaint against the Apothecaries, his Majesty protested his Care therein to be only for his Peoples health; it is dangerous for every one to meddle with Apothecaries Ware, and the Grocers have a Trade beside.

His Fourth Grievance is, That Seditious Books are so frequently Printed; which he will be careful to prevent hereafter.

Fifthly, For calling so many Patents, appointing the Patentees to wait so many dayes with their Council, and never to hear them; wherefore his Majesty warned them to call for no more hereafter, unless they first knew them to be grievous to the People. And so his Majesty concluded, with Thanks for the Commons good Carriage towards him and his Lords this Session.

Then the Lord Keeper spake to the Particulars of the Speakers Speech, and by his Majesties Command approved them all, alluding the general consent of both Houses to the Septuagint, directed by the Holy Ghost; and touching the Speaker's Desire for the King's Assent to the Bills past both Houses, he said, The Royal Assent is proper to the Law-giver; and shewed, that it is best for the People, that this is in his Majesties power, and not in themselves; for the King knoweth what is best to be granted unto his People; as may appear by the Petition that Bathsheba made to King Solomon, to give unto Adonijah Abishag to wife; which had Solomon granted, he had given Adonijah means to usurp the Kingdom, contrary to Bathsheba's meaning; and such is his Majesties intent this day, for such Bills which he will not pass. That his Majesty hath given his Consent to all the Bills of Grace, and to the Bill of the Continuance of some Statutes, and Repeal of others, so necessary, and for the good of the People. That his Majesty accepteth in good part their Thanks for his general Pardon, which he hath so freely granted unto his Subjects; but his especial Command is, That those that are in Office, do look strictly to the execution of Laws against Recusants: The Subsidies his Majesty graciously accepteth, and therefore imitates not the Story in Macrobius, of one who had all his Debts paid, and instead of Thanks, answered, Mihi nihil: Though this be given to the Palatinate, his Majesty interpreteth it as given to himself, and rendreth to you all hearty thanks for the same.

The Lord Keeper having ended his Speech, the Clerk of the Crown stood up, and read the Titles of the Bills passed both Houses; and Clerk of the Parliament read his Majesties Answer to each Bill. The Bills were in all seventy three.

This Summer four Regiments of Foot were raised for the Service of the United Provinces, to be employed against the Emperor, under the Command of four Noble Colonels, the Earls of Oxford, Essex, Southampton, and the Lord Wiltoughby; and King James demanding the Town of Frankendale in the Palatinate, deposited in the Arch-Dutcheffes hands, Spinola marcheth out of it, and finding none of the King of Great Britain's Forces to take possession of it, re-enters it immediately.

The French perceiving our King's Desires of an Alliance and Affinity with that Crown, enlarge their Demands in favour of the Papists; which the King would not grant: Richelieu then Chief Minister there, labours what in him lay, for them; notwithstanding, in November the Articles were sworn to by both Kings, and by the Prince; but were not so high in favour to the Papists, as those of the Spanish Match were to have been. All expressions of Joy are made both here at London, and in Paris: And now Count Mansfield arrives here; where, at St. James's he is splendidly Treated; and Commissions are given out for the raising 12000 Foot, and two Troops of Horse, to be employed under his Command, for the Recovery of the Palatinate; which the Duke of Bavaria hearing, for the preservation of his new acquired Dignity and Conquest, enleagues himself more strictly with the Spaniard; pretending wholly to relie on the House of Austria; whilst on the other hand, the Elector of Saxony perswades the Emperor to apply himself sincerely for the settling of the Peace of the Empire, which could no otherwise be Anno 1625. be done, than by the Restitution of the most Ancient House of the Palatinate. The Army raised for Mansfield is on its March for Dover; where, as is usual, great complaints are made of the Disorders of the Souldiers; the Duke of Buckingham, Lord High Admiral, is required to Land them at Calice; but the French deny their Landing, notwithstanding the Treaty and Alliance now on foot; and the Souldiers being closely pent up in the Ships, contract an ill Distemper; so that the third part of those Souldiers came never safe to Land: And they put again to Sea in order to their Landing in Zealand; but the States having no notice thereof, and being in some scarcity of Victuals, they are not there also permitted to Land; so that the Design came to nothing.

A great Difference had now been for several years here in England between the Secular and Regular Priests about Episcopal Jurisdiction; the former desiring a Bishop to be sent from Rome, for the conferring of Orders, and Conservation of Unity amongst them; and herein they were seconded by the Benedictines; so that at last (amongst others) Matthew Kellison and Richard Smith being Presented, Urban the Eighth Consecrated the latter, and sent him into England with Episcopal Authority over the Seculars; a thing much opposed and disliked by the other Faction; but all in vain: for sent he is; and great hopes, say the Benedictines, had they of a plentiful Harvest by this mans promotion.

The King had now been a week sick of a Tertian Fever, and finding himself much to decay, sent for the Prince to come to him; to whom he heartily recommended the Care of the Church of England; commands him to love his Wife, but not her Religion; exhorts him to take special Care of his Grand-Children, the Children of the Palsgrave, by all means to endeavour his Restitution to his Estate and Dignity; and lastly, he recommends to him his Servants and Officers, who had faithfully served him: and upon the 27th. of March, 1625. he gave up the Ghost. Of whom the Learned Viscount Verulam gave this Character:

Representing (saith he) Your Majesty many times unto my mind, and beholding you, not with the eye of Presumption, to discover that which the Scripture tells me is inscrutable; but with the observant eye of Duty and Admiration, laying aside the other parts of your Virtue and Fortune, I have been touched, yea, and possessed with an extream wonder at these your Virtues and Faculties, which the Philosophers call Intellectuals, [The largeness of your Capacity, the faithfulness of your Memory, the swiftness of your Apprehension, the penetration of your Judgment, and the faculty and order of your Elocution.] And I have then thought, that of all the persons living that I have known, your Majesty was the best Instance to make a man of Plato's Opinion; That all Knowledge is but Remembrance, and that the Mind of Man by nature knoweth all things, and hath but her own Native and Original Notions (which by the strangeness and darkness of the Tabernacles of the Body are sequestered) again revived and restored. Such a Light of Nature I have observed in your Majesty, and such a readiness to take flame, and blaze from the least occasion presented, or the least spark of anothers Knowledge delivered. And as the

Scripture saith of the wisest King, That his Heart was as the sand of the Sea, which though it be one of the largest Bodies, yet it consisteth of the smallest and finest Portions: So hath God given your Majesty a composition of Understanding admirable, being able to compose and comprehend the greatest matters, and nevertheless to touch and apprehend the least; wherein it should seem an impossibility in Nature for the same Instrument to make it self fit for great and small Works. And for your gift of Speech, I call to mind what Cornelius Tacitus saith of Augustus Caesar, Augusto profluens & qua Principem deceret Eloquentia fuit: For if we mark it well, Speech that is uttered with labour and difficulty, or Speech that favoureth of the affectation of Arts and Precepts, or Speech that is framed after the imitation of some pattern of Eloquence, though never so excellent, all this hath somewhat servile and holding of the Subject; but your Majesties manner of Speech is indeed Prince-like, flowing as from a Fountain, and yet streaming and branching it self into Natures Order, full of Facility and Felicity, Imitating none, and inimitable by any. &c. And there seemeth to be no little contention between the excellency of your Majesties Gifts of Nature, and Universality and perfection of your Learning; for I am well assured of this, that what I shall say is no amplification at all, but a positive and measured Truth; which is, That there hath not been since Christ's Time, any King or Temporal Monarch, which hath been so learned in all Literature and Erudition, Divine and Humane: For let a man seriously and diligently revolve and peruse the Succession of the Emperors of Rome, of which Cesar the Dictator, before Christ, and Marcus Antonius were the best learned; and so descend to the Emperors of Grecia, or of the West, and then to the Lines of France, Spain, England, Scotland, and the rest, and he shall find this Judgment truly made; for it seemeth much in a King, if by the compendious extractions of other mens Wits and Learning, he can take hold of any superficial Ornaments; and Shews of Learning; or if he countenance or prefer Learning or Learned men: But to drink indeed of the true Fountain of Learning, nay to have such a Fountain of Learning in himself, in a King, and in a King born, is almost a Miracle; and the more, because there is met in your Majesty a rare conjunction as well of Divine and Sacred Literature, as Prophane and Humane. So as your Majesty stands invested of that Triplicity which in great veneration was ascribed to the ancient Hermes, the Power and Fortune of a King, the Knowledge and Illumination of a Priest, and the Learning and Universality of a Philosopher. This Propriety inherent and individual Attribute in your Majesty, deserveth to be expressed not only in the Fame and Admiration of the present time, nor in the History or Tradition of the Ages succeeding, but also in some solid Work, fixed Memorial, and immortal Monument, bearing a Character or Signature, both of the Power of a King, and the Difference and Perfection of such a King.

Memoria Justi cum Laudibus, & Impiorum Nomen pure scis.

And a Reverend Prelate of our Church, then of Christ's-Church Oxon, the Epitaph following.

Those that have Eyes, awake and weep,
For He, whose waking wrought our sleep,
Is fallen asleep; and shall never Awake again, till wak'd for Ever.

Death's Iron Hand hath clos'd those Eyes,
Which were at once Three Kingdoms Spies;
Both to foresee, and to prevent Dangers so soon as they are meant.

That Head (whose working Brain alone Wrought all mens Quiet; But His own)
Now lies at Rest. Oh let Him have The Peace (He purchas'd) in His Grave.

If that no Naboth all His Reign,
Was for his Fruitful Vineyard, slain;
If no Uriah lost his Life,
For having had so fair a Wife;

Then let no Shemei's Curses wound
His Honour, or prophane His Ground;
Let no Black-Mouth, no Rank-breath'd Cur Peaceful James his Ashes stir.

Kings are as Gods; O! do not then Rake in their Graves to proye them Men.

For his daies toyl, and his Nights watches;
For the craz'd sleep he stole by Snatches;
For two fair Kingdoms, join'd in One;
For all he did, or meant t'have done;
Do this for Him; write on His Dust;

ANNALS

King CHARLES I.

1625.

On the 27th. of March, 1625, King JAMES the First Monarch of Great Britain, died at Theobalds; a Learned, Wise and Just Prince was he; who had from his Cradle Conflicted with great variety of humors, both of Times and Men, and left the Diadem of his Three Kingdoms to his Son Charles the First, of ever Blessed Memory; who being acquainted with his Father's Death by the Privy Council, and they desiring Admittance to his Presence, he desired them to forbear their Attendance till next Morning: In the mean while he was Proclaimed, as is usual, at the Court-Gate at Theobalds; and the great Officers being commanded to Attend the King, they, as is usual, surrender their Offices and Employments; which, he immediately restored to them again; and Order being sent by the Privy Council to the Lord Mayor of London, to Attend with his Brethren the Aldermen in their Gowns at Ludgate, in order to the Proclaiming of the King: Which being begun by the Lords of the Privy-

Council, and others the Nobility in Cavalcade at Whitehal, Charing-Cross, Denmark-Honse, Temple-Bar, and the great Conduit in Fleet-Street: they proceeded to Ludgate, where the Mayor and Aldermen of London attending within the Gate in their Robes, they being entred again, there Proclaim the King; and all together, in the same manner ride to Cheap-Cross, where again they Proclaimed his Majesty; and so leaving the Lord Mayor to carry on the Work by them begun, they returned, and on the Evening of the same day King Charles came to St. James's, and the Day following the Privy Counsellors and Nobility, both Spiritual and Temporal, being Assembled to wait on the King, he by his Secretary commands that the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal should be sworn of his Majesties Privy Council; and that he should in like manner give the Oath of a Privy Counsellor to the Lord President; and he in like manner to all the rest of the late King's Privy Counsellors; who were respectively continued in their places; and the rest of the Lords who were not of the Privy Council, repaired to St. James's, and there kissed his Majesties Hand; and the Council being Sworn, as before, immediately sat, and

Car. I.

and Resolved on these Particulars to be Presented to his Majesty:

1625.

That a Commission be granted to Authorize the Great Seal, Privy Seal and Signet, till New ones be prepared.

That Commissions be Issued out with all convenient speed, for the Authorizing of all Judges, Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, and other the Officers of Civil Government.

That Proclamation be made to Authenticate Proceedings of Justice, and Preservation of the Peace.

That all Powers of the Respective Embassies be continued, and Notice given to Foreign States and Potentates; and the like Proclamations and Commissions be Ordered in Scotland and Ireland, &c.

That a Parliament be summoned according to his Majesties Pleasure; and the Solemnization of his late Majesties Funeral, and his own Coronation be likewise then Represented.

The Council attending the King at St. James's, the Lord Keeper in the Name of the rest, gave great thanks to his Majesty for his Majesties Affiance in them who before served his Father; and presenting their Resolves for his Majesties Approbation, they were all allowed, and Proclamations ordered to be issued out accordingly; and did by a particular Proclamation of the same Date, take notice of his Father's Death, and 'that he being his only Son, and undoubted Heir, is invested and established in the Crown Imperial of this Realm, and all other his Majesties Realms, Dominions and Countries, with all the Royalties, Pre-eminences, Stiles, Names, Titles and Dignities to the same belonging; and he declared, That as he, for his part, shall, by God's Grace, shew himself a most benign, and gracious Sovereign Lord to all his good Subjects, in all their lawful Suits and Causes; so he mistrusteth not, but that they, on their parts, will shew themselves unto him their Natural Liege Lord, most loving, faithful and obedient Subjects.

The Council likewise moved the King about his Father's Funerals, that they be Solemnized five weeks; and some time afterwards the Ceremonies of the Nuptials in France; but all this, before the Parliament should begin; which were likewise granted accordingly. On the 23th. of April the Body and Herse of King James were brought from Theobalds to Denmark-House in London, by the Nobility and great Officers of the King, and there placed till the 17th day of May, the day appointed for the Burial; whence it was taken and carried in great State and Solemnity to the Abbey-Church of Westminster, where in King Henry the Seventh's Chappel the Kings of England are usually interred; the Herse was followed by the King himself; who to shew his Piety and Respect to his Deceased Father, laid aside Majesty, and was then chief Mourner; supported by the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke; and his Train being carried up by 12 Peers of the Realm; and thus that Great, Peaceable, and Wise Prince was laid to sleep with his Fathers and Progenitors.

In the great Affairs of Church and State, his Majesty did much consult the Duke of Buckingham and Bishop Laud, and began his Reign with preparation for War for the Recovery of the Palatine; and accordingly 8000 were appointed to Rendezvous at Plimouth, and the Charge of their Coat and Conduct were ordered to be paid by the Country, and the Country to be repaid by the King's Exchequer, according to the use of former times; but these Souldiers were very disorderly in their March; and therefore a Proclamation was issued to prevent Disorders, and Commission given to select persons to cause Execution to be done upon them according to the Demerit of their Crimes.

The Consummation of the Marriage with Henrietta Maria of France now draws on; the Articles of Marriage were Signed in King James his Life on the 11th. of May, and by the King of France on the 14th. of August following; and in March following the Articles were Signed at Paris by the English Ambassadors, the Earls of Carlisle and Holland; the Dispensation being come from Rome, the Espousals were made at Paris, by Cardinal Richelieu, the Duke of Chevreux being Procurator for his Majesty of Great Britain, and the Solemnity was performed on a Theater erected for this purpose before Nostre Dame Church in Paris, and publick Rejoycings made there on that occasion: in the mean time the Duke of Buckingham is sent into France, to conduct the Queen hither; and in all places through which she passed, all Honours are by the King's Order paid to her Majesty. The Naval Royal of England attended her at Boloigne, and in 24 hours conveyed her to Dover; where she Landed; but somewhat indisposed by the Sea. On the 22d. of June, New Stile, the King went to receive her at Dover, whence she was Conducted to Canterbury, and there in the Evening the Marriage was consummated. In her Journey to London, the Knights and Gentlemen of Kent were commanded to attend her Majesty as she passed along, in such manner as became the Dignity of his Majesty; and on the 16th. of June their Majesties entred London; where great preparations were made to receive them, but omitted by reason of the Plagues increasing in the City and Suburbs. For her Reception Somerset-House was fitted up, and her Chappel; according to the Articles of Marriage, prepared with Conveniences thereunto adjoynd for Capuchin-Friers. The Pestilence now raging in London, the Term is Adjourned; and on the 18th. of June the Parliament began at Westminster; where his Majesty Seated in his Royal Throne, the Lords being Habited in their Robes, and the Commons present, his Majesty spoke thus:

The King's Speech in Parliament.

I Thank God, that the Business to be Treated on at this time, is of such a nature, that it needs no Eloquence to set it forth; for I am neither able to do it, neither doth it stand with my Nature to spend much time in words. It is no new Business, being already happily begun by my Father of blessed Memory, who is with God; therefore it needeth no Narrative: I hope in God you will go on to maintain it, as freely as you advised my Father to do it. It is true, he may seem to some to have been slack to begin so just and so glorious a Work; but it was his wisdom that made him loth to begin a work, till he might find a time to maintain it: But after that he saw how much he was abused in the Confidence he had with other States, and was confirmed by your Advice to run the Course we are in, with your Engagement to maintain it,

Anno 1625. it, I need not press to prove how willingly he took your Advice; for the preparations that are made, are better able to declare it, than I to speak it. The assistance of those in Germany, the Fleet that is ready for Action, with the rest of the Preparations, which I have only followed my Father in, do sufficiently prove, that he entered into this Action.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I hope you remember you were pleased to employ me to advise my Father, to break off those two Treaties that were on foot; so that I cannot say, that I came hither a free unengaged man. It's true, I came into this Business willingly and freely, like a young man, and consequently rashly; but it was by your interest, your engagement; so that though it were done like a Young man, yet I cannot repent me of it, and I think none can blame me for it, knowing the Love and Fidelity you have born to your King, having my self likewise some little experience of your affections. I pray you remember, that this being my first Action, and begun by your Advice and Entreaty, what a great dishonour it were to you and me, if this Action, so begun, should fail for that Assistance you are able to give me. Yet knowing the constancy of your Love both to me and this Business, I needed not to have said this, but only to shew what care and sense I have of your Honours and mine own. I must entreat you likewise to consider of the times we are in, how that I must adventure your Lives (which I should be loth to do) should I continue you here long; and you must venture the business, if you be slow in your Resolutions. Wherefore I hope you will take such grave Counsel, as you will expedite what you have in hand to do; which will do me and your selves an infinite deal of honour; you, in shewing your love to me; and me, that I may perfect that Work which my Father hath so happily begun.

Last of all, because some malicious men may, and as I hear, have given out, that I am not so true a Keeper and Maintainer of the true Religion that I profess; I assure you, that I may with St. Paul say, that I have been trained up at Gamaliel's feet: And although I shall be never so arrogant as to assume unto my self the rest, I shall so far shew the end of it, that all the world may see, that none hath been, nor ever shall be more desirous to maintain the Religion I profess, than I shall be.

Now because I am unfit for much speaking, I mean to bring up the fashion of my Predecessors, to have my Lord Keeper speak for me in most things: Therefore I have commanded him to speak something unto you at this time; which is more for Formality, than any great matter he hath to say unto you.

Then the Lord Keeper Coventry declared,

The Lord
Keeper's
Speech in Parliam.

That the King's main reason of Calling the Parliament, besides the beholding of his Subjects Faces, was to mind them of the great Engagements for the Recovery of the Palatinate, imposed on his Majesty by the late King his Father, and by themselves, who brake off the two Treaties with Spain. Also to let them understand, That the succeeding Treaties and Alliances, the Armies sent into the Low-Countries, the repairing of the Forts; and the Fortifying of Ireland, do all meet in one Center, the Palatinate; and that the Subsidies granted in the last Parliament, are herein already spent, whereof the Account is ready, together with as much of the King's own Revenue. His Lordship further commended three Circumstances.

First, the Time; all Europe being at this day as the Pool of Bethesda, the first stirring of the Waters must be laid hold on: Wherefore his Majesty desires them to bestow this Meeting on him, or rather on their Actions; and the next shall be theirs, as soon and as long as they please, for Domestick Business.

Secondly, Supply; If Subsidies be thought too long and backward, his Majesty desires to hear, and not to propound the way.

Thirdly, The Issue of Action; which being the first, doth highly concern his Majesties Honour and Reputation; for which he relies upon their Loves, with the greatest confidence that ever King had in his Subjects; witness his Royal Poetic, Amor Civium Regis Munimentum: And he doubts not, but as soon as he shall be known in Europe to be their King, so soon shall they be known to be a Loving and Loyal Nation to him.

On the 21th. of June the Commons Presented Sir Thomas Crew for their Speaker, who was approved by the King; and afterwards the House proceeded to appoint a Committee, and Sir Edward Cooke being sent by the Commons to the Lords with a Petition for their Concurrence therein, against Recusants; to which, being presented, his Majesty answered, that he was very glad that the Parliament were so forward in Matters of Religion; and assured them that he should meet them in any Overtures of that Nature; and for which he gave them his Thanks. Mr Montague, for his Book, Entituled, Appello Caesarem, is complained of in Parliament, and brought to the Bar of the Commons-House; but the matter was referred to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and he was admonished by his Grace to forbear to proceed any further to write of those Controversies; but the King was displeased with the Commons, for that Montague was his Servant and Chaplain; and so he took the Matter into his own hands; However the Parliament presented his Majesty with 2 Subsidies, as the First-Fruits of their Love; which the King accepts; acquainting them that his Affairs and the Necessities of State would require more; for that he was engaged for the Recovery of the Palatinate, by his Father, and also by their Advice.

The Parliament, by reason of the increase of the Plague at London, was Adjourned till the first of August, to be Convened at Oxford, whether the News of some Ships of the Naval Royal being lent to the French King, soon came, and gave great Ombrage to the Parliament; for that those Ships were said to be employed against the Protestants of Rochel; whereas King James only engaged against them of Genova with the French King, for the bringing down of the Power of the King of Spain in Italy; neither were the English Mariners under Admiral Penington, willing to fight against the Protestants of Rochel; and therefore they disobey Secretary Conway's Letter, which did command the Delivery of those Ships to the French King, and in a Tumult get up their Anchors and come for England; which the Admiral acquainting the Duke with, is commended back for Diep, there to put the Fleet into the hands of the Marquess de Effiat, which was done accordingly, only the Neptune was carried off by Anno 1625. Sir Ferdinando Gorges; but all the Companies did unanimously decline the French Service, and relinquished the Ships every man, except one Gunner. On the first of August the Parliament met at Oxford, who were not well pleased with the Dukes management of Affairs; particularly in the matter of these Ships; Grievances were likewise insisted on; as the mispending of the Publick Treasure, the neglect of guarding the Seas, and Dr. Montague is again summoned before the House of Commons, according to the condition of his Bond; and the Arminian Controversies were again brought upon the Stage, to the great disquiet both of Church and State; for ever and anon Popery and Arminianism were cried out upon by a party of men, who afterwards made use of these frightful Names, to amuse the Nation, and to disturb the Peace of the Church, and at last to ruine both the Church and State.

On the 4th. of August the Lords and Commons were commanded to attend the King in Christ Church-Hall in Oxford; where he spake as followeth:

The Kings
Speech in Christ Church.

MY Lords, and you of the Commons, We all remember, that from your Desires and Advice, my Father, now with God, brake off those Treaties with Spain, that were then in hand: Well you then foresaw, that as well for regaining my dispossessed Brother's Inheritance, as home-defence, a War was likely to succeed; and that as your Councils had led my Father into it, so your Assistance, in a Parliamentary-way to pursue it, should not be wanting. That aid you gave him by Advice, was for Succour for his Allies, the Guarding of Ireland, and the home-part, Supply of Munition, preparing and setting forth of his Navy. A Council you thought of, and appointed for the War, and Treasurers for issuing of the Moneys: And to begin this Work of your Advice, you gave Three Subsidies, and as many Fifteens, which, with speed, were levied, and by direction of that Council of War (in which, the Preparation of this Navy was not the least) disbursed.

It pleased God, at the entrance of this Preparation (by your Advice begun) to call my Father to his Mercy, whereby I entred as well to the care of your Design, as his Crown. I did not then, as Princes do, of Custom and Formality re-assemble you, but that by your further Advice and Aid, I might be able to proceed in that, which, by your Counsels, my Father was engaged in. Your Love to me, and forwardness to further those Affairs, you expressed by a Grant of Two Subsidies, yet ungathered; although I must assure you, by my self and others, upon Credit taken up, and beforehand disbursed, and as far short, as yet, to set forth that Navy now preparing; as I have lately the Estimate of those of Care, and who are still employed about it, whose particular of all expences about this Preparation, shall be given you, when you please to take an Account of it.

When His Majesty had ended his Speech, he commanded the Secretaries more particularly to declare the present State of his Affairs; which was done accordingly, of Parliament, and by the powerful operation of his Majesty that now is, gave consent to break off the two Treaties with Spain, touching the Match and the Palatinate, and to vindicate the many wrongs and scorns done unto his Majesty and his Royal Children: Besides, if the King of Spain were suffered to proceed in his Conquests, under pretence of the Catholick Cause, he would become the Catholick Monarch, which he so much affects and aspires unto. Also amidst these Necessities, our late King considered, that he might run a hazard with his People, who being so long inured to Peace, were unapt to War; that the uniting with other Provinces in this undertaking, was a matter of exceeding difficulty. This drew him to new Treaties for regaining his Children's Right, which were expelled by the Friends and Agents of Spain; and wherein his Majesty proceeded as far as the wisest Prince could go, and suffered himself to be won unto that, which otherwise was impossible for his Royal Nature to endure. He considered also the many difficulties abroad, the Duke of Bavaria by Force and Contract had the Palatinate in his own Possession, most of the Electors and Princes of Germany were joyned with him. The Estates of the other Princes most likely to joyn in a War of Recovery, were seized and secured, and all by a Conquering Army: Besides, the Emperor had called a Diet, in which he would take away all possibility of recovering the Honour and Inheritance of the Palatinate; thus it stood in Germany. And in France, the King there chose to sheath his Sword in the Bowels of his own Subjects, rather than to declare against the Catholick Cause. In the Low-Countries, the Sect of the Arminians prevailed much, who inclined to the Papists, rather than to their own Safety, notwithstanding that the Enemy had a great and powerful Army near them; so that his Majesty was enforced to protect and countenance them with an Army of six thousand from hence, with a Caution of the like Supply from thence, if required. Moreover, he sought Alliance with France, by a Match for his Royal Majesty that now is, thereby to have interest in that King, and to make him a Party. The last consideration was, his Majesties own Honour, who had laboured with the two Kings of Denmark and Sweden, and the German Princes, from whom he received but cold Answers; they refusing to join, unless they first saw his Majesty in the Field. But of this he was very tender, unless the League were broken, or he first warred upon. The Forces of an Army were considered, and the way of proceeding, whether by Invasion or Diversification: The Charges thereof appeared in Parliament to be Seven hundred thousand pounds a year; besides Ireland was to be fortified, the Forts here repaired, and a Navy prepared; he thought it feasible to enter into a League with the French King and the Duke of Savoy and Venice.

THAT our Sovereign Lord King James, of Famous Memory, at the Suit of both Houses

Hereupon an Army was Committed to Count Mansfield; the Charge whereof came to Seventy thousand pounds a Moneth for his Majesties part; also he commanded the preparing of this great Fleet, All which so heartned the Princes of Germany, that they sent Ambassadors to the Kings of Denmark and Sweden; and those two Kings offered a greater Army both of Horse and Foot, to which his Majesty was to pay a proportion. Count Mansfield's Army (though dastrous)

Anno 1625. 'disastrous') produced these happy effects; First, 'It prevented the Diet intended by the Emperor. 'Secondly, The German Princes gained new 'courage to defend themselves, and oppose their 'Enemies. Thirdly, The King of Denmark hath 'raised an Army with which he is marched in per- 'son as far as Minden. Moreover, the Confede- 'rates of France and Italy have prosecuted a War 'in Milan, and Peace is now made by the French 'King with his own Subjects; so that by this 'means breath is given to our Affairs.

'This Parliament is not called in meer For- 'mality upon his Majesties first coming to the 'Crown, but upon these real occasions, to con- 'sult with the Lords and Commons: Two Sub- 'sidies are already given, and Graciously accept- 'ed; but the Moneys thereof, and much more, 'are already disbursed. A Fleet is now at Sea, 'and hastning to their Rendezvous; the Army 'is ready at Plymouth, expecting their Comman- 'ders. His Majesties Honour, Religion, and the 'Kingdoms Safety is here engaged; besides, he 'is certainly advised of Designs, to infest his 'Dominions in Ireland, and upon our own Coasts, 'and of the Enemies increase of Shipping in all 'parts. These things have called the Parliament 'hither, and the present Charge of all amounts 'to above Four hundred thousand pounds; the 'further prosecution whereof, the King being 'unable to bear, hath left it to their Consultati- 'ons. His Majesty is verily perswaded, That 'there is no King that loves his Subjects, Religi- 'on, and the Laws of the Land better than him- 'self; and likewise that there is no People that 'better love their King, which he will cherish to 'the uttermost. It was thought, that this place 'had been safe for this Assembly, yet since the 'Sickness hath brought some fear thereof, his 'Majesty willet the Lords and Commons to put 'into the Ballance, with the fear of the Sickness, 'his and their great and weighty Occasions.

Lord Treasurer proceeds in that Subject. Then the Lord Treasurer added, 'That the 'late King, when he died, was indebted to the 'City of London 120000 l. besides Interest; and 'indebted for Denmark & the Palatinats 150000 l. 'and indebted for his Wardrobe 40000 l. That 'these Debts lie upon His Majesty that now is, 'who is indebted unto London 70000 l. That he 'hath laid out for his Navy 20000 l. and 20000 l. 'for Count Mansfeld. And for Mourning and 'Funeral Expences for his Father, 42000 l. For 'Expences concerning the Queen, 40000 l. The 'Navy will require to set forth in that Equipage, 'as is requisite for the great Design his Majesty 'hath in hand, and to pay them for the time in- 'tended for this Expedition, 300000 l.

After this Conference, the Commons fell into very high Debates, with very severe Reflections upon the Duke of Buckingham, That Popery and Papists are favoured and advanced, notwithstanding the Kings Promise to the contrary: That the Kings Pardon is made a Supersedeas to the Laws established against Popery: That the Pardon was Signed by the Principal Secretary of State, the Lord Conway, who said he did it by the King's exprefs Command; though it highly reflected upon the Secretary himself: And now both Houses are Ordered to attend the King in Christ-Church-Hall in Oxford, to receive an Answer to their Petition concerning Religion: To every Clause whereof his Majesty answered distinctly, and in a Parliamentary way. The Petition and Answers follow.

To the Kings Most Excellent Majesty.

Car. I.

Most Gracious Sovereign:

I being infallibly true, That nothing I can more establish the Throne, and assure the peace and prosperity of the People, than the unity and sincerity of Religion; We your most humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons of this present Parliament Assembled, hold our selves bound in Conscience and Duty to represent the same to your Sacred Majesty, together with the dangerous consequences of the increase of Popery in this Land, and what we conceive to be the principal Causes thereof, and what may be the Remedies.

The Petition concerning Religion, together with his Majesties Answer.

The Dangers appear in these Particulars.

- I. In their desperate ends, being both the subversion of the Church and State; and the restlessness of their spirits to attain these ends, the Doctrine of their Teachers and Leaders, perswading them, that therein they do God good service,
- II. Their evident and strict dependency upon such Foreign Princes, as no way affect the Good of your Majesty & this State.
- III. The opening a way of Popularity to the ambition of any, who shall adventure to make himself Head of so great a Party.

The Principal Cause of the increase of Papists.

- I. The want of the due execution of the Laws against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and Popish Recusants; occasioned partly by the connivance of the State, partly by defects in the Laws themselves, and partly by the manifold abuse of Officers.
- II. The interpoling of Foreign Princes by their Ambassadors and Agents in favour of them.
- III. Their great concourse to the City, and frequent Conferences and Conventicles there.
- IV. The open and usual resort to the Houses and Chappels of Foreign Ambassadors.
- V. The Education of their Children in Seminaries and Houses of their Religion in Foreign parts, which of late have been greatly multiplied and enlarged for the entertaining of the English.
- VI. That in some places of your Realm, your people be not sufficiently instructed in the knowledge of the true Religion.
- VII. The Licentious Printing and Dispersing of Popish and Seditious Books.
- VIII. The employment of men ill-affect- ed in Religion in places of Government, who do, shall, or may countenance the Popish party.

The Remedies against this outrageous and dangerous Disease, we conceive to be these ensuing.

- I. That the Youth of this Realm be carefully educated by able and Religious Schoolmasters, and they to be enjoined to Catechize and instruct their Scholars in their Grounds and Principles of true Religion.

Anno 1625. religion. And whereas by many complaints from divers parts of the Kingdom it doth plainly appear, that sundry Popish Scholars, dissembling their Religion, have craftily crept in, and obtained the places of Teaching in divers Counties, and thereby infected and perverted their Scholars, and so fitted them to be transported to the Popish Seminaries beyond the Seas; that therefore there be great care in choice and admitting Schoolmasters, and that the Ordinaries make diligent enquiries of their Demeanors: and proceed to the removing of such as shall be faulty, or justly suspected.

His Majesties Answer.

'This is well allowed of, and for the better performance of what is desired, Letters shall be written to the two Archbishops, and from them, Letters to go to all the Ordinaries of their several Provinces to see this done; the several Ordinaries to give account of their doings herein to the Archbishops respectively, and they to give account to his Majesty of their proceedings herein.

II. That the ancient Discipline of the Universities be restored, being the famous Nurseries of Literature and Vertue.

Ans. 'This is approved by his Majesty, and the Chancellor of each University shall be required to cause due execution of it.

III. That special care be taken to enlarge the Word of God throughout all the parts of your Majesties Dominions, as being the most powerful means for planting of true Religion, and rooting out of the contrary: To which end, among other things, let it please your Majesty to advise your Bishops, by fatherly entreaty, and tender usage, to reduce to the peaceable and orderly Service of the Church, such able Ministers as have been formerly silenced, that there may be a profitable use of their Ministry in these needful and dangerous times; And that Non-residencies, Pluralities and Commendams may be moderated. Where we cannot forbear most humbly to thank your Majesty for diminishing the number of your own Chaplains; not doubting of the like Princely care for the well bestowing of the rest of your Benefices, both to the comfort of the People, and the encouragement of the Universities, being full of grave and able Ministers, unfurnished of Livings.

Ans. 'This his Majesty likes well, so as it be applied to such Ministers as are peaceable, orderly, and conformable to the Church-Government. For Pluralities and Non-residencies, they are now so moderated, that the Archbishops affirm, there be now no dispensations for Pluralities granted; nor no man now is allowed above two Benefices, and those not above thirty Miles distant: And for avoiding Non-residence, the Canon in that case provided shall be duly put in execution. For Com-mendams, they shall be sparingly granted, only in such case where the exility and smallness of the Bishoprick requireth. Also his Majesty will cause that the Benefices belonging to him, shall be well bestowed. And for the better propagating of Religion, his Majesty recommendeth to the House of Parliament, that care may be taken, and Provision made, That every Parish shall allow a competent maintenance for an Able Minister; and that the Owners of Parsonages Improprate, would allow to Vicars, Curates and Ministers in Villages and Places belonging to their Parsonage, sufficient Stipend and Allowance for Preaching Ministers.

IV. That there may be strict provision against transporting English Children to the Seminaries beyond the Seas, and for the recalling of them who are already there placed, and for the punishment of such your Subjects as are maintainers of those Seminaries, or of the Scholars; considering that besides the seducing of your people, great Sums of Money are yearly expended upon them, to the impoverishing of this Kingdom.

Ans. 'The Law in this case shall be put in execution: And further, there shall be Letters written to the Lord Treasurer, and also to the Lord Admiral, That all the Ports of this Realm, and the Creeks and Members thereof, be strictly kept, and strait Searches made to this end: A Proclamation shall be to recall both the Children of Noblemen and the Children of any other men, and they to return by a day; also Maintainers of Seminaries of Scholars there, shall be punished according to Law.

V. That no Popish Recusant be permitted to come within the Court, unless your Majesty be pleased to call him upon special occasion, agreeable to the Statute of 3 Jac. And whereas your Majesty for the preventing of apparent mischiefs both to your Majesty and the State, hath in your Princely wisdom taken order, that none of your natural born Subjects; not professing the true Religion, and by Law established, be admitted into the Service of your Royal Consort the Queen. We give your Majesty most humble Thanks, and desire that your Order herein may be observed.

Ans. 'If his Majesty shall find, or be informed of any Concourse of Recusants to the Court, the Law shall be strictly followed: And his Majesty is pleased, that by Proclamation the British and Irish Subjects shall be put in the same case. And as his Majesty hath provided in his Treaty with France, so his purpose is to keep it; That none of his Subjects shall be admitted into his Service, or into the Service of his Royal Consort the Queen, that are Popish Recusants.

VI. That all the Laws now standing in force against Jesuites, Seminary Priests, and others having taken Orders by Authority derived from the See of Rome, be put in execution. And to the intent they may not pretend to be surprized, That a speedy and 1625. and certain Day be prefired by your Majesties Proclamation for their departure out of this Realm, and all other your Dominions, and not to return upon the severest penalties of the Laws now in force against them; And that all your Majesties Subjects may be thereby admonished not to receive, comfort, entertain or conceal any of them, upon the penalties which may be lawfully inflicted: And that all such Papists, Jesuites, and Recusants, who are and shall be imprisoned for Recusancy, or any other cause, may be so strictly restrained, as that none shall have Conference with them, thereby to avoid the Contagion of their corrupt Religion: And that no man that shall be suspected of Popery, be suffered to be a Keeper of any of his Majesties Prisons.

Answ. 'The Law in this case shall be put in execution, and a Proclamation shall be to the effect desired; and such restraint shall be made, as is desired; and no man that is justly suspected of Popery, shall be suffered to be a Keeper of any of his Majesties Prisons.

VII. That your Majesty be pleased to take such Order as to your Princely wisdom shall be expedient, That no natural-born Subject, or strange Bishops, nor any other by Authority from the See of Rome, confer any Ecclesiastical Orders to exercise any Ecclesiastical Function whatsoever, toward or upon your Majesties natural Subjects within your Dominions.

Answ. 'This is fit to be ordered according as is provided; and it shall be so published by Proclamation.

VIII. That your Majesties Learned Council may receive Order and Commandment to consider of all former Grants of Recusants Lands, that such of them may be avoided as are made to the Recusants use or interests out of which the Recusant receiveth any benefit, which are either void, or voidable by the Law.

Answ. The King will give Order to his Learned Council to consider of the Grants, and will do according as is desired.

IX. That your Majesty will be likewise pleased strictly to Command all your Judges and Ministers of Justice Ecclesiastical and Temporal, to see the Laws of this Realm against Popish Recusants, to be duly executed; And namely, that the Censure of Excommunication be declared and certified against them; and that they be not absolved upon publick satisfaction by yielding to Conformity.

Answ. 'His Majesty leaves the Laws to their Course, and will order in the point of Excommunication as is desired.

X. That your Majesty will be pleased to remove from places of Authority and Government all such Persons as are either Popish Recusants, or according to direction of former Acts of State, to be justly suspected.

Answ. 'This his Majesty thinks fit, and will give order for it.

XI. That present Order be taken for disarming all Popish Recusants, legally convicted, or justly suspected, according to the Laws in that behalf, and the Orders taken by his late Majesties Privy Council upon reason of State.

Answ. 'The Laws and Acts in this case shall be followed, and put in due execution.

XII. That your Majesty be also pleased in respect of the great resort of Recusants, to and about London, to Command forthwith upon pain of your indignation, and severe execution of the Laws, that they retire themselves to their several Countreies, there to remain confined within five Miles of their places.

Answ. 'For this the Laws in force shall be forthwith executed.

XIII. And whereas your Majesty hath strictly Commanded and taken Order, that none of the natural born Subjects repair to the hearing of Masses, or other Superstitious Service at the Chappels or Houses of Foreign Ambassadors; or any other places whatsoever; we give your Majesty most humble thanks, and desire, that your Order and Commandment therein may be continued and observed, and that the Offenders herein may be punished according to the Laws.

Answ. 'The King gives Assent thereto, and will see the same observed which herein hath been Commanded by him.

XIV. That all such Insolencies, as any that are Popishly affected, have lately committed, by their hereafter coming to the dissonance of the Religion, or to the wrong of the true Protestants thereof, be severely punished.

Answ. This shall be done as is desired.

XV. That the Statute of 1 Eliz. for the payment of Church rates, every Sunday, by such as shall be absent from Church Service in the Church, without a lawful excuse, may be put in due execution, the other, for that the penalty of Law is given to the Parish, and the same may be enforced by the Justice of the Peace.

Answ. It is his Majesty's pleasure that the Statute be executed, and the Penalties shall not be dispensed withal.

XVI. Lastly, That your Majesty would be pleased to extend your Princely care also over the Kingdom of Ireland, that the like courses may be there taken for the restoring and establishing of the true Religion.

1625.

Answer. His Majesties cares are, and shall be extended over the Kingdom of Ireland; and he will do all that a Religious King should do for the restoring and re-establishing of true Religion there.

And thus (most Gracious Sovereign) according to our Duty and Zeal to God and Religion, to your Majesty and your safety, to the Church and Commonwealth, and their Peace and Prosperity, we have made a faithful Declaration of the present Estate, the Causes and Remedies of this increasing Disease of Popery; humbly offering the same to your Princely Care and Wisdom. The Answer of your Majesties Father, our late Sovereign of famous Memory, upon the like Petition, did give us great comfort of Reformation; but your Majesties most Gracious Promises made in that kind, do give us Confidence and Assurance of the continual performance thereof; In which Comfort and Confidence reposing our selves, we most humbly pray for your Majesties long continuance in all Princely Felicity.

At this time the Duke is commanded by the King to give an Account of the Fleet to both Houses of Parliament; which he then did, by way of Question and Answer, and seemed fully to satisfy the most persons who were not over-prejudiced against him; but there lacked not those in the Lower House, who were his secret and close Enemies, and could at any time conjure up, under the Names of Religion and Grievances, Quarrels, which they managed ever to the Dissolution of the Parliament itself; which was Dissolved on the 12th. of August, by a Commission directed to several Peers; but before this hapned, the Commons agreed on the Declaration following.

VVE the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses of the Commons House of Parliament, being the Representative Body of the whole Commons of this Realm, abundantly comforted in his Majesties late Gracious Answer touching Religion, and his Message for the care of our health, do solemnly protest and bow before God and the World, with one heart and voice, that we are all resolved, and do hereby declare, that we will ever continue most Loyal and Obedient Subjects to our most Gracious Sovereign Lord King Charles; and that we will be ready, in convenient time, and in a Parliamentary way, freely and dutifully to do our utmost endeavours to discover and reform the Abuses and Grievances of the Realm and State, and in like sort to afford all necessary Supply to his most Excellent Majesty, upon his present, and all other his just Occasions and Designs; most humbly beseeching our said Dear and Dread Sovereign, in his Princely Wisdom and Goodness, to rest assured of the true and hearty Affections of his poor Commons, and to esteem the same to be (as we conceive it is indeed) the greatest worldly reputation and security that a just King can have: and to account all such as slanderers of the peoples affections, and enemies to the Commonwealth, that shall dare to say the contrary.

The King notwithstanding the Parliament's Dissolution, carries on the War against the House of Austria, and to that purpose dispatcheth the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland to the Hague, to conclude a League with the United Netherlands against those Princes, and by Proclamation calls home the Children of Recusants, and all English, Scotch or Irish in the Spaniards Service, who before that time took pay under the Emperor and Spaniard: And because Money, the Sinews of War, was wanting, his Majesty proposed to supply those wants by the way of Loan, upon Privy-Seals directed to several persons who were judged best able to lend; which bred matter of Grievance and Complaints in the ensuing Parliaments; and amidst these Preparations for War, the Privy Council issued out warrants for the Disarming of the Popish Recusants, and seizing of their Arms.

The Fleet being now ready, Sir Edw. Cecil, now Viscount Wimbledon was made Commander in Chief for the Expedition to Cadiz, and the Earl of Essex was Vice-Admiral. In the beginning of October they put to Sea, in all 80 Ships, and had on Board 10 Regiments; After 4 days Sail, they were encountred with a great Storm, with which they were dispersed; however they met afterwards all together on the Coast of Spain, and found a Conquest ready, the Spanish Shipping in the Bay of Cadiz, but they neglected the setting upon it; and part of them Land under Sir John Burroughs, who abused themselves with the Wines of that Place, almost to their Ruine, if the Spaniard had had the Courage to have attacked them; so they were presently Shipp'd again, and the General designs to wait for the Spanish Plate-Fleet, which was shortly expected; but Sickness happened amongst the Souldiers, by reason of a general Contagion; and so they were forced to return home in November following, without any honour gained. After their Return, they are commanded not to Disband; and the Trained Bands throughout England are exercised; but the Plague still continuing in London, part of Michaelmas Term was adjourned to Reading in the County of Berks; which was accompanied with a Speech of the Calling of a Parliament; for that Sir Edward Cooke and several other Gentlemen, who had appeared against the Duke in the last Parliament, were pricked Sheriffs. Sir Edw. excepts against the Oath of a Sheriff, for that by it he was sworn to suppress the Lollards in his Bayliwick; these were persons in former times disaffected to the then established Religion; the Oath was by Order of the Council-Board amended in that particular, and he took his Oath as High-Sheriff of the County of Bucks. The Great Seal had been formerly taken from John L. Bishop of Lincoln, and he Sequestred both from that Office, and that of a Privy Counsellor likewise; who continuing at some distance from the D. of Buckingham, the Seal, Oct. 30. is given to Sr. Tho. Coventry at Hampton-Court. The Archbishops in both Provinces are required by his Majesty to proceed against Popish Recusants, by Excommunication and other the Censures of the Church, and they are by Proclamation confined not to stir above 5 miles from their own Houses. His Majesty now declared his purpose for his Coronation on Candlemas day next, at Westminster, and for the greater Solemnity thereof, the Earls of Arundel & Surrey, L. Marshal of Engl. and of Pemb. L. Chamberl. are appointed to perform the Rites and Ceremonies of Creation of the Knights of the Bath. A Proclamation was likewise issued out for all that have 40 l. per An. to come and receive the Order of Knighthood, which was made a matter of Grievance in the ensuing Parliament. On Anno 1625. On Candlemas Day the King was Crowned at Westminster, by Bishop Laud, who had the honour to perform that Solemnity: the Bishop of Lincoln, then Dean of Westminster, being then in Disgrace; The Ceremony was in short thus;

THE King went that day from Westminster-Hall to the Abbey-Church, attended by the Aldermen of London, Eighty Knights of the Bath, in their Robes, the King's Serjeants at Law, Solicitor and Attorney-Generals, the Judges, Barons, Bishops, Viscounts, and such of the Earls (who bore no particular Office that day) in their Parliament-Robes, going two by two before the King all uncovered; and after them followed his Officers of State (being eight Earls and one Marquess) those persons according to their respective Places and Offices, carried the Swords, the Globe, the Scepter, the Crown; and the Lord Mayor of London carried the short Scepter, two Bishops carried, the one the Golden Cup, and the other the Plate for the Communion. Next before his Majesty went the Earl of Arundel, as Earl-Marshal of England, and the Duke of Buckingham, as Lord High Constable of England for that Day. The King being cloathed in White Sattin, went under a rich Canopy, supported by the Barons of the Cinque Ports, the King having on each Hand a Bishop, and his Train of Purple Velvet, was carried up by the Master of the Robes, and the Master of the Wardrobe. At the entring into the Church, Bishop Laud delivered into the Kings Hand the Staff of Edward the Confessor, with which the King walked up to the Throne; then the Archbishop of Canterbury presented his Majesty to the Lords and Commons there present, East, West, North and South; who gave their consent to his Coronation, as their Lawful Sovereign. After Sermon was done, the King went to the Altar (where the Old Crucifix, amongst other Regalia stood; as also the Ointment Consecrated by a Bishop) to take the Coronation-Oath, which (as is said) was performed in this manner, viz.

Archbish.
P.P.

SIR (says the Archbishop) will You grant and keep, and by Your Oath confirm to the People of England, the Laws and Customs to them granted by the Kings of England, Your Lawful and Religious Predecessors, and namely the Laws, Customs, and Franchises, granted to the Clergy, by the Glorious King St. Edward Your Predecessor, according to the Laws of God, the true Profession of the Gospel established in this Kingdom, agreeable to the Prerogative of the Kings thereof, and the Ancient Customs of the Realm?

The Kings
Answer.

I grant and promise to keep them.

Sir, will You keep Peace and Godly Agreement (according to Your Power) both to God, the Holy Church, the Clergy and the People?

I will keep it.

Sir, Will you (to Your Power) cause Law, Justice and Discretion to Perry and Truth, to be executed to Your Judgment?

I will.

Sir, Will You grant to hold and keep the Laws and Rightful Customs which the Commonalty of this Your Kingdom have; and will You defend and uphold them to the Honour of God, so much as in You lieth?

I grant and promise so to do.

Then one of the Bishops read this Passage to the King. 1 Car. 1.

Our Lord and King, we beseech you to Pardon and so Grant, and to Preserve unto us, and to the Churches committed to your Charge, all Canonical Privileges, and do Law and Justice; and that you would Protect and Defend us, as every good King to his Kingdoms ought to be Protector and Defender of the Bishops and Churches under their Government.

The King answereth.

With a willing and devout Heart I promise, and grant my Pardon; and that I will preserve and maintain to you, and the Churches committed to your Charge, all Canonical Privileges, and due Law and Justice; and that I will be your Protector and Defender to my Power, by the Assistance of God, as every good King in his Kingdom in right ought to Protect and Defend the Bishops and Churches under their Government.

Then the King arose, and was led to the Communion-Table, where he takes a Solemn Oath in sight of all the People, to observe all the Premises, and laying his Hand upon the Bible, said,

The Things which I have here promised, I shall perform and keep; So help me God, and the Contents of this Book.

After the Oath, the King was placed in the Chair of Coronation, and was Anointed by the Archbishop with a Costly Ointment, and the Ancient Robes of King Edward the Confessor was put upon him, and the Crown of King Edward was put upon his Head, and his Sword girt about him; and he offered the same, and two Swords more, together with Gold and Silver at the Communion-Table. He was afterwards conducted by the Nobility to the Throne; where this Passage was read to his Majesty.

[Stand and hold fast from henceforth the Place, to which you have been Heir by the Succession of Your Forefathers, being now delivered to You by the Authority of Almighty God, and by the Hands of us, and all the Bishops and Servants of God: And as You see the Clergy to come nearer to the Altar than others, so remember that (in all places convenient) You give them greater Honour, that the Mediator of God and Man may establish You in the Kingly Throne, to be a Mediator between the Clergy and the Laity; and that You may Reign for ever with Jesus Christ, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords.]

Afterwards the Nobility were sworn to be Homagers to the King, and some other Ceremonies were performed; which being done, the Lord Keeper, by the King's Command, read a Writing unto them, which declared the King's free Pardon to all his Subjects who would take the same under the Great Seal.

The Ceremonies of the Coronation being ended, the Regalia were offered at the Altar by Bishop Laud in the King's Name, and then reposit.

On Monday the Sixth of February, a Second Parliament was Convened, and his Majesty being Seated in his Royal Throne, belpake that Assembly by the Lord Keeper. The Speech followeth.

The Lord Keepers Speech.

My Lords,

The Lord
Keepers
Speech.

And you the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses of the House of Commons, you are here Assembled, by his Majesties Writs and Royal Authority to hold a new Parliament, the General, Ancient and Powerful Council of this Renowned Kingdom; whereof if we consider aright, and think of that incomparable distance between the Supreme Height and Majesty of a mighty Monarch, and the submissive Aw and Lowliness of a Loyal Subject, we cannot but receive exceeding comfort and contentment in the frame and constitution of this highest Court; wherein not only the Prelates, Nobles and Grandees, but the Commons of all degrees have their part; and wherein that high Majesty doth descend to admit, or rather to invite the humblest of his Subjects to Conference and Council with him, of the great, weighty and difficult Affairs of the King and Kingdom; a Benefit and Favour whereof we cannot be too sensible and thankful; for sure I am, that all good hearts would be both sensible and sorrowful, if we did want it, and therefore it behoveth all, with united hearts, and minds free from distraction and diversion, to fix their thoughts upon Counsels and Consultations worthy of such an Assembly; remembering, That in it is presented the Majesty and Greatness, the Authority and Power, the Wisdom and Knowledge of this Great and Famous Nation; and it behoveth us to magnifie and bless God, that hath put the power of Assembling Parliaments in the hands of him, the Virtue of whose Person doth strive with the Greatness of his Princely Linage and Descent, whether he should be accounted Major or Melior, a greater King, or a better Man; and of whom you have had so much trial and experience, that he doth as affectionately love, as he doth exactly know and understand the true use of Parliaments; witness his daily and unwearied Access to this House, before his Access to the Crown; his Gracious readiness to all Conferences of Importance; his frequent and effectual Intercession to his Blessed Father of never dying Memory, for the Good of the Kingdom, with so happy success, that both this and future Generations shall feel it, and have cause to rejoyce at the Success of his Majesties Intercession. And when the Royal Diadem descended unto himself, presently in the midst of his Tears and Sighs for the Departure of his most Dear and Royal Father, in the very first Consultation with his Privy Council, was resolved to meet his People in Parliament: And no sooner did the heavy hand of that destroying Angel forbear those deadly strokes, which for some time did make this place inaccessible, but his Majesty presently resolved to recall it, and hath now brought you together, and in a happy time, I trust, to treat and consult with uniform Desires, and united Affections, of those things that concern the general Good.

And now being thus Assembled, his Majesty hath commanded me to let you know, that his Love and Affection to the Publick, moved him to call this Parliament; and looking into the danger and the spreading of that late Mortality, and weighing the multitude of his Majesties pressing occasions, and urging affairs of State, both at home and abroad, much importing the safety and state of this Kingdom; the same affection that moved him to call it, doth forbid him to prolong the Sitting of this Parliament: And therefore his Majesty resolving to confine this Meeting to a short time, hath confined me to a short Errand; and that is, That as a thing most agreeable to the Kingly Office, to the example of the best times, and to the frame of Modern affairs, his Majesty hath called you together to consult and to advise of provident and good Laws, profitable for the publick, and fitting for the present times and actions; for upon such depends the Assurance of Religion and of Justice, which are the surest Pillars and Buttresses of good Government in a Kingdom: For his Majesty doth consider, That the Royal Throne, on which God out of his Mercy to us, hath set him, is the Fountain of all Justice, and that good Laws are the Streams and Quits by which the benefit and use of this Fountain is dispersed to his People; and it is his Majesties care and study, that his People may see with comfort and joy of heart, that this Fountain is not dry, but they and their Posterity may rest assured and confident in his time to receive as ample benefit from this Fountain, by his Majesties Mercy and Justice, as ever Subjects did in the time of the most eminent Princes, amongst his Noble Progenitors; wherein, as his Majesty shews himself most sensible of the Good of the Publick, so were it an injury to this Great and Honourable Assembly, if it should be but doubted, that they shall not be as sensible of any thing that may add to his Majesties Honour; which cannot but receive a high degree of Love and Affection, if his Majesty succeeding so many Religious, Wise and Renowned Princes, should begin his Reign with some Additions unto those good Laws which their Happy and Glorious Times have afforded. And this his Majesty hath caused me to desire at this time, especially above others; for his Majesty having at his Royal Coronation lately Solemnized the Sacred Rites of that Blessed Marriage between his People and him; and therein by a most Holy Oath, vowed the Protection of the Laws, and Maintenance of Peace, both to Church and People, no time can be so fit for his Majesty to advise and consult at large with his People, as at this present time, wherein so lately his Majesty hath vowed Protection to his People, and they have protested their Allegiance and Service to him.

This is the Sum of that Charge which I have received from his Majesty to deliver unto you; wherein you see his Majesties intent to the Publick: And therefore his desire is, That according to that conveniency of Time, which his Affairs may afford, you may apply yourselves to dispatch the business of this Parliament.

Sir Henneage Finch chosen Speaker.

On Wednesday following the Commons chose for their Speaker Sir Henneage Finch, Serjeant at Law, and Recorder of the City of London; whose Excuse of himself being not admitted, he spake as followeth.

Since it hath pleas'd your Majesty not to admit my humble Excuse, but by your Royal Appointment to Crown this Election; after my Heart

Anno 1625. Heart and Hands first lifted up to God, that hath thus inclined your Royal Heart, I do render my humblest thanks to your Majesty, who is pleased to cast so Gracious an eye upon so mean a Subject, and to descend so low as in a service of this importance, to take me into your Princely Thoughts. And since we all stand for Hundreds and Thousands, for Figures and Cyphers, as your Majesty the Supreme and Sovereign Auditor, shall please to place and value us, and like Coyn to pass, are made currant by your Royal stamp and Impression; only I shall neither disable or undervalue my self, but with a faithful and chearful heart, apply my self with the best of my strength and abilities, to the performance of this weighty and publick Charge, wherein as I do and shall to the end, most humbly desire your Gracious acceptance of my good intentions and endeavours: So I could not but gather some confidence to my self, that your Majesty will look favourably upon the works of your own hands. And in truth besides this particular, these publick things which are obvious to every Understanding, are so many Arguments of Comfort and Encouragement where I contemplate and take a view of those inestimable Blessings, which by the goodness of God, we do enjoy under your Majesties most pious and prudent Government.

If we behold the frame and the face of the Government in general, we live under a Monarchy, the best of Governments, the nearest resemblance unto the Divine Majesty which the Earth affords, the most agreeable tonature, and that into which other States and Republicks do easily fall and reverse into the Ocean, and are naturally dissolved as into their Primum Materiam. The Laws, by which we are governed, are above any value my words can set upon them: time hath refined and approved them: they are equal at least to any Laws Humane, and so curiously framed and fitted, that as we live under a temperate climate, so the Laws are temperate, yielding a due observance to the Prerogative Royal, and yet preserving the Right and Liberty of the Subject: That which Tacitus saith of two of the best Emperors, Res olim insociabiles miscuerunt, imperium & libertatem: and so far is this from the least diminution of Sovereigns, that in this your Majesty is truly stiled Pater Patria, and the greatest King in the World, that is King of such and so many Free-born Subjects, whose persons you have not only power over, but, which is above the greatest of Kings, to command their hearts. If time or corruption of manners breed any Mists or Grievance, or discover any defect in the Law, they are soon reformed by Parliament, the greatest Court of Justice, and the greatest Council of the Kingdom, to which all other Courts and Councils are subordinate. Here your Royal person still enthroned in the State of Majesty, attended by a Reverend and Learned Prelacy, a great and full Nobility enthroned like Stars in the Firmament; some of a greater, some of a lesser magnitude, full of light and beauty, and acknowledging to whom they owe their lustre: and by a choice number of worthy Knights and Gentlemen, that represent the whole body of your Commons. But to leave generals: We live not under a Monarchy only the best of Governments, and under a Government the best of Monarchies: but under a King the best of Monarchs, Your Royal Person, and those eminent graces and vertues which are inherent in your Person (in whom Greatness and Goodness contend for Superiority) it were presumption in me to touch, though with never so good a meaning: they will not be bounded within the narrow compass of my Discourse: And such Pictures of such a King are not to be made in Limning but for publick things and actions which the least Eye may see and discern and in them obliquely and by reflection chearfully and with comfort behold your Person. What age shall not record and eternise your Princely magnanimities in that Heroick Action or venturous Journey into Spain, or hazarding your Person to preserve the Kingdom? Fathers will tell it to their Children in succession: After-ages will then think it a Fable. Your piety to the Memory of your dear Father, in following and bedewing his Heric with your tears, is full in every mans memory. The Publick Humiliation when Gods hand lay heavy upon us, and the late Publick Thanksgiving to Almighty God for removing his hand both commanded and performed in person by your Majesty is a work in piety not to be forgotten, and I trust the Lord will remember them and reward them with mercy and blessing to your Majesty and the whole Kingdom. Your love to Justice, and your care in the administration of Justice, we all behold with comfort, and rejoyce to see it; the great Courts of Justice from the highest to the lowest furnished with Judges of that wisdom and gravity, learning and integrity: the Thrones of Kings are established by Justice; and may it establish, and I doubt not but it will establish the Throne of your Majesty in your person, and in your Royal Line to the end of time. But above all, and indeed it is above all as far as Heaven is distant from the Earth, your care and zeal for the advancement of Gods true Religion and Worship, are clearly and fully expressed and do appear both in your Person and by your publick Acts and Edicts. It is true that it is said of Princes, Quod faciunt precipiunt: of your Majesty both are true, and a Proposition made convertible. We have received a most gracious answer from your Majesty to all our late Petitions concerning Religion, seconded with a Publick Declaration under the great Seal, and inrolled in all the Courts of Justice, for your Royal pleasure and Direction to awaken and put life into these Laws by a careful execution, with provision that the penalties be not converted to your private Coffers, and yet the Coffers of the King are not private Coffers, but by your express direction set apart to publick uses, such as concern the immediate Defence of the Kingdom, wherein we all have our share and interest. Your Royal Proclamation hath commanded those Romish Priests and Jesuites to Banishment, those Incendiaries that infect the State of this Church and Commonwealth. Their very entrance into this Kingdom, is, by a just and provident Law, made Treason: their aims being in truth (how specious soever their pretences be) nothing else but to plot and contrive Treason against the State, and to seduce your Natural born Subjects from their true Obedience, nourishing in their posterities Factions and Seditious: Witness those many Treasons and Conspiracies against the person of that glorious Lady, whose memory will never dye: and that horrible matchless Conspiracy, the Powder-Treason, the Master-piece of the Devil. But God that preserved Her, and your Royal Father against all their treacherous Conspiracies, and hath given you a Heart to honour him, will honour and preserve you: Religion will more truly keep your Kingdoms, than the Seas do compass pass them: It is the joy of heart to your Majesties loyal and well affected Subjects, and will ever be the honour of your Regal Diadem, and the Crown of your Crown. The Spanish invasion in Eighty Eight I hope will ever be remembered in England, with thankful acknowledgment to God for so great a deliverance; and I assure my self it is remembered in Spain, but with another mind, a mind of Revenge; they are too constant to their Counsels, to acquit their Resolutions and Purposes that draw on that Attempt. It was long before discovered, and since Printed, not without their liking, That they affect an Universal Monarchy. Videor mihi videre (saith Lipsius of their State) Solem Orientem ab Occidente; a Monster in Nature. And one of their own, speaking of the two great Lights which God had placed in the Firmament, makes the Pope Luminare majus præsidentis urbi & orbi, and the King of Spain, Luminare minus ut subdatur urbi & dominetur per totum orbem: A great Flattery, and a bold and impudent Elusion. But I trust, as God hath put it into the heart of your blessed Father, by the matchless Book of his, written to all Christian Monarchs and Princes (a Work by which he raised a Monument to himself more lasting than Marble) to denounce War to that Adversary of God and Kings, the Pope; so he hath set your Sacred Majesty upon the Throne of your Father, to do as many things worthy to be written, as he had written things worthy to be read: amongst them to restrain that unlimited Pride, and boundless Ambition of Spain, to reduce him to his proper Current and Channel, who under the Title of Catholick King, makes his pretence to more Countries and Kingdoms than his own; and by colour of disguised Treaties he invades the Palatinate, and dispossesseth the Incomparable Lady, your Royal Sister, and the Children of this Kingdom, of their Right, and their Ancient Patrimony and Inheritance, to the discomfort and dishonour of this great and glorious Nation. God in his Mercy soon repair this Breach by your Royal Head; and I assure my self, the Hearts, the Hands, and the Purse of all good Subjects will say Amen.

But I may weary your Majesty, and lose my self, and forget for whom I am Speaker. Custom gives me the Privilege as an humble Suitor on the behalf of the House, to present their few Petitions unto our Majesty.

1. The first, That for our better attending this publick and important Service, our selves and our necessary Attendance may with your Majesties tender allowance, be free both in our Persons and Goods from Arrests and Troubles, according to our Ancient Privileges.

2. The next; That since for the preparing and drawing to conclusion such Propositions as shall be handled in the House, Debate and Dispute will be necessary, and by variety of Opinions, Truth is oftentimes best discerned; your Majesty will likewise according to your Ancient Usage and Privilege, vouchsafe us Liberty and Freedom of Speech, from which, I assure my self, Duty and Loyalty to our Majesty, will never be severed.

3. That when Occasions of moment shall require, your Majesty, upon our humble Suit, and at such times as may best sort with your occasions, will vouchsafe us access to your Royal Person.

4. That the Proceedings of the House may receive a favourable Interpretation at your Gracious Hands, and be free from misconstructions.

The first Work of the Commons was to thank his Majesty for his Gracious Answer to their Petition about Religion; next, they took into consideration the Publick Grievances; as the miscarriage at Cales, Evil Councillors about the King; that an Account ought to be given of the Subsidies and three Fifteens Granted 21 Jac. And they appoint a Committee for Secret Affairs, and another, for the redressing of Grievances; also a Committee was appointed for Religion; for which Mr. Pym reports several erroneous Opinions contained in Mr. Montagues Book before-named; as, that he endeavoured to reconcile England to Rome, &c. and to alienate the King's Affections from his well affected Subjects, were humbly Represented to that House as matter of Impeachment against the said Montague; and accordingly Articles to that purpose were exhibited against him; the Main whereof were, That in his Answer to the G A G, he hath affirmed, That the Church of Rome hath ever remained firm upon the same Foundations of Sacraments and Doctrine instituted by God, and that the Controversies betwixt the Church of England and Rome are of a lesser and inferior nature, of which a man may be ignorant without any danger at all as to his Soul; whereas the 19th. Article of our Church saith, That that Church hath erred, not only in their Living and Matters of Ceremony, but also in Matters of Faith: Likewise, That he the said Montague hath affirmed in the said two Books, That Images may be used for Instruction of the Ignorant, and excitation of Devotion; contrary to the expresse words of the Second Homily against the Peril of Idolatry, which saith, That Images teach no good Lesson, neither of God nor Godliness, but all Error and Wickedness. Moreover, that he there asserts Tutelary Saints and Angels, and that Men once justified may fall from Grace; and sundry other Arminian Points. All which Offences and Errors, being a Dishonour to God, and of evil consequence to the Church and Commonwealth, they pray, That the said Richard Montague may be punished, and that his Book may be suppressed and burnt. About this time the Attorney General did by his Majesties Command direct a Letter to the several Judges in their Circuits to order Proceedings to be made against Recufants.

The Commons proceed in the matter of Grievances, about Ships taken by the French from our Merchants, and likewise ours making Reprisals upon theirs; as likewise, another Grievance, The ill management of the Moneys granted for the Relief of the Palatinate, 21 Jac. for which the several Commissioners were questioned, and gave their several and respective Answers: The King by the Secretary Cooke presseth the Commons for a Supply, which at a Conference of both Houses was likewise done by William Earl of Pembroke, who then represented the state of Affairs to the Commons, and what Confederations were made for the Recovery of the Palatinate: But the Commons decline any Supply, and call for the Report from the Committee to consider of the Cause and Remedies of Evils, wherein they more particularly point at the Duke, and order Notice to be given to him thereof, whilst the Lords consider of the state of the Kingdom; and desire a conference with the Commons thereupon, who decline it; saying, they desire to have in all things a good correspondence with their Lordships in the defence of the Kingdom; but they desire to maintain their own Privileges, and im-immediately proceed in the Debate concerning the Duke; which was a little interrupted by the King's Message and Letter by Sir R. Weston, which were as followeth.

Speaker.

Trusty and Well-beloved, &c.

HAVING assembled the Parliament early in the beginning of the Year, for the more timely help and advice of Our People in Our great and important Affairs; and having of late, not only by Message, but also of Our Self, put Our House of Commons in mind of Our pressing occasions, and of the present estate of Christendom, wherein they have equal interest with Us, as well in respect of their own former engagements, as of the Common Cause; We shall not need to tell them with what care and patience We have in the midst of Our necessities attended their Resolutions; but because their unreasonable slowness may produce at home as ill effects as a Denial, and hazard the whole Estate of things abroad; We have thought fit by you the Speaker to let them know, that, without more loss of time, We look for a full and perfect Answer of what they will give for Our Supply, according to Our expectation and their promises; wherein, as we press for nothing beyond the present state and condition of our Subjects, so we accept no less than is proportionable to the greatness and goodness of the Cause; neither do we press them to a present Resolution in this, with a purpose to precipitate their Counsels, much less to enter upon their Privileges, but to shew, that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the Affairs of Christendom may break in upon us upon the sudden, to our dishonour, and the shame of this Nation. And for the Business at home, we command you to promise them in our Name, that after they have satisfied us in this our reasonable demand, we shall not only continue them together at this time, so long as the season will permit, but call them shortly again to perfect those necessary businesses which shall be now left undone; and now we shall willingly apply fit and seasonable Remedies to such just Grievances which they shall present unto us in a dutiful and mannerly way; without throwing an ill odour upon our present Government, or upon the Government of our late blessed Father. And if there be yet who desire to find fault, we shall think him the wisest reprehendor of errors past, who without reflecting backward, can give us Counsel how to settle the present estate of things, and to provide for the future safety and honour of the Kingdom.

The other particulars of his Message were these.

Sir Richard Weston's Message.

I. That his Majesty's Fleet being returned, and the Victuals spent, the Men must of necessity be discharged, and their Wages paid, or else an assured mutiny will follow, which may be many ways dangerous at this time.

II. That his Majesty hath made ready about forty Ships, to be set forth on a second voyage, to hinder the Enemy, which want only victuals and some Men, which, without present supply of Money, cannot be set forth and kept together.

III. That the Army which is appointed in every Coast, must presently be disbanded, if they be not presently supplied with victuals and clothes.

IV. That if the Companies of Ireland, lately sent thither, be not provided for, instead of defending of that Country, they will prove the Authors of Rebellion.

V. That the season of providing healthful victuals will be past, if this Month be neglected.

And therefore his Majesty commandeth me to tell you, that he desired to know, without further delaying of time, what supply you will give him for these his present occasions, that he may accordingly frame his Course and Counsel.

The Commons Answer hereunto.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

YOUR Majesty's Dutiful and Loyal Subjects, the Commons now Assembled in Parliament, in all humility present unto your Royal wisdom this their Loyal Answer to the Message which your Majesty was pleased, by the Chancellor of your Exchequer, to send unto them, desiring to know, without any further deferring of time, what supply they would give to your Majesty, for your present and extraordinary occasions, that you might accordingly frame your Courses and Counsels: First of all, they most humbly beseech your Majesty to know and rest assured, That no King was ever dearer to his People than your Majesty; no People more zealous to maintain and advance the Honour and Greatness of their King, than they; which, as upon all occasions they shall be ready to express, so especially in the support of that Cause, wherein your Majesty and your Allies are now justly engaged. And because they cannot doubt, but your Majesty in your great wisdom, even out of Justice, and according to the Example of your most famous Predecessors, will be pleased graciously to accept the faithful and necessary information and advice of your Parliament, which can have no end but the service of your Majesty, and safety of your Realm, in discovering the Causes, and proposing the Remedies of these great Evils, which have occasioned your Majesties Wants; and your People's Grief.

They therefore, in confidence and full assurance of Redress therein; do, with one consent, propose (though in former time such Course hath been unused) that they really intend to assist and supply your Majesty in such a way, and so ample a measure, as may make you safe at home, and feared abroad; for the dispatch whereof they will use such diligence, as your Majesties pressing and present occasions shall require.

And his Majesty Replied as followeth,

Mr. Speaker,

THE Answer of the Commons delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and satisfactory Answer, and I thank them for it, and I hope you will, with all expedition, take a course for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good as well as mine; but for your Clause therein, of presenting of Grievances, I take that but for a Parenthesis in your Speech, and not a Condition; and yet, for answer to that part, I will tell you, I will be as willing to hear your Grievances, as my Predecessors have been, so that you will apply your selves to redress Grievances, and not to enquire after Grievances. I must let you know, that I will not allow any of my Servants to be questioned amongst you, much less such as are of eminent Place, and near unto,

The Kings
Reply.

Anno 1626. unto me. The old question was, What shall be done to the Man whom the King will honour? But now it hath been the labour of some, to seek what may be done against him whom the King thinks fit to honour. I see you specially aim at the Duke of Buckingham; I wonder what hath so altered your affections towards him: I do well remember, that in the last Parliament in my Fathers time, when he was the Instrument to break the Treaties, all of you (and yet I cannot say all; for I know some of you are changed, but yet the House of Commons is always the same) did so much honour and respect him, that all the Honour conferred on him was too little; and what he hath done since to alter and change your minds, I wot not; but can assure you, he hath not medled, or done any thing concerning the Publick or Common-Wealth, but by special directions and appointment, and as my Servant, and is so far from gaining or improving his Estate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the same. I would you would hasten for my Supply; or else it will be worse for your selves; for, if any ill happen, I think I shall be the last shall feel it.

Now one Dr. Turner Proposeth certain Queries in the Commons House against the Duke and the Opinions of the Common Lawyers were then desired to know whether that House in their Proceedings against the Duke might make Common Fame a ground for their Proceedings, which was agreed to by that House, but is ill taken by the King, and accordingly Sr. Richard Weston doth acquaint the House with it, however they proceed against him, and particularly Sr. John Elliot spake to this purpose.

Sir John Elliot pursues the argument against the Duke.

WE have had (says he) a representation of great fear, but I hope that shall not darken our understandings. There are but two things considerable in this business: First, the Occasion of our Meeting: and secondly, the present State of our own Countrey. The first of these we all know, and it hath at large been made known unto us, and therefore needeth no dispute. The latter of these we ought to make known, and draw and shew it, as in a Perspective, in this House: For our Wills and Affections were never more clear, more ready as to his Majesty, but perhaps Bau'd and Check'd in our forwardness, by those the King intrusts with the Affairs of the Kingdom. The last Action, was the Kings first Action; and the first Actions and Designs of Kings are of great observance in the eye of the World; for thereon much dependeth the esteem, or disesteem of their future proceedings: And in this Action the King and Kingdom have suffered much dishonour; we are weakned in our strength and safety, and many of our Men and Ships are lost. This great Design was fixed on the Person of the Lord General, who had the whole Command both by Sea and Land: And can this great General think it sufficient to put in his Deputy, and stay at home? Count Mansfield's Actions were so miserable, and the going out of those men so ill managed, as we are scarce able to say they went out. That handful of Men sent to the Palatinate, and not seconded, what a loss was it to all Germany? We know well who had then the King's ear. I could speak of the Action of Algier, but I will not look so far backward. Are not Honours now sold, and made despicable? Are not Judicial places sold? and do not they then sell Justice again? Vendere jure potest, emerat ille prius. Tully, in an Oration against Verres, Notes, That the Nations were Suitors to the Senate of Rome, that the Law, De pecuniis repetundis, might be recalled: Which seems strange, that those that were suitors for the Law, should seek again to repeal it; but the reason was, It was perverted to their ill. So it is now with us; besides inferiour and subordinate persons that must have Gratuities, they must now feed their great Patrons.

I shall to our present case cite two Presidents. The first is 16. H. 3. the Treasure was then much exhausted, many Disorders complained on, the King wronged by some Ministers; many Subsidies were then demanded in Parliament, but they were denied: And then the Lords and Commons joyned to desire the King, to re-assume the Lands which were improvidently granted, and to examine his great Officers, and the Causes of those Evils which the People then suffered. This was yielded unto by the King, and Hugo de Burgo was found faulty, and was displaced; and then the Commons, in the same Parliament, gave Supply. The second President was in the tenth year of Richard the Second: Then the times were such, and places so changeable, that any great Officer could hardly sit to be warmed in his place: Then also Moneys had been formerly given, and Supply was at that Parliament required; the Commons denied Supply, and complained, that their Moneys were misemployed; That the Earl of Suffolk then overruled all; and so their Answer was, They could not give: And they petitioned the King, that a Commission might be granted, and that the Earl of Suffolk might be examined. A Commission, at their request, was awarded, and that Commission recites all the Evils then complained of; and that the King, upon the Petition of the Lords and Commons, had granted that Examination should be taken of the Crown-Lands which were sold, of the ordering of his Household, and the Disposition of the Jewels of his Grandfather and Father. I hear nothing said in this House of our Jewels, nor will I speak of them; but I could wish they were within these Walls. We are now in the same case with those former times; we suffer alike, or worse: And therefore unless we seek redress of these great Evils, we shall find disability in the Wills of the People to grant. I wish therefore, that we may hold a dutiful pursuance in preparing and presenting our Grievances. For the Three Subsidies and Three Fifteens which are proposed, I hold the proportion will not suit with what we would give; but yet I know it is all we are able to do, or can give; and yet this is not to be the stint of our affections, but to come again, to give more upon just occasions.

However they minded the Kings Supply, and Voted Three Subsidies, and Three Fifteens, but proceed in the Debate against the Duke; upon which they are Commanded to Attend the King the Morrow after at Nine of the Clock in the Banqueting House in Whitehall, when the King spake to them as followeth.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Have called you hither to day, I mean both The Houses of Parliament; but it is for several distinct reasons: My Lords, you of the Upper House

1 Car. 2.

The King's Speech March

Anno 1626.
House, to give you thanks for the care of the State of the Kingdom now; and not only for the care of your own Proceedings, but inciting your Fellow-House of the Commons to take that into their consideration. Therefore (my Lords) I must not only give you thanks, but I must also avow, That if this Parliament do not redound to the good of this Kingdom, (which I pray God it may) it is not your faults. And you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, I am sorry that I may not justly give the same thanks to you; but that I must tell you, that I am come here to shew you your errors, and, as I may call it, Unparliamentary proceedings in this Parliament. But I do not despair, because you shall see your faults so clearly by the Lord Keeper, that you may so amend your proceeding, that this Parliament shall end comfortably and happily, though at the beginning it hath had some Rubs.

And his Majesty Commanded the Lord Keeper to proceed, which he did, and said.

The Lord
Keeper's
Speech.

MY Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons: You are here Assembled by his Majesty's Commandment, to receive a Declaration of his Royal Pleasure; which although it be intended only to the House of Commons, yet his Majesty hath thought meet, the matter being of great Weight and Importance, it should be delivered in the presence of both Houses, and both Houses make one General Council: And his Majesty is willing that the Lords should be Witnesses of the Honour and Justice of his Resolutions. And therefore the Errand which, by his Majesty's direction, I must deliver, hath Relation to the House of Commons. I must address my self therefore to you, Mr. Speaker, and the rest of that House.

And first, his Majesty would have you to understand, That there was never any King more loving to his People, or better Affectioned to the right use of Parliaments, than his Majesty hath Approved himself to be, not only by his long Patience since the sitting down of this Parliament, but by those Mild and Calm Directions which from time to time that House hath received by Message and Letter, and from his Royal mouth; when the irregular humours of some particular persons wrought Diversions and Distractions there, to the Disturbance of those great and weighty Affairs, which the Necessity of the Times, the Honour and Safety of the King and Kingdom, called upon. And therefore his Majesty doth assure you, that when these great Affairs are settled, and that His Majesty hath received satisfaction of his reasonable Demands, he will, as a Just King, hear and answer your just Grievances, which, in a dutiful way, shall be presented unto him; and this his Majesty doth avow.

Next, his Majesty would have you know of a surety, That as never any King was more loving to his people, nor better affectioned to the right use of Parliaments; so never King more Jealous of his Honour, nor more sensible of the Neglect and Contempt of his Royal Rights, which his Majesty will by no means suffer to be violated by any pretended Colour of Parliamentary Liberty; wherein his Majesty doth not forget, that the Parliament is his Council; and therefore ought to have the liberty of a Council; but his Majesty understands the difference betwixt Council and Controlling, and between Liberty and the abuse of Liberty.

This being set down in general, his Majesty hath Commanded me to Relate some particular Passages and Proceedings, whereat he finds himself Aggrieved.

First, Whereas a Seditious Speech was uttered amongst you by Mr. Cook, the House did not, as they ought to do, Censure and Correct him. And when His Majesty, understanding it, did, by a Message by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered to the House, require Justice of you, his Majesty hath since found nothing but protracting and delays. This his Majesty holds not agreeable to the Wisdom and the Duty which he expected from the House of Commons.

Secondly, Whereas Doctor Turner, in a strange Unparliamentary way, without any ground of knowledge in himself, or offering any particular Proof of the House did take upon him to advise the House to enquire upon sundry Articles against the Duke of Buckingham, as he pretended, but in truth to wound the Honour and Government of his Majesty, and of his Renowned Father; and his Majesty, first, by a Message, and after by his own Royal Mouth, did declare, That that course of Enquiry was an Example, which by no way he could suffer, though it were against his meanest Servant, much less against one so near him; and that His Majesty did much wonder at the Foolish Insolency of any man that can think, that his Majesty should be drawn out of any end to offer such a Sacrifice so Unworthy of a King, or a good Master; yet for all this, you have been so far from correcting the Insolency of Turner, that ever since that time, your Committees have walked in the steps of Turner, and proceeded in an Unparliamentary Inquisition, running upon Generals and repeating that whereof you have made Fame the ground-work. Here His Majesty hath cause to be exceeding sensible, that upon every particular, he finds the Honour of his Father Stain'd and Blemish'd, and his own no less; and withal you have manifested a great forwardness rather to pluck out of his Bosom those who are near about him, and whom His Majesty hath cause to affect, than to trust His Majesty with the future Reformation of these things which you seem to aim at: And yet you cannot deny, but His Majesty hath wrought a greater Reformation in matters of Religion, Execution of the Laws, and concerning things of great Importance, than the shortness of his Reign (in which he hath been hindred, partly through Sickness, and the Distraction of things, which we could have wished had been otherwise) could produce.

Concerning the Duke of Buckingham, His Majesty hath Commanded me to tell you, That himself doth better know than any Man Living, the Sincerity of the Duke's Proceedings; with what Cautions of Weight and Discretion he hath been Guided in his Publick Employments from His Majesty and his Blessed Father; what Enemies he hath Procured at Home and Abroad; what Peril of his Person, and Hazard of his Estate he ran into for the Service of His Majesty, and his ever Blessed Father; and how forward he hath been in the Service of this House many times since his Return from Spain. And therefore His Majesty

Anno 1626. Majesty cannot believe, that the aim is at the Duke of Buckingham, but findeth, that these Proceedings do directly wound the Honour and Judgment of himself and of his Father. It is therefore his Majesties express and final commandment, That you yield obedience unto those Directions which you have formerly received, and cease this Unparliamentary Inquisition, and commit unto his Majesties care, and wisdom, and justice, the future reformation of these things which you suppose to be otherwise than they should be: And his Majesty is resolved, that before the end of this Session, he will set such a course, both for the amending of any thing that may be found amiss, and for the settling of his own Estate, as he doubteth not but will give you ample satisfaction and comfort.

Next to this, his Majesty takes notice, That you have suffered the greatest Council of State to be censured and traduced in the House, by men, whose Years and Education cannot attain to that depth: That Foreign businesses have been entertained in the House, to the hinderance and disadvantage of his Majesties Negotiations: That the same year, yea, the first day of his Majesties Inauguration, you suffered his Council, Government, and Servants to be parallel'd with the times of most Exception: That your Committees have presumed to examine the Letters of Secretaries of State, nay, his own: and sent a general Warrant to his Signet-Office, and commanded his Officers, not only to produce and shew the Records, but their Books and private Notes, which they made for his Majesties Service. This his Majesty holds as unsufferable, as it was in former times unusual.

Next I am to speak concerning your supply of Three Subsidies, and Three Fifteens, which you have agreed to tender to his Majesty. You have been made acquainted with the greatness of his Affairs, both at home and abroad, with the strong preparation of the Enemy, with importance of upholding his Allies, strengthening and securing both England and Ireland; besides the encountering and annoying the Enemy by a powerful Fleet at Sea, and the charge of all: This having been calculated unto you, you have professed unto his Majesty, by the mouth of your Speaker, your carefulness to support the Cause wherein his Majesty and his Allies are justly engaged; your unanimous consent and real intention to supply his Majesty in such a measure, as should make him safe at home, and feared abroad; and that in the dispatch hereof you would use such diligence as his Majesties pressing and present occasions did require.

And now his Majesty having erected a proceeding suitable to this engagement, he doth observe, that in Two Days only of Twelve, this business was thought of, and not begun till his Majesty by a Message, put you in mind of it, whilst your Inquisition against his Majesties direction, proceeded Day by Day.

And for the measure of this supply, his Majesty findeth it so far from making himself safe at home, and feared abroad; as contrariwise, it exposeth him both to danger and disesteem; for his Majesty cannot expect, without better help, but that his Allies must presently Disband, and leave him alone to bear the fury of a provoked and powerful Enemy; so as both he and you shall be unsafe at home, and ashamed and despised abroad. And for the manner of the Supply, it is in it self very dishonourable, and full of distrust; for although you have avoided the literal word of a Condition, whereof his Majesty himself did warn you, when he told you of your Parenthesis; yet you have put to it the effect of a Condition, since the Bill is not come into your House, until your Grievances be both preferred and answered. No such thing was in that expression and engagement delivered by your Speaker, from which his Majesty holdeth, that you have receded both in matter and manner, to his great disadvantage and dishonour. And therefore his Majesty commandeth, that you go together, and by Saturday next return your final Answer, what further Supply you will add to this you have already agreed on, and that to be without Condition, either directly or indirectly, for the supply of these great and important Affairs of his Majesty; which, for the reasons formerly made known unto you, can endure no longer delay; and if you shall not by that time resolve on a more ample Supply, his Majesty cannot expect a Supply this way, nor promise you to sit longer together; otherwise if you do it, his Majesty is well content, that you shall sit so long, as the season of the Year will permit; and doth assure you, that the present Addition to your Supply to set forward the work, shall be no hindrance to your speedy access again.

His Majesty hath commanded me to add this, That therein he doth expect your cheerful obedience, which will put a happy issue to this meeting, and will enable his Majesty, not only to a Defensive War, but to employ his Subjects in Forreign Actions, whereby will be added to them both Experience, Safety, and Honour.

Last of all, his Majesty hath commanded me, in explanation of the gracious goodness of his Royal intention, to say unto you, That he doth well know, that there are among you many wise and well tempered men, well affected to the Publick and to his Majesties service; and that those that are willingly faulty, are not many: and for the rest, his Majesty doubteth not but after his gracious admonition, they will, in due time observe and follow the better sort; which if they shall do, his Majesty is most ready to forget whatsoever is past.

Then his Majesty spake again,

I must withall put you in mind a little of times past; you may remember, that in the time of my blessed Father, you did with your Counsel and perswasion, perswade both my Father and me to break off the Treaties; I confess I was your Instrument, for two reasons; One was, the fitness of the time; the other, because I was seconded by so great and worthy a Body, as the whole Body of Parliament: Then there was no body in so great favour with you, as this man whom you seem now to touch, but indeed, my Father's Government and mine. Now that you have all things according to your wishes, and that I am so far engaged, that you think there is no retreat; now you begin to set the Dice, and make your own Game: But I pray you be not deceived, it is not a Parliamentary way, nor it is not a way to deal with a King.

Mr. Cook told you, It was better to be eaten up by a Foreign Enemy, than to be destroyed at home.

Indeed

Anno 1626. Indeed I think it more Honour for a King to be Invaded, and almost destroyed by a Forreign Enemy, than to be despised by his own Subjects.

Remember, that Parliaments are altogether in my power for their Calling, Sitting, and Dissolution; therefore as I find the fruits of them good or evil, they are to continue or not to be: And remember, that if in this time, in stead of mending your Errors, by delay you persist in your Errors, you make them greater, and irreconcilable: Whereas on the other side, if you do go on chearfully to mend them, and look to the distressed State of Christendom, and the Affairs of the Kingdom, as it lieth now by this great Engagement; you will do your selves Honour, you shall Encourage me to go on with Parliaments, and, I hope, all Christendom shall feel the good of it.

Upon these Speeches the Commons House turned themselves into a Grand Committee and ordered their Doors to be Locked, and that no Member go forth, till the House come to a Resolution, concerning some Speeches which fell from His Majesty and the Lord Keeper of which his Majesty having knowledge, Commands the Duke to Explain his Meaning at a Conference of both Houses held in the Painted Chamber, which accordingly the Duke did and farther Addressed himself to them on his own Behalf, which likewise is continued by the Lord Conway. Who gives in at that time an Account of the Disbursement of the Moneys Granted for the carrying on of the War; However the Commons still proceed in these matters, which they call'd Grievances, and the Peers in that mean while both Spiritual and Temporal Address to his Majesty by the way of Petition against the Precedency of Scotch and Irish Nobility as followeth.

The Duke, at a Conference, explains the King's late Speech, and the Lord Keeper's Declaration.

Whereas it is objected by some, who wish good Correspondency betwixt the King and People, that to Prefix a day to give or to break, was an unusual thing, and might express an inclination to the King to break; to remove this, as his Majesty was free from such thoughts, he hath descended to make his Explanation.

That as his Majesty would not have you condition with him directly or indirectly, so he will not lie to a day, for giving further Supply; but it was the pressing occasion of Christendom that made him to pitch upon a day.

His Majesty hath here a Servant of the King of Denmark, and another from the Duke of Weymer, and yesterday received a Letter from his Sister the Queen of Bohemia; who signified, that the King of Denmark hath sent an Ambassador, with Power to perfect the Contract which was made at the Hague; so it was not the King, but time, and the things themselves that pressed a time.

Therefore His Majesty is pleased to give longer time, hoping you will not give him cause to put you in mind of it again; so that you have a greater Latitude, if the business require to think further of it.

I am Commanded further to tell you, that if his Majesty should accept of a less sum than will suffice, it will deceive your expectation, disappoint his Allies, and Consume the Treasure of the Kingdom: whereas if you give largely now, the business being at the Crisis, it comes so seasonably, it may give a Turn to the Affairs of Christendom.

But while we delay and suffer the time to pass, others abroad will take advantage of it, as the King of Spain hath done, by concluding a Peace, as 'tis thought, in Italy, for the Valteline, where by our work is become the greater, because there can be no diversion that way.

As it was a good rule to fear all things and nothing, and to be Liberal was sometimes to be Thrifty; so in this particular, if you give largely, you shall carry the War to the Enemy's door, and keep that Peace at home that hath been: Whereas, on the contrary, if you draw the War at home, it brings with it nothing but disturbance and fear, all courses of Justice stopt, and each mans Revenue lessened, and nothing that can be profitable.

Another Explanation I am Commanded to make, touching the Grievances; wherein His Majesty means no way to Interrupt your Proceedings, but hopes you will proceed in the Ancient ways of your Predecessors; and not so much seek faults, as the means to redress them.

I am further Commanded to tell you, That his Majesty intends to Elect a Committee of both Houses, whom he will trust, to take the view of his Estate, the defects of which are not fit for the eyes of a Multitude; and this Committee will be for your ease, and may satisfy you, without casting any ill Odour on his Government, or laying open any weakness that may bring shame upon us abroad. That which is proposed is so little, that when the Payment comes, it will bring him to a worse Estate than now he is in; therefore wishes you to enlarge it, but leaves the Augmentation to your selves; but is sorry, and touch'd in Conscience, that the very burthen should lie on the poorest, who want too much already; yet he will not prescribe, but wish, that you, who were the Abettors and Counsellors of this War, would take a greater part of the burthen to your selves; and any man that can find out that way, shall shew himself best affected, and do the best service to the King and State.

The Duke then speak in Justification of himself.

My Lords and Gentlemen.

YOU were all Witnesses yesterday how good and Gracious a Master I serve; and I shall likewise be glad that you be Witnesses how thankful a heart I have.

And I protest I have a heart as full of Zeal to serve my Master, as any man; and it hath been my study to keep a good Correspondency betwixt the King and his People: and whatever thought hath been entertained of me, I shall not alien my heart from that intention, but shall add Spurs to my Endeavours and Actions, to vindicate my self from ill Opinions.

And however I lie under the Burden of the same, it lies in your hands to make me happy or not; and, for my parr, I wish my heart and actions were known to you all; then I assure my self, you would Resume me to your good Opinions.

When I had, with some hazard, waited on my Master into Spain, it is well known what Testimony I gave of my Religion; and no man that comes to a true and near view of my Actions, can Justly charge me. Let me be Excused, if I give account of this particular, when I should

The Duke renders an account of his Negotiation in the Low-Countries.

Annals of the Reign of

‘speak of the general; for this goes near my Heart, and to dissemble with my Conscience, no ends of Fortune in the World can make me do it: For if I had any ill inclination, I had such offers made me in Spain, as might have tempted me.

‘If I would have been Converted my self, I might have had the Infanta to put in my Master’s Bed; and if my discontent should have risen here, I might have had an Army to have come with me: But I thought the Offer, Foolish, Ridiculous, and Scornful, in that point of Religion.

‘I will now take the boldness to speak a little in the general business; and I call it boldness to speak after one, who did so well the other day: But I had rather suffer in my own particular, than not refresh your Memories with that which is materially needful.

‘I shall not need to reflect so far back as to the beginning of those Counsels which engaged my Master into the War, they are well known; only I will so far touch it, as to say, That the last years preparations were not Voluntary, or out of Wantonness, but out of Necessity.

‘My Master had good Intelligence, that the King of Spain’s eye was maliciously bent this way, which had been pursued accordingly, if the Employment of the Low-Country-Men to the Bay of Todos los Santos had not diverted it.

‘Now for the counsel which was used in sending out the Fleets, I will refer you to the relation of the Lord Conway, who, as well in this as other Resolutions, can tell you, that nothing was carried with single Counsels: And for my self, I know, that in all those Actions, no man can stand up against me, to say, that I ever did go with single Counsels, or made breach of any; but have been an obedient Servant and Minister unto their Resolutions: The proof whereof will appear in a Journal thereof, which my Lord Conway keeps.

‘I confess, all Counsels were not ever as your selves would, nor have wished they should; if you had known them as my Master did, in whom the former Affairs of State had bred such Affections, that the business being altered, they were not to be trusted with the Change.

‘I will now give you an account of all my Negotiations, since my being at Oxford, both at home and abroad; and because there it was charged, that those things were carried with single Counsels, I was more careful to advise the King to have his Council with him in the Country, being to enter into War with an Active King.

‘And for my part, I did diligently wait on the Council, left all Recreations, all personal occasions; studying to serve my Master, and to gain the good Opinion of both Houses. The Council of Woodstock generally advised the going out of the Fleet. And though it were objected, that the Season were not fit, yet the Action shewed the contrary, for they all Arrived in safety. And for what was also objected, that the Provision was not good, experience tells you the contrary; for the preparations were all good in quality and proportion.

‘And if the success were not such as any Honest Man could wish, I hope I shall not be blamed, being not there in person, though I made the greatest suit for it to my Master, that ever I did for any thing: But his Majesty thought my service more useful in the Low-Countries, to comfort his Sister, and to Treat with the Kings of Denmark, Sweden, and the States. 1 Car. 2.

‘And though the success (as I said) of the Fleet, were not answerable to the desires of Honest Men, yet it had these good effects; First, It put our Enemy to great charge in fortifying his Coasts. Secondly, they took so many Ships, as caused many of his Merchants to break, whereby the Army in Flanders suffered much: And lastly, they could carry no Treasure out to Pay their Forces in Flanders.

‘And for Omissions of what more might have been done, I leave that to its proper place and time, and let every Man bear his own burden.

‘From Oxford, the Council went to Southampton, where the States Ambassadors did wait often on the King and Council, and a League Offensive and Defensive betwixt us and them was thought fit to be resolved on, whereof some reasons I will express, but not all. First, they are of our own Religion. Secondly, they are our Neighbours, for situation so useful, as when they are in distress, it is Policy in us to give them Relief; therefore the King thought fit to do it in such manner, as might lay an Obligation on them; which if it had not been done, they had been pressed with a long War, and such a Faction among themselves, as if the King had not joyned, and, in a manner, appeared their Protector, they had broke among themselves. And in this the King’s care was not only of them, but of all Christendome, and of his own particular.

‘For, as before he only assisted them, his Majesty’s care now used Arguments to draw them to Contribution; so that they bear the Fourth part of the Charge of the War at Sea, according to such Conditions as by the Lord Chamberlain you have heard.

‘This League being perfected between the States and us, his Majesty, by Advice of his Council, thought fit to send me to get such a League with the other Princes as I could: The Rendezvous was in the Low-Countries, being in a manner the Centre for repair for England, France, and Germany; I had Latitude of Commission to make the League with most advantage I could.

‘Now I had discovered from Monsieur B. the French Ambassador here that a League Offensive and Defensive would be refused; and I found the King of Denmark shie, and loath to enter into such a League against the King of Spain; and so partly out of Necessity, and partly out of reason of State, I was forced to conclude the League in general terms for the restoring of the Liberty of Germany without naming the King of Spain, or the Emperor, that other Princes might come in; and this to continue till every one had satisfaction, and nothing to be Treated of, Debated, or Concluded on, but by consent of all Parties. It did appear, that the Charge was so great, that the Kingdom could not endure it; and therefore I endeavoured in the Low-Countries to lessen it, and so the Sea charge was helped, and the Land Assistance given unto them, is to cease six Months hence, which the Lord Conway said was to end in September next.

‘Also by this Treaty it is conditioned with the King of Denmark, That when my Master shall

Anno
1626. shall by Diversion equal to this Contribution with his own Subjects, enter into Action, then his Charge to cease: Or if the King of France may be drawn in, of which there is great hope (though he hath now made peace in Italy) for that the Policy of France may not give way unto the greatness of the House of Austria, and ambition of Spain, whose Dominions do grasp him in on every side. And if the business be well carried, his engagement to the King of Denmark may draw him in; so there is great possibility of easing our Charge.

But all is in the discreet taking of the time; for if not, we may think the King of Denmark will take hold of those fair Conditions which are each Day offered him; and then the Enemies Army will fall upon the River of Elbe, (and the Lord Conway added) upon East Friezland, from whence they would make such progress, as (in my poor experience) would ruine the Low-Countries.

And thus I think I have satisfied all of you, or at least given an account of my Negotiation in the Low-Countries, with the King of Denmark, Sweden, and the rest.

I should be glad before I end, to say somewhat of my self, but I shall request your favourable construction, for I have been too long already; but I fear I shall offend, and therefore I will restrain my self to generals.

If in any of these employments, my Errors may be shewed me, I shall take him for my best Friend that will manifest them in particular. I have bent all my thoughts on nothing but my Masters Honour, the Service of the State, and Safety of them both. I never had any end of mine own, and that may be perceived and proved by the expence of mine own estate. I am ashamed to speak it, and it would become another Mans Tongue better than mine own.

My Journey into Spain was all at my own charge; my Journey into France, was at my Masters charge; my Journey into the Low-Countries was all at my own charge.

I am accused by Common Fame, to be the cause of the loss of the Narrow Seas, and the damage there sustained. That I can say, is this, since the War begun with Spain, I have always had Twelve Ships on the Coasts, and allowance but for Four, the rest my own care supplied. And for the Office of Admiral, when I came first to it, I found the Navy weak, not neglected by my Noble Predecessor (for I cannot speak of him, but with honour; and I shall desire to go to my Grave with the honour he carried hence) but the not paying of Monies in time, there were such defects his care could not prevent; that if the War had then broken out, there would have been found few Ships, and those unserviceable. I was first perswaded to take this Office by perswasion of Sir Robert Mansel, and though I objected I was young, and unexperienced, yet he said that by my favour with my Master, I might do more good in procuring payment for that charge; And because I was young and unexperienced, I took advice, as I do in all things, and am not ashamed of it. I desired my Master to grant as it were a Commission over me. I have found a great Debt, the Ships defective, and few in number, the yearly charge of Fifty four thousand pounds, which was brought to Thirty thousand pounds per annum, we built every Year two Ships, and when so many were built as were requisite, we brought it to Two and twenty thousand pounds per annum, which comes not to my hands, but goes into its proper streams, and issues from the Officers to that purpose deput-ted.

Now if any can shew me a project, how to maintain a War against Spain, Flanders, and the Turkish Pirates with less charge, he will do a great work and good service: I have had sometimes Twenty, sometimes Thirty Ships, though sometime disasted by Tempest, which dispersed the Hollanders Ships, and caused them to cut their Masts, and forsake Ancors.

There are now Twelve Ships victualled for Two Months; and though many Reports have been, that they do not do their duty, yet I have advertised them thereof from time to time, and find no such fault in them.

There are Thirty Ships more at Plymouth, Victualled for Six Months, and Ten more ready, so soon as they may be Victualled: I have been so frugal of making use of the old remain, that there is no need of Ammunition, or other necessities.

Besides all these, there are Twenty Ships to come from the Low-Countries; so you have Twelve, Twenty, Thirty, and Ten more, which I think you have not heard of.

And therefore if any have blamed me, I do not blame him, but think he hath done well; but when you know the truth, and when all this shall appear, I hope I shall stand right in your Opinions.

Gentlemen, It is no time to pick Quarrels one with another; we have Enemies enough already, and therefore more necessary to be well united at home.

Follow not Examples, at least not ill Examples of Gondemar and Inojosa, who would have had my Head, when you thought me worthy of a Salute. Now though I confess there may be some Errors, I will not justify my self; yet they are not such gross defects, as the World would make them appear. I desire they may be admitted Cum Nota.

They are no Errors of wilfulness, nor of Corruption, nor Oppressing of the People, nor Injustice, but contrary; and then may I say, For what good done by me do I suffer?

And now I might answer more particulars, but I have been long, and so will forbear; and will conclude, if your Supply answer not your Promises and Engagements to my Master; you will make this place which hath been in Peace when others were in War, the Seat of War when others are in Peace.

Now Gentlemen, you that were Antient Parliament men when this Council was first given, strive to make good your own Engagement, for the honour of your King, and your own safety. Let Religion, in which I would be more watchful and industrious than any, unite your hearts both at home and abroad; and you that are young men, may in these active times gain honour and reputation, which is almost sunk, and gain the Ancient Glory of your Predecessors: and remember it is for restoring to her Inheritance, the most vertuous Lady I think in the World.

I have nothing more but to entreat your charitable Opinion of me, and my Actions.

And for his further vindication the Lord Conway said,

That

Annals of the Reign of

Anno 1626.

The Lord
Conway
vindicates
the Duke.

That whereas divers Jealousies have been raised in the House, that the Moneys have been expended unusefully and without Council; himself, who was the only Secretary, and had the hand in guiding the Business, could best give an Account of it.

When King James of Glorious Memory, at the Request of both Houses, had broken both the Treaties, he considered how to maintain the War: for he saw that the King of Spain was awaked, and that the Palatinate must be got by the Sword, and that Spain would oppose it with all the power they could; and computing the Charges, found the Subsidies granted too short; for that it could not be done without an Army of five and twenty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, which would amount to Six hundred thousand pounds for the Armies yearly, and Three hundred thousand pounds for the Navy; but finding all his Means short, and as the Proverb is, Not knowing of what Wood to make his Arrows to hit the Mark wishal, Count Mansfield stirred up by his own Judgment, came over, and made Overture, That for twenty thousand pounds a Month he would raise an Army of Thirty thousand men, and draw in the French King, Denmark, Sweden, Venice, Savoy, the Cantons of the Switzers perhaps, and some other German Princes, and raise a War in Alsatia, of great consequence to make a Division.

Now about this time the Council of Austria resolved to call a Diet, and exclude the Count Palatine, and put in a Popish Elector; and for that end offered a General Peace in Germany, and so left not a Crevice to look into for Assistance; but if any of them should aid the Count Palatine, he should be out of the Peace.

The King accepts Mansfield's Offer, conditionally that he drew in the French King: So Mansfield went over into France, and the King, by Advice of his Council, sent Ambassadors into France, Denmark, Venice, Savoy, and the Cantons of the Switzers, from whom he received cold Answers; for King James had stood so long on Terms of Peace, as they doubted he would not be brought to enter into a War. But Count Mansfield procured the King of France to contract to receive our Troops, with promise to enter into the War, upon condition it might be regulated by the Council of the French King and England. This Favour to Count Mansfield, That France agreed that his Armies should join with the King's Troops, wrought the Princes of Germany to believe, that the King would enter into a War. Thereupon the Imperialists left their Diet, and sent Tilly to Friesland; and to take up the River of Embden; which if he had obtained, they would have trampled the Low-Countries under foot, and would have become Governors of the Sea.

Upon this, the King of Denmark sent to our King, and offered to raise an Army of thirty thousand men, if our King would allow Thirty thousand pounds a Month, and said, he would admit no time of Respite; for if Tilly had not been presently met and headed, all had been lost. Whereupon our King called a Council, and appointed Commissioners; and from that time all the Warrants for the issuing of the Moneys, were all under the Kings own hand to the Council of War, and from them to the Treasurers; and the Warrants were from the Lords of the Council for the Levying of Men, and for Coats and Conduct-Money. A List whereof is hereunder specified.

Thereupon, the Duke asked the Question, whether any thing was done by single Council?

To which the Lord Conway answered, No; For the Treaty of Denmark, Project of Count Mansfield's Treaties with France, and the Business of Navy, were done all by the King himself; and who can say it was done by single Council, when King James commanded it, whose Council every man ought to Reverence, especially in Matters of War, whereunto that King was not hasty?

During these Heats in the Commons House, the Lords Present a Grievance relating to their own Order, to His Majesty, by Petition; as followeth:

Anno
1626. To the Kings Most Excellent Majesty.

The Petition of your ever Loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal now in Parliament Assembled,

In all Humility sheweth,

The Lords
Petition touching preceden-cy, challenged by Scots and Irish Nobles.

That whereas the Peers and Nobility of this your Kingdom of England, have heretofore in Civility yielded as to strangers Precedency, according to their several degrees, unto such Nobles of Scotland and Ireland, as being in Titles above them, have resorted hither. Now divers of the natural born Subjects of those Kingdoms resident here with their families, and having their chief Estates among us, do by reason of some late created Dignities in those Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, claim Precedency of the Peers of this Realm, which tends both to the Disservice of your Majesty, and these Realms, and to the great Disparagement of the English Nobility, as by these Reasons may appear.

I. It is a Nobility without President, that men should inherit Honours, where they possess nothing else.

II. It is Injurious to those Countries from whence their Titles are derived, that they should have a Vote in Parliament, where they have not a foot of Land.

III. It is a Grievance to the Countrey where they inhabit, that men possessing very large fortunes and Estates, should by reason of foreign Titles, be exempted from those Services of Trust and Charge, which through their default become greater pressures upon others who bear the burden.

IV. It is a shame to Nobility, that Persons dignified with the Titles of Barons, Viscounts, &c. should be obnoxious and exposed to Arrest, they being in the view of the Law no more than meet Plebeians.

We therefore humbly beseech your Majesty, that you will be pleased according to the examples of the best Princes and Times, upon consideration of these Inconveniencies represented to your Majesty, by the nearest Body of Honour to your Majesty, that some course may be taken, and an Order timely settled therein by your Princely Wisdom, so as the Inconvenience to your Majesty may be prevented, and the prejudice and disparagement of the Peers and Nobility of this Kingdom be repealed. 1 Car. 2.

About which the King acquainted the Peers;
that he would take Order therein.

The Commons Address to His Majesty about the Duke, and the Proceedings of the House concerning him; and likewise about Mr. Cooke's Mifs-becoming Words in their House.

That with extream Joy and Comfort we acknowledge the Favour of His Majesties most Gracious Expressions of Affection to his People, and this present Parliament.

That concerning Mr Cooke, true it is, he let fall some few Words which might admit of an ill construction; and that the House was displeased therewith, as they declared by a general Check; and though Mr. Cookes explanation of his Mind more clearly, did somewhat abate the Offence of the House, yet were they resolved to take it into further consideration; and so have done; the effect whereof had appeared ere this, had they not been interrupted by this his Majesties Message: and the like interruption befell them also in the Business of Dr. Turner.

As concerning the Examination of the Letters of his Secretary of State, as also of his Majesties own, and searching the Signet-Office, and other Records, they had done nothing therein, not warranted by the Precedents of former Parliaments upon the like occasions.

That concerning the Duke, they did humbly beseech his Majesty to be Informed, That it hath been the constant and undoubted usage of Parliaments, to question and complain of any Person of what degree soever; and what they should do in relation to him, they little doubted but it should redound to the Honour of the Crown, and Safety of the Kingdom.

Lastly, as to the Matter of Supply; That if Addition may be made of other things importing his Service then in consultation amongst them; they were resolved so to supply him, as might evidence the Truth of their Intentions, might make him safe at home, and formidable abroad,

The Earl of Bristol being committed to the Tower ever since his Return from his Embassy from Spain, now petitions the Lords, That he being a Peer of the Realm, and having not received his Writ of Summons to Parliament, might now enjoy the Priviledge of his Peerage, and be tried by the Parliament concerning the Crimes objected to him, as followeth;

The

Anno 1626.

The Humble Petition of John Earl of Bristol.

Humbly shewing unto your Lordships,

The Earl of Bristol petitions the House of Lords upon receipt of his Writ.

That he hath lately received his Writ of Parliament, for which he returneth unto your Lordships most humble thanks, but jointly with it a Letter from my Lord Keeper, commanding him in his Majesties Name, to forbear his personal attendance; and although he shall ever obey the least intimation of his Majesties pleasure, yet he most humbly offereth unto your Lordships wise considerations, as too high a point for him, how far this may trench upon the Liberty and Safety of the Peers, and the Authority of their Letters Patents, to be in this sort discharged by a Letter missive of any Subject, without the Kings Hand: and for your Lordships due information, he hath annexed a Copy of the said Lord Keeper's Letter, and his Answer thereunto.

He further humbly petitioneth your Lordships, That having been, for the space of two years, highly wronged in point of his Liberty, and of his Honour, by many sinister aspersions which have been cast upon him, without being permitted to answer for himself; which hath been done by the power and industry of the Duke of Buckingham, to keep him from the presence of his Majesty and the Parliament, lest he should discover many Crimes concerning the said Duke.

He therefore most humbly beseecheth, That he may be heard both in the point of his wrong, and of his Accusation of the said Duke; wherein he will make it appear, how infinitely the said Duke hath both abused their Majesties, the State, and both the Houses of Parliament. And this he is most confident will not be denied, since the Court of Parliament never refuseth to hear the poorest Subject seeking for Redress of wrongs, nor the Accusation against any, be he never so powerful: And herein he beseecheth your Lordships to mediate to his Majesty, for the Suppliant's coming to the House, in such manner as you shall think fitting; assuring his Majesty, That all he shall say, shall not only tend to the Service of his Majesty, and the State, but highly to the Honour of his Majesties Royal Person, and of his Princely Attributes: And your Suppliant shall ever pray for your Lordships Prosperity.

This Petition is referr'd to the Committee of Privileges, who make Report, That 'tis the Opinion of that Committee, That his Majesty be humbly desired by that House, that the said Earl may have his Writ of Summons, and all other the Peers also absent, who had no Summons: which his Majesty Granted; and acquainted the House therewith, by the Duke.

Upon Bristol's receiving of his Writ, he Petitions the House of Peers again, that he may be heard in his Accusation of the Duke; which is taken by his Majesty in evil part; and concerning which the Lord Keeper delivers this following Message from his Majesty to this House.

1 Car. 2.

That his Majesty hath heard of a Petition preferr'd unto this House by the Earl of Bristol, so void of Duty and Respects to his Majesty, that he hath great cause to punish him: That he hath also heard with what Duty and Respectfulness to his Majesty their Lordships have proceeded therein; which his Majesty conceiveth to have been upon the knowledge they have, that he hath been restrained for Matters of State; and his Majesty doth therefore give their Lordships Thanks for the same, and is resolved to put the Cause upon the Honour and Justice of their Lordships and this House. And thereupon his Majesty commanded him (the Lord Keeper) to signify to their Lordships his Royal pleasure; That the Earl of Bristol be sent for as a Delinquent, to answer in this House his Offences, committed in his Negotiations before his Majesties being in Spain, and his Offences since his Majesties coming from Spain, and his Scandalizing the Duke of Buckingham immediately, and his Majesty by reflection; with whose privacy, and by whose directions the Duke did guide his Actions, and without which, he did nothing. All which his Majesty will cause to be charged against him before their Lordships in this House.

A Message from the King to the House
of Lords.

The Lords attend the King by a Committee of their House, and present their humble Thanks to his Majesty for the Trust and Confidence he had placed in the Honour and Justice of their House.

In the House of Commons the Marshal of Middlesex gave in a Petition, for that he was resisted in the Clink-Prison in the County of Surrey, in his apprehending of several Popish Priests, whose Names were, Preston, Candon, Warrington and Praton; that he had found there several Cart-loads of Books, and in another Chamber an Altar furnished with Plate, Jewels, Church-Stuff, and many rich Pictures, Wax-Candles, and other such Popish Materials; That he had in executing his Warrant from Sir Edmund Bowyer and Sir George Paul, for their Apprehension; had been grievously threatened with Arrests and Imprisonments; and that once one Harrison, a Messenger was severely Treated, for performing the like Service; that he had lately also by a Warrant from the Lord Conway, searched the Bishops Prison in Maiden-Lane, London, and there found six Priests, and in several Chambers, Altars, and Furniture thereto belonging, as much as three Porters could carry off; all which were in the hands of the Lord Conway; but of these men see further the Account which was given by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; which followeth.

Anno
1626.Archbishop of Canterbury's Letter in behalf of the Priests in the Clink, directed to Master Attorney-General.

Good Mr. Attorney,

I Thank you for acquainting me what was done yesterday at the Clink: But I am of opinion, that if you had curiously enquired upon the Gentleman who gave the information, you should have found him to be a Disciple of the Jesuits; for they do nothing but put tricks on these poor men, who do live more miserable lives, than if they were in the Inquisition in many parts beyond the Seas. By taking the Oath of Allegiance, and writing in defence of it, and opening some points of high consequence, they have so displeased the Pope, that if by any cunning they could catch them, they are sure to be burnt or strangled for it. And once there was a plot to have taken Preston, as he passed the Thames, and to have shipped him into a bigger Vessel, and so to have transported him unto Flanders, there to have made a Martyr of him. In respect of these things, King James always gave his protection to Preston and Warrington, as may be easily shewed. Cannon is an old man, well affected to the Cause, but meddles not with any Factions or Seditions, as far as I can learn. They complain their Books were taken from them, and a Crucifix of Gold, with some other things, which, I hope, are not carried out of the house, but may be restored again unto them; for it is in vain to think, that Priests will be without their Beads or Pictures, Models of their Saints; and it is not improbable, that before a Crucifix they do often say their Prayers.

I leave the things to your best consideration, and hope that this deed of yours, together with my word, will restrain them for giving offence hereafter, if so be that lately they did give any. I heartily commend me unto you, and so rest;

Your very loving Friend,

G. Canterbury.

By this time the Commons had prepared an humble Remonstrance to the King, in answer to his Majesties and the Lord Keeper's Speech.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

The commons Re-mon-strance to the King in answer to his Majesties and the Lord
Keeper's
Speech.

Whereas your Majesty hath been pleased of late, at sundry times, and by several means, to impart unto us your Royal pleasure touching some passages and proceedings in this present Parliament; We do first, with unspeakable joy and comfort, acknowledge your Majesties grace and favour, in that it hath pleased you to cause it to be delivered unto us by the Lord Keeper of your Great Seal in your own Royal Presence, and before both Houses of Parliament, That never King was more loving to his People, nor better affected to the right use of Parliaments; withal professing your most gracious resolution to hear and redress our just Grievances. And with like comfort we acknowledge your Majesties goodness shining at the very entrance of your glorious Reign, in commanding the Execution of the Law established to preserve the true Religion of Almighty God, in whose Service consisteth the happiness of all Kings and Kingdoms.

Car. 2.

Yet let it not displease your Majesty, that we also express some sense of just Grief, intermixed with that great Joy, to see the careful proceedings of our sincere Intentions so misrepresented, as to have wrought effects unexpected, and, we hope, undeserved.

First, touching the Charge against us in the matter concerning Mr. Cook. We all sincerely protest, That neither the words mentioned in your Majesties Message, nor any other of seditious effect were spoken by him, as hath been resolved by the House without one Negative voice. Howsoever, in a Speech occasionally uttered, he let fall some few words, which might admit an ill construction; whereat the House being displeased at the delivery of them, as was expressed by a general and instant Check, he forthwith so explained himself and his intention, that, for the present, we did forbear to take them into consideration, which since we have done: And the effect thereof had before this appeared, if by importunate business of your Majesties Service we had not been interrupted.

The like interruption did also befall us in the Case of Doctor Turner; wherein the Question being formerly stated, a Resolution was ordered to have been taken that very day, on which we received your Majesties Command to attend you.

But for our own proceedings, We humbly beseech your Majesty to be truly informed, That before that Overture from Doctor Turner, (out of our great and necessary care for your Honour and Welfare of your Realm) we had taken into serious consideration the Evils which now afflict your People, and the Causes of them, that we might apply our selves unto the fittest Remedies: In the pursuit whereof, our Committees (whatsoever they might have done) have in no particular proceeded otherwise, than either upon ground of knowledge in themselves, or proof by examination of Witnesses, or other Evidence. In which course of service for the publick good, as we have not swerved from the Parliamentary ways of our Predecessors; so we conceive that the discovery and reforming of Errors, is so far from laying an aspersion upon the present time and Government, that it is rather a great honour and happiness in both, yielding matter to great Princes, wherein to exercise and illustrate their noblest virtues.

And although the grievous complaints of the Merchants from all parts, together with the common service of the Subjects well affected to those who profess our Religion, gave us occasion to debate some businesses that were partly foreign, and had relation to Affairs of State; yet we beseech your Majesty to rest assured, it was exceeding far from our intention, either to traduce your Counsellors, or disadvantage your Negotiations.

And though some examples of great and potent Ministers of Princes, heretofore questioned in Parliament, have been alledged, yet was it without paralleling your Majesties Government or Councils, to any Times at all, much less to Times of Exception.

Touching the Letter of your Majesties Secretary, it was first alledged by your Advocate

Anno

vocate for his own Justification, and after by direction of the Committee produced to make good his Allegation.

And for the search at the Signet Office, the Copy of a Letter being divulged as in your Majesties Name, with pregnant cause of suspicion, both in the Body and Direction thereof, to be supposititious, the Committee out of desire to be cleared therein, did by their Order send some of themselves to the Signet Office, to search whether there were any Records of Letters of that nature, without our Warrant to the Officer for any, much less for a general search.

But touching pulick Records, we have not forborn as often as our businesses have required, to make search into them, wherein we have done nothing unwarranted by the Laws of your Realm, and the constant usage of Parliaments. And if for the ease of their Labours, any of our Committees have desired the help of the Officers, Repertories, or Deputies of Direction, we conceive it is no more than any Subject in his own affairs might have obtained for ordinary fees.

Now concerning your Majesties Servants, and namelp, the Duke of Buckingham, we humbly beseech your Majesty to be informed by us your faithful Commons, who can have no private end but your Majesties Service, and the good of your Country, That it hath ben the ancient, constant, and undoubted Right and Usage of Parliaments, to question and complain of all persons of what degree soever, found grievous to the Commonwealth, in abusing the power and trust committed to them by their Sovereign. A course approved not only by the examples in your Fathers days of famous memory, but by frequent precedents in the best and most glorious Reigns of your Noble Progenitors, appearing both in Records and Histories: without which liberty in Parliament, no private man, no servant to a King, perhaps no Counsellor, without exposing himself to the hazard of great enmity and prejudice, can be a means to call great Officers into question for their misdemeanours, but the Commonwealth might languish under their pressures without redress: and whatsoever we shall do accordingly in this Parliament, we doubt not but it shall rebound to the honour of the Crown, and welfare of your Subjects.

Lastly, We most humbly beseech your Majesty graciously to conceive, that though it hath ben the long Custom of Parliaments to handle the matter of Supply with the last of their businesses, yet at this time, out of extraordinary respect to your person, and care of your Affairs, we have taken the same into more speedy consideration, and most happily on the very day of your Majesties Inauguration, with great alacrity and unanimous consent, after a short Debate, we grew to the Resolution for a present Supply well-known to your Majesty.

To which, if Addition may be made of other great things for your Service, yet in consultation amongst us, we doubt not but it will appear, That we have not receded from the truth of our first Intention, so to supply you, as may make you safe at home, and feared abroad: especially if your Majesty shall be pleased to look upon the way intended in our promise, as well as to the measure of the gift agreed.

With like humility we beseech your Majesty not to give ear to the officious reports of private persons for their own ends, which hath occasioned so much loss of time, nor to judge our proceedings whilst they are in agitation, but to be pleased to expect the issue and conclusion of our labours, which we are confident will manifest and justify to your Majesty the sincerity and loyalty of our hearts, who shall ever place in a high degree of happiness the performing of that duty and service in Parliament, which may most tend to your Majesties honour, and the good of your Kingdom.

Unto this Remonstrance the King said, he could give no present Answer, but desired the House to adjourn for a week, as the Lords had done; and they adjourned accordingly.

Here the Historical Collector speaks of private advice given to the Duke, that he should endeavour to interest the King in the Charge against him, and to excuse several matters transacted relating to the Palatinate and the Rochel Expedition, as to the Duke's misbehaviour therein; but finding no publick writing or other monument of this advice, or rather surmise of that matter, I shall omit to trouble our Reader with it.

At this time the King commanded all the Bishops to attend him; and when they were come before him, being fourteen in number, he reprehended them, That in this time of Parliament they had not made known unto him what might be profitable for the Church, whose cause he was ready to promote. And he laid this Charge upon them, that in the Cause of Bristol and Buckingham, their Consciences being their Guides, they should follow only proofs and not rumors.

The Commons sent again to the Duke by Sir John Epsley, to let him know that they were passing Articles against him, and that they had given the Messengers to take notice thereof out of the Clerks Book, whereof he might take Copy of it, if he pleased; and that they expected his Answer that day before ten of the Clock, if he pleased to send any.

This the Duke signified to the Lords, who did not think fit that he should answer, as appears by the ensuing Report made by Sir John Epsley.

This day his Grace gave us this Answer, (after he had moved the Lords) that he should with great care make all due acknowledgment of your respect and favours in giving him this notice, which though it do invite him to render unto you such a satisfaction that he hopes may acquit and restore to him your good opinion, and might prevent your proceedings, which otherwise by a Parliameptary course are like to follow; Yet according to his Duty, he moved the Lords of the upper House, upon your notice given him: they would by no means, as things now stand, give him leave to answer, in regard he is not ignorant you are presently to enter into consideration of his Majesties Message; and that by a delay therein your own purposes will be in some sort disappointed, and the affairs of Christendom much prejudiced; but for that upon a resolution you have deferred and respited that service until those things depending against him be first determined, he out of fear that his necessary

Anno 1626. fary defence would spin out a great deal of time, which is more precious, is the willinger to obey their Lordships, that so he might hasten without obstacle or interruption given unto him to keep day with his Majesty; and this he doth as he conceives to his own infinite prejudice, knowing how grievous it is to be transmitted as a Grievance by the voice of this House: but he doth profess he will rather hazard the safety of his Fortunes, Reputation, and himself, than to be the least occasion of any that may work disaffection or misunderstanding between the King and his People. And it is his Protestation, that whatsoever interruption is made by his actions, his endeavours shall be as long as he hath any favour with his gracious Master, to take opportunity of doing good Offices to this House, and of rendering all that he can be able for the safety of the State, and the general good of the Commonwealth. And this he saith you may the easier believe, because his Majesty can witness that he hazarded in his Fathers time the loss of the best affection of the best of Masters to obtain for them their desire. In this zeal he was desirous to have appeared unto you ever since the beginning of this Parliament, and in this zeal he doth now present himself unto you. But to return to the main point, he, lest we should be mistaken, gave us occasion, in plain words, to remember you, that it is not he that doth refuse to answer, but the Lords commanded him not to answer, which he the chearfullier obeyed, in respect of his fidelity to prefer the Universal Weal before his own particular. And in the meantime he desireth the charitable opinion of this Noble House, until he be convinced that he shall appear not worthy of it, which his own innocency maketh him confident that he shall not.

Whilst the Duke stood ready to be impeacht, his Grace propounded to the Lords of the Council to have it moved to the King, that in regard of the important services by Sea, the usual pay to the Sailers might be raised from Fourteen to Twenty shillings a month, which was as much as they ordinarily received for Merchants wages: The King being therein moved, was consenting. Nevertheless multitudes of the pressed Marriners ran away, leaving his Majesties Ships unfurnished, and his service disappointed.

There was a great Debate in the House of Commons, whether the Committee of Twelve (where Mr. Glanvil had the Chair) shall consider of any new matter not heretofore propounded in the House against the Duke? And it was resolved in the Affirmative.

Mr. Glanvil reports from the Committee the Examination concerning a Plaister and a Posset applied and given to King James in his sickness, when the Kings sworn Physicians had agreed upon other Directions. Hereupon it was resolved, That this should be annexed to the Charge against the Duke, as a transcendent presumption of dangerous consequence.

Hereupon his Majesty sent this Message to the Commons.

The Kings Message touching new matter against the Duke. That he having given way to Enquire about the Duke of Buckingham, and hearing that there is new matter intended to be brought against him, nevertheless leaveth the House to their own way to present the business to him, or to the Lords; withal advising them to consider of the season of the year, and to avoid all loss of time.

Car. 2.

It was Ordered, That thanks should be returned to his Majesty for this message.

On Munday the first of May, the Gentleman-Usher brought the Earl of Bristol to the Bar, according to their Lordships Order; and the Lord-Keeper acquainted him, That the King had commanded his Attorney-General to charge the Earl of Bristol before their Lordships with High-Treason, and other Offences and Misdemeanors of a very high nature, that they might proceed in a legal course against him, according to the Justice and usual proceedings of Parliament.

The Earl of Bristol brought to the Bar of the Lords House.

I. Offences done and committed by the Earl of Bristol before his Majesties going into Spain, when he was Prince.

I. That the said Earl being trusted and employed by the said late King as his Ambassador to Ferdinando, then and now Emperor of Germany; now to Philip the Fourth then and now King of Spain, in Annis 1621. 22. and 23. And having Commission, and particular and special Direction to Treat with the said Emperor and the King of Spain, for the plenary restoring of such parts of the Dominions, Territories, and Possessions of the Count Palatine of Rhine, who married with the most excellent Lady Elizabeth his now Royal Consort, the only Daughter of the said late King James; which were then wrongfully and in hostile manner taken, and possessed with and by the Armies of the said Emperor, and King of Spain, or any other; and for preserving and keeping such other parts thereof as were not then lost, but were then in the protection of the said late King James; and to the use of the said Count Palatine and his Children: And also to treat with the said King of Spain for a Marriage to be had between the most high and excellent Prince Charles, then Prince of Wales, the only Son and Heir apparent of the said King James, and now our most Sovereign Lord, and the most illustrious Lady Donna Maria the Infanta of Spain, Sister to the now King of Spain: He the said Earl, contrary to his Duty and Allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an Ambassador, at Madrid in the Kingdom of Spain, to advance and further the designs of the said King of Spain against our said Sovereign Lord and his Children, Friends and Allies, falsly, willingly, and traiterously, and as a Traitor to our said late Sovereign Lord the King, by sundry Letters and other Messages sent by the said Earl from Madrid, in the years aforesaid, unto King James, and his Ministers of State of England, did confidently and resolutely, inform, advise, and assure the said late King, that the said Emperor and King of Spain would really, fully, and effectually make restitution and plenary restoration to the said Count Palatine and his Children of the said Dominions, Territories, and Possessions of the said Count Palatine, and of the said Electoral Dignity: and that the said King of Spain did really, fully, and effectually intend the said Marriage between the said Lady his Sister, and the said Prince our now Sovereign Lord, according to Articles formerly propounded be-between the said Kings: Whereas in truth, the said Emperor and King of Spain, or either of them, never really intended such restitution as aforesaid, and whereas the said King of Spain never really intended the Marriage according to those Articles propounded, but the said Emperor and the King of Spain intended only by those Treaties to gain time to compass their own ends and purposes, to the detriment of this Kingdom (of all which, the said Earl of Bristol neither was nor could be ignorant,) the said late King James by entertaining those Treaties, and continuing them upon those false Assurances given unto him by the said Earl, as aforesaid, was made secure, and lost the opportunity of time, and thereby the said Dominions, Territories, and Possessions of the said Count Palatine, and the Electoral Dignity become utterly lost; and some parts thereof were taken out of the actual possession of the said King James, unto whose protection and safe keeping they were put, and committed to the said Count Palatine; and the most excellent Lady Elizabeth his Wife, and their Children, are utterly now dispossessed and bereaved thereof, to the high dishonour of our said late Sovereign Lord King James, to the dishonour of the said late Kings Children, and their Posterity, of their ancient Patrimony, and to the disadvantage and discouraging of the rest of the Princes of Germany, and other Kings and Princes in Amity and League with his Majesty.

II. That the said Earl of Bristol being Ambassador for his late Majesty King James, as aforesaid, in Annis supradictis, and having received perfect, plain, and particular Instructions and Directions from his said late Majesty, that he should put the King of Spain to a speedy and punctual Answer, touching the Treaties aforesaid: And the said Earl well understanding the effect of those Instructions and Directions so given unto him, and taking precise knowledge thereof; and also knowing how much it concerned his late Majesty in honour and safety (as his great Affairs then stood) to put these Treaties to a speedy conclusion: Yet nevertheless he the said Earl, falsely, willingly, and traiterously, contrary to his Allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an Ambassador, continued those Treaties upon Generalities, without effectual pressing the said King of Spain unto particular Conclusions, according to his Majesties Directions, as aforesaid; and so the said Earl intended to have continued the said Treaties upon Generalities, and without reducing them to Certainties and to direct Conclusions, to the high dishonour of his said late Majesty, and to the extreme danger and detriment of his Majesties Person, his Crown, and Dominions, Confederates and Allies.

III. That the said Earl of Bristol being Ambassador for his said late Majesty, as aforesaid, in the years aforesaid, to the intent to discourage the said late King James for the taking up of Arms, entering into Hostility with the said King of Spain, and for resisting him and his Forces, from attempting the Invasion of his said late Majesties Dominions, and the Dominions of his said late Majesties Confederates, Friends and Allies; the said King of Spain having long thirsted after an Universal Monarchy in these Western parts of the World, hath many times both by Words and Letters to the said late King and his Ministers, extolled and magnified the greatness and power of the said King of Spain, and represented unto his said late Majesty, the supposed dangers which would ensue unto him, if a War should happen between them; and affirmed and insinuated unto his said late Majesty, That if such a War should ensue, his said late Majesty during the rest of his life, must expect neither to Hunt nor Hawk, nor eat his Meat in quiet: Whereby the said Earl of Bristol did cunningly and traiterously strive to retard the Resolutions of the said late King, to declare himself an enemy to the said King of Spain (who under colour of Treaties and Alliances, had so much abused him) and to resist his Arms and Forces, to the loss of opportunity of time, which can not be recalled or regained, and to the extreme danger, dishonour, and detriment of this Kingdom.

IV. The said Earl of Bristol upon his dispatch out of this Realm of England, in his Ambassage aforesaid, having communication with divers persons of London, within this Realm of England, before his going into Spain, in and about his Ambassage concerning the said Treaty: For the Negotiation whereof, the said Earl purposely was sent; and he the said Earl being then told, that there was little probability that these Treaties would or could have any good success, he the said Earl acknowledged as much; and yet nevertheless, contrary to his Duty and Allegiance, and to the Faith and Truth of an Ambassador, he the said Earl said and affirmed, That he cared not what the success thereof would be; for he would take care to have his Instructions, and pursue them punctually; and howsoever the business went, he would make his Fortune thereby, or used words at that time to such effect; whereby it plainly appeareth, That the said Earl, from the beginning herein, intended not the Service or Honour of his late Majesty, but his own corrupt and sinister ends, and for his own advancement.

V. That from the beginning of his Negotiation, and throughout the whole managing thereof, by the said Earl of Bristol, and during his said Ambassage, He the said Earl, contrary to his faith, and duty to God, the true Religion professed by the Church of England, and the Peace of this Church and State, did intend and resolve, that if the said Marriage so Treated of as aforesaid, should by his Ministry be effected, that thereby the Romish Religion and Professors thereof should be advanced within this Realm, and other his Majesties Realms and Dominions, and the true Religion and Professors thereof discouraged and discountenanced. And to that end and purpose, the said Earl during the time aforesaid, by Letters unto his late Majesty, and otherwise, often counselled and perswaded his said late Majesty to set at liberty the Jesuits and Priests of the Romish Religion; which, according to the Good, Religious and Publick Laws of this Kingdom, were imprisoned or restrained, and to grant and to allow unto the Papists and Professors of the Romish Religion, free Toleration and silencing of all the Laws made, and standing in force against them.

VI. That by the false Informations and Intelligences of the said Earl of Bristol, during the time aforesaid, unto his said late Majesty, and to his Majesty that now is, being then Prince) concerning the said Treaties; and by the Assurances aforesaid given by the said Earl, his said late Majesty, and the Prince his now Majesty being put in hopes, and by the said long delay used, without producing any effect, their Majesties being put into jealousies and just suspicion, that there was no

Anno 1626. no such sincerity used towards them as they expected, and with so many Answers from the Earl had on their part been undertaken, the said Prince our now gracious Sovereign, was enforced, out of his love to his Countrey, to his Allies, Friends, and Confederates, and to the Peace of Christendom, who all suffered by those intolerable delays, in his own person to undertake his long and dangerous journey into Spain, that thereby he might either speedily conclude those Treaties, or perfectly discover, that on the Emperors and the King of Spains part there was no true and real intention to bring the same to conclusion, upon any fit and honourable terms and conditions, and did absolutely and speedily break them off. By which journey, the person of the said Prince being then Heir-Apparent to the Crown of this Realm, and in his Person, the Peace and Safety of this Kingdom, did undergo such apparent, and such inevitable danger, as at the very remembrance thereof, the hearts of all good Subjects do even tremble.

II. Offences done and committed by the said Earl, during the time of the Princes being in Spain.

VII. That at the Princes coming into Spain, during the time aforesaid, the Earl of Bristol cunningly, falsely, and traiterously moved and perswaded the Prince, being then in the power of a foreign King of the Romish Religion, to change his Religion, which was done in this manner. At the Princes first coming to the said Earl, he asked the Prince for what he came thither? The Prince at first not conceiving the Earls meaning, answered, You know as well as I. The Earl replied, Sir, Servants can never serve their Masters industriously, although they may do it faithfully, unless they know their meanings fully. Give me leave therefore to tell you what they say in the Town is the cause of your coming, That you mean to change your Religion, and to declare it here. And yet cunningly to disguise it, the Earl added further, Sir, I do not speak this, that I will persuade you to do it; or that I will promise you to follow your Example, though you will do it; but as your faithful Servant, if you will trust me with so great a secret, I will endeavour to carry it the discreetest way I can. The Prince being moved at this unexpected motion, again, said unto him, I wonder what you have ever found in me, that you should conceive I would be so unworthy and base, as for a wife to change my Religion. The said Earl replying, He desired the Prince to pardon him, if he had offended him, it was but out of his desire to serve him. Which perswasions of the said Earl were the more dangerous, because the more subtle; whereas it had been the duty of a faithful Servant, to God and his Master, if he had found the Prince staggering in his Religion, to have prevented so great an error, and to have perswaded against it, so to have avoided the dangerous consequence thereof to the true Religion, and to the State, if such a thing should have hapned.

VIII. That afterwards, during the Princes being in Spain, the said Earl having conference with the said Prince about the Romish Religion; he endeavoured falsely and traiterously to perswade the Prince to change his Religion, and to become a Romish Catholick, and to become obedient to the usurped Authority of the Pope of Rome; and to that end and purpose, the said Earl traiterously used these words unto the said Prince, That the State of England never did any great thing, but when they were under the obedience of the Pope of Rome, and that it was impossible they could do any thing of note otherwise. Car. 2.

IX. That during the time of the Prince's being in Spain, the Prince consulting and advising with the said Earl and others, about a new offer made by the King of Spain touching the Palatine's eldest Son to marry with the Emperors Daughter, but then he must be bred up in the Emperors Courts; the said Earl delivered his opinion, That the Proposition was reasonable; whereat when Sir Walter Aston then present, falling into some passion, said, That he durst not for his head consent to it; the Earl of Bristol replied, that he saw no such great inconvenience in it; for that he might be bred up in the Emperors Court in our Religion. But when the extream danger, and, in a manner, the impossibility thereof, was pressed unto the said Earl, he said again, That without some great Action, the Peace of Christendom would never be had; which was so dangerous, and so desperate a Counsel, that one near the Crown of England should be poisoned in his Religion, and become an unfriend to our State, that the consequences thereof, both for the present and future time, were infinitely dangerous; and yet hereunto did his disaffection to our Religion, the blindness in his judgment, misled by his sinister respects, and the too much regard he had to the House of Austria, lead him.

Offences done and committed by the said Earl after the Prince's coming from Spain.

X. That when the Prince had clearly found himself and his Father deluded in these Treaties, and hereupon resolved to return from the Court of Spain; yet because it behoved him to part fairly, he left the powers of the Desponsories with the Earl of Bristol, to be delivered upon the return of the Dispensation from Rome, which the King of Spain insisted upon; and without which, as he pretended, he would not conclude the Marriage. The Prince foreseeing and fearing lest after the Desponsories, the Infanta that should then be his Wife, might be put into a Monastery, wrote a Letter back to the said Earl from Segovia, thereby commanding him not to make use of the said Powers, until he could give him assurance, that a Monastery should not rob him of his Wife; which Letter the said Earl received; and with speed returned an Answer thereto in England, perswading against this Direction, yet promising obedience thereunto. Shortly after which the Prince sent another Letter to the said Earl into Spain, discharging him of his Father's Command. But his late Majesty, by the same Messenger, sent him a more express direction, not to dispatch the Desponsories, until a full Conclusion were had of the other Treaty of the Palatinate, with this of the Marriage; for his Majesty said, That he would not have one Daughter to laugh; and leave the other Daughter weeping. In which Dispatch, although there were some mistaking, yet in the next following, the same was corrected, and the Earl of Bristol tied to the same Restriction, which himself confessed in one of his Dispatches afterwards, and promised to obey punctually the King's command therein; yet nevertheless, contrary to his Duty and Allegiance, in another Letter sent immediately after; he declared; That he had set a day

Anno 1626. day for the Desponsories, without any assurance, or so much as treating of those things which were commanded to him as Restrictions; and that so short a day, that if extraordinary diligence, with good success in the Journey, had not concurred, the Prince's hands might have been bound up; and yet he neither sure of a Wife, nor any assurance given of the Temporal Articles. All which, in his high presumption, he adventured to do, being an express breach of his Instructions; and if the same had not been prevented by his late Majesty's vigilancy, it might have turned to the infinite dishonour and prejudice of his Majesty.

XI. Lastly, That he hath offended in an high and contemptuous manner, in preferring a scandalous Petition to this Honourable House, to the dishonour of his Majesty of blessed memory, deceased, and of his Sacred Majesty that now is, which are no way sufferable in a Subject towards his Sovereign; and in one Article of that Petition specially, wherein he gives his now Majesty the Lie, in denying and offering to falsifie that Relation which his Majesty affirmed, and thereunto added many things of his own remembrance to both Houses of Parliament.

ROBERT HEATH.

The Earl of Bristol, upon the Attorney-General's accusing him of High-Treason, thus expresseth himself.

The Earl of Bristol's expressions at the time of his Accusation. That he had exhibited his Petition to the House April 19. that he might come up and be heard in his Accusation of the Duke of Buckingham, and that thereupon, he being a Peer of this Realm, is now charged with Treason. That he had heretofore informed the late King of the Duke's unfaithful Service, and thereupon the Duke laboured, that he might be clapt up in the Tower presently upon his return out of Spain: That he importuned the late King, that he might be heard before himself, and his Majesty promised it; I pray God (said he) that that promise did him no hurt, for he died shortly after: And for the King's promise, he vouched the Lord Chamberlain for a Witness; and he desired the Lords to take notice, that their House was possessed already of his said Petition, and of his Accusation of the said Duke: And therefore desired first, that they would receive his Charge against the Duke and the Lord Conway, and not to invalid his Testimony against them by the King's Charge against him; and that he might not be impeached, till his Charge of so high a nature be first heard.

So he tendred to the House the Articles against the Duke, which the Clerk received, and he withdrew, and his Petition exhibited the 19 of April, was read; and the Lords resolved upon the Question, That the said Earl's Charge against the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Conway, should be presently read.

The Earl being shortly after called in again to the Bar of the Lord's House, concerning his Articles against the Duke, made this Speech.

The Earl of Bristol's speech at the Bar of the Lord's House, at the delivery of his Articles against the Duke.

First, he craved pardon of their Lordships for his earnest Speeches the other day, confessing them to have been in passion, saying, That unexpected Accusation of Treason would warm any honest heart, but would hereafter amend it. Then he rendred their Lordships humble thanks, for their manner of proceeding against him; and desired to know from Mr. Attorney, whether that were his whole Charge or not. Mr. Attorney answered, That he had commandment to open no more against him; peradventure upon the opening of the Charge, some particulars might arise, and be urged, but no new matter should.

Then the Earl desired to know of Mr. Attorney, who was the Relator to his Charge, and that he might understand who was his Accuser. Mr. Attorney answered, That the King himself, out of his own mouth, had given him directions for his own Relation against him, and corrected many things that were added. Unto which the Earl answered, That he would not contest with the King, neither did it beseem him so to do; neither esteemed he his life or his fortunes so much, as to save them by contesting with his Sovereign; and therefore would make no Reply or Answer, were it not that his Religion and Honour were jointly questioned with his life; but this being to descend to his Posterity, for their sakes he was an humble suitor unto his Majesty, that he would not take indignation at his own just defence, yet would he be ready to make any humble submission to his Majesty; and heartily desired some means might be made, that he might make it personally to himself, wherein he would submit himself most willingly to some such act of humiliation and submission, (not wronging his innocency) that never Subject did towards his Sovereign: And also that his Majesty would be pleased to set himself in his Throne of Justice, and declare out of his Royal Justice, that he would have the Duke and him upon equal terms, and that neither of their causes should be advanced before others.

These were his humble Petitions, which he besought their Lordships to present unto his Majesty, and to take into their considerations, of how dangerous a consequence it would be, if the King should be Accuser, Judge, Witness, and should have the Confiscation. As touching the Charge against him, he said, He had once answered it all, except that of his Petition; and he doubted not but to clear himself before their Lordships of every particular of it. He said, He expected not to have heard of this again, having once answered it: He rather expected to have been charged with some practise with Spain against the State; or the receipt of Ten or Twenty thousand pounds, for the perswading and procuring of the delivery up of some Town of which the Crown was in possession, as might be the Town of Flushing, the Brill, or the like; or for being the means of lending the King's Ships to a Forreign Nation, and that against those of our own Religion; or for revealing his Majesties highest Secrets, which none above two or three dares know; or for threatening the greatest affairs, as it were by his own Authority, without formal Instructions in the points; for having taken Rewards, or been corrupted by a Forreign Prince; or to have broken his Instructions in any Ecclesiastical point; or as the Law calleth it, to have committed an overt Act of disloyalty, and not to be charged after seven Ambassages with Discourses and Inferences.

Then he desired their Lordships that he might have a Copy of his Charge in writing, and time allowed him for his Answer, and Counsel assigned him to plead his Cause; and said, There was a great difference between the Duke of Buckingham Anno 1626. ingham and him; for the Duke was accused of Treason, and yet at large, and in the King's favour; and he being accused but of that which he had long since answered, was a Prisoner: And therefore he moved, that they might be put in equal condition.

And as touching the Lord Conway, in as much as he had given in Articles against him, he desired his Lordship he might not meddle in that particular business, or use the King's name against him ex officio; he also besought their Lordships to be suitors to his Majesty on his behalf, that all the particular Dispatches of his own Ambassages, and Sir Walter Aston's might be brought thither, and that he might make use of them for his defence, as his Evidence: Then he desired their Lordships, not to think it tedious for him to proceed, and lay open his Case unto them: Which being granted, he began as followeth.

He laies open his Case to the Parliament.

HE said, That he had the honour to serve the late King his Master, of happy memory, for the space of twenty years, and a long time as a Counsellor, and in seven Foreign Embassages: In all which time, in point of his Negotiation, he had never received one check or rebuke, until the return of the Duke of Buckingham out of Spain; and therefore from thence he would begin his present Narration.

The very day that his Majesty departed from Spain, he was pleased to tell him, That he had no waies offended him, but did him the honour to trust him with the Custody of the Powers for his Marriage; and after his return into England, wrote unto him some Letters, which did in no kind express any distrust or displeasure against him. About the same time he wrote unto his Majesty several Letters, as in duty he was bound, not for any earthly respect whatsoever, to conceal from him the true estate of his affairs; in which Letter he set down truly and honestly, That he conceived, that the distastes grown there betwixt the King of Spain and his Ministers, and the Duke of Buckingham, would disorder and utterly overthrow all his affairs, if his wisdom prevented it not. Hinc illa lachryma: The Duke of Buckingham got a sight and knowledge of the Letters; and fearing lest the Earl, at his return, should discover unto his said late Majesty his practices and misdemeanors in Spain, he resolved, That his access to the King was no waies to be admitted, and therefore laboured and endeavoured, that he might be committed to the Tower, presently upon his arrival; and conceiving that the Lord Marquess Hamilton, in regard of his Friendship with the Earl, and the Alliance which was then intended between them, might oppose his course, he earnestly pressed him therein, and moved him to deal with my Lord Chamberlain to the same purpose, vowing, That there was no hurt intended to the Earl, but only that he feared, that if he should be admitted to the King, he would cross and disturb the course of affairs: But they were so honourable, that neither of them would consent thereunto; and so that intention of his took no effect: And therein the Earl desired my Lord Chamberlain, that he would be pleased, upon his Honour, to deliver his knowledge.

This design of the Duke not taking, he fell upon other things, indeed to have frightened the Earl out of his Country and Honour; and thereupon laid some great and sinister aspersions upon him in both Houses of Parliament, thinking thereby to have terrified him, that he should not return, saying, That if he kept not himself where he was, and laid hold of those great offers which he heard were made unto him in Spain, it would be worse with him.

Car. 2.
The Lord Chamberlain attests the truth of what the Earl had said.

Then the Earl of Bristol proceeded, and said,

That the knowledge of these aspersions cast upon him in the Parliament, came first unto him at Burdeaux in France, where he was coming home at leisure in the company of his Wife and Family, having formerly sent a Post of purpose to the Lord Conway, to know if his speedy return would be any way useful to his Majesty's service: Who answered him, That he might very well return at leisure with his Family. And in the mean time he was fallen upon by the Duke of Buckingham in Parliament, in such sort as your Lordships well remember; of whose Declaration, he said, he would boldly affirm unto their Lordships, that there was scarce any one thing concerning him in it, which was not contrary to, or different from the truth.

From Burdeaux the Earl took Post, making haste, for that he hoped to clear his Honour in Parliament before it should break up; and being arrived at Calice, he sent over to have one of the King's Ships, for which there was publick order given: but although both Wind and Weather were as fair as could be, and the King's Ships lay at Boloigne, having carried over Count Mansfield, and might every day within three hours have been with him, yet the Ship came not in eight daies expectation; so that the Earl, fearing the Parliament would be dissolved, was enforced to pass the Sea in a Boat with six Oars, as he did, having with him thirty or forty thousand pounds of the King's Jewels.

Upon his Landing at Dover, hoping that if his Arrest should have been deferred till his coming to London, he might have gotten directly to the King's presence, which the Duke resolved was by no means to be admitted: The Earl was there, by a Letter of the Lord Conway's, delivered unto him by a Servant of his, in his Majesty's name, commanded to retire himself to his House, and not to come to the Court, or the King's presence, until he should have answered to certain Questions, which his Majesty would appoint some of the Lords of the Council to ask him. Hereupon he sent presently to his Majesty, who sent him word, That his restraint was neither for any ill meaning unto him, nor that it should last long, but was intended for his good, to keep the Parliament from falling violently upon him. And the same reason the Duke alledged to some of his Friends: and all those his troubles, which have followed upon his first restraint, have been procured by the Duke's Art under colour of Favour. But the Earl having received his Message from the King, became a most humble Suitor unto his Majesty, that he would expose him to the Parliament; for that if he had not served him honestly in all things, he deserved no favour, but to be proceeded against with all severity. And in this particular he pressed the King, as far as could stand with duty and good manners; but received answer from his Majesty, That there should but few more daies pass, before he would put an end to his affairs. And about about this time the Parliament was dissolved.

Anno 1626. He still continued his solicitation to be admitted to the King's presence; who sent him word, and confirmed it by Oath, That as soon as he should have answer'd the Questions which the Commissioners were to propound to him, he would both see him and hear him, and wondred that he should so much doubt thereof. He then solicited with all earnestness to have the Questions sent unto him, which was promised should be within few daies. In the interim, his Majesty being desirous, that the business should have been accommodated, sent secretly to him by a Gentleman (who is ready to depose it) this Message; That he should write a fair Letter to the Duke, and leave the rest to him. Hereupon the Duke sent a Gentleman (one Mr. Clark) with fair Propositions, offering him to procure him whatsoever he could reasonably pretend; only he must not be admitted to the King's presence for some time; and that the Duke would have the disposing of his Vice-Chamberlain's place, having been therein formerly engaged. The Earl told the Gentleman, That to condescend to any such course, were joyntly to confess himself faulty in some kind, which he would not do for any respect in the World; and let him know the great wrong that the Duke had already done him; and therefore it would be more honourable for him to procure some reparation, than to press him further. Moreover, not by way of message, but by way of Information of the said Mr. Clark, he let him know, how fit it were for the Duke not to press these things, who could not but be conscious of his own faults, and knew his innocency; and withal shewed him a Paper that he had made ready for the King, containing the Particulars wherein the Duke had disparaged him.

Mr. Clark making the Duke acquainted herewith, the Duke wrote a Letter the next day to the Earl, bearing date 7 Julii, telling him, That he had willingly intended the accommodation of his affairs; but by what he had now said to Mr. Clark, he was disoblighd, unless he should be pleased to relent it. Whereupon the Earl answered with that directness he thought befitting him in point of Honour. The course of Mediation was interrupted, and the Duke so far incensed, that he swore he would have him questioned for his Life. In the interim, (which the Earl desired might be known to the Lords) his late Majesty was so far from thinking him a Delinquent, or any way dishonest, that he was often heard to say and swear, That he held him an honest man, and that he would answer for him, that he had neither committed Felony nor Treason. And this divers are ready to depose. The which he well confirmed, for that he gave general leave to all Gentlemen of the Court, Privy-Councillors, and to his Secretary of State, to have free access unto him; yea, even so far, as to admit of Visits and Entercourses with Spanish Embassadors, and the Padre Maestre, as is best known to my Lord Conway, by whose Letter he received his Majesty's leave in that particular.

Then he resumed the state of his business where he left it, which was in the hands of the Commissioners, and they were to frame Interrogatories for him; the which, although they had promised should be sent him within a few daies, yet such Art was used, that six or seven weeks were spent in the framing of them, to the end that his Majesty's Progress beginning, there might be no means for the further clearing of the business: And so supposing, that for the answering of the Twenty Interrogatories of so high a nature, the Earl would take some time, they caused the said Interrogatories to be delivered unto him within a few daies before the beginning of the Progress; but he used so much diligence, that he made ready to answer in persona, though it were in the nature of a Delinquent. Unto which his Majesty answered most graciously, That out of his favour; and for that he would not do him wrong, he would not admit of it, but that he should send his Answer, and he would instantly put an end to his businesses; as will appear by Letters. Hereupon the Duke was put into a great strait how to keep him any longer from his Majesty, but desired that only a few Questions more might be asked of him; which the King, upon great urging and instance, condescended unto, so that the Questions might be presently sent him: But herein were such Artifices used, that the bringing of any was delayed until the King had begun his Progress; and then, within a day or two, the Lord Conway sent him word, That he had order indeed for the sending of him some more Questions, but out of his affection to him he forbore the sending of them, unless he should press for them. Whereupon the Earl instantly wrote unto him, that they might be sent unto him. My Lord Conway made him answer by his Letter, That he wished rather the course of Mediation might be pursued, for that would but further exasperate; but if he would needs have the Questions, they should be sent to him. Whereupon he sent to sollicite his Lordship for them with all earnestness, inso-much as to petition his late Majesty twice, that the said Questions might be sent: But when the turn was served of keeping him from the King's presence, the said Questions were never more heard of till this day.

So likewise the Earl having sent his Answer to all the Commissioners, who most of them made not nice to declare, that they were fully satisfied; and when it was perceived that the Commissioners would certainly clear him, and that he thereby should be restored unto his Majesty's favour, they were never more permitted to meet: A proceeding which, as he conceived, their Lordships would think hardly to be paralleld, that a Commission should be appointed to condemn, if there had been cause, but not to clear.

After the Progress was ended, he began again to sollicite his Majesty, and wrote particularly unto the Duke of Buckingham. Whereupon the Duke was pleased to send four or five Propositions, which he desired he should acknowledge; the which Propositions contained nothing but what had been already propounded and satisfied in the former Interrogatories: And if he would make his acknowledgment, he then promised to employ his force and power with the King and Prince, that he should be admitted to kiss their hands, and be received into their gracious favour; but otherwise, in a menacing sort, That he should lay his hands upon his breast, and so that would be best for him. And in the Preface of the said Propositions, he writeth these words which follow, It is an assertion not granted, that the Earl of Bristol, by his Answer had satisfied either the King, the Prince, or Me of his Innocency. A presumptuous commination for any Subject.

Anno 1626: But these Propositions were so unjust, that he wrote unto the Duke, that instead of an acknowledgment, he had sent him an Answer unto them; unto which, if either himself, or any man living, was able to reply, he would submit himself to any thing that should be demanded. But this no way satisfied the Duke, although it did his late Majesty, who, in the Duke's presence, said, I were to be accounted a Tyrant, to enjoin an innocent man to confess faults, of which he was not guilty. And thereupon sent him word, That he should make his Answer, but acknowledge nothing he was not faulty in. And although he received this Message from the King's own mouth, as will be depose, yet the Duke at the same time wrote unto him, That the conclusion of all that had been treated with his Majesty, was, That he should make the Acknowledgment in such manner, as was set down in this Paper. And at this time likewise it was, that his Majesty sent him word, That he would hear him concerning the Duke of Buckingham, as well as he had heard the Duke concerning him. And this was not long before his Majesty's sickness: And in the interim, as he had heard by several waies the King suffered much, and was infinitely pressed by the Duke concerning the said Earl and his affairs; and this, he said, was the suffering he had spoken of to their Lordships the other day.

The Earl craved leave of their Lordships to specify some other particulars, whereby it should appear, that his Majesty was in no kind ill-opinion'd of him till his dying day; viz. That several persons will depose, that they have heard his Majesty say, That he esteemed him an honest man; and that he was pleased to accept of Toys by way of Present from him, graciously, and in good part; and at last was likewise pleased to give him leave to come to London, and to follow his own affairs; and that his pleasure was signified unto him by the Duke his own Letter. Whereupon he determined to come to London, intimated to the Duke his intention of going to his Lodging in White-Hall; but the Duke was therewith incensed again, and said, He mistook the King's meaning, which was, that he might privately follow his own business. And this, he said, was the true state and condition, when it pleased God to take unto his mercy his late most gracious Majesty.

Upon his Majesty's coming to the Crown, he said, He wrote a most humble Letter unto his Majesty, imploring his grace and goodness, and desiring the Duke's Mediation. But he was pleased to answer by his Letter of 7 May, 1625. That the Resolution was to proceed against him, without a plain and direct confession of the Point which he had formerly required him to acknowledge; and in a Courtly manner of menace telleth him, That he would take the freedom to advise him, to bethink himself in time what would be most for his good. But in the interim, his Majesty was graciously pleased, that his Writ of Parliament should be sent him; and thereupon he wrote unto the Duke of the receipt of the said Writ, but that he should do nothing but what he should understand to be most agreeable to his Majesty's pleasure. Whereunto the Duke answered, in his Letter of May, in this manner: I have acquainted his Majesty with your requests towards him, touching our Summons to the Parliament, which he taketh very well, and would have you rather make excuse for your ab- sence, notwithstanding your Writ, than to come your self in person. Whereupon he sent humbly to desire a Letter of leave under his Majesty's hand for his Warrant; but instead thereof, he received from the Lord Conway an absolute Prohibition, and to restrain and confine him in such sort, as he hath been in the late King's time: and although he was indeed absolutely set free, he could never get clear'd by the Lord Conway, though he sent him all the Papers to examine; and when he could make no further reply, he said, He conceived he was under restraint, and that his liberty expired with the late King's death; when indeed Restraint may expire, but Liberty is natural. After this, he continued for the space of three quarters of a year in the Country without moving, in which time he was removed from those Places and Offices he held, during his late Majesty's life; and the greatest part of his Estate being laid out in their Majesties service, by their particular appointment, he could never be admitted so much as to the clearing of Accompts. Yet hereof he never made the least complaint: But against the time of his Majesty's Coronation, he thought it fit to lay hold of that occasion, when Princes do Acts of grace and favour, to be a most humble Suitor to his Majesty for his grace and goodness; and addressed his Letters unto the Duke of Buckingham, from whom he received a Letter all written in his own hand, and therein a Letter inclosed from his Majesty, so different from some gracious Message which he had received from his Majesty since the said Earl returned into England, upon the occasion of a great sickness; and likewise from his speeches several times delivered to his Wife, to wit, That he had never offended him, and that for his faults he no waies held them criminal, but to be expiated by any easie acknowledgment; That he confessed he knew not what judgment to make of the said Letter, neither hath presumed hitherto to make any Answer thereto; although by reducing the occasion of speeches and circumstances to his Majesty's memory, he no waies doubteth but he shall be able to give unto his Majesty such satisfaction to every particular, as his Majesty would not remain with the least scruple in any one point.

After this he said, that his Writ of Parliament was detained; whereupon he addressed himself to the Lord Keeper, that he would be a Suitor to his Majesty for him in that behalf: which diligences not taking effect, by Petition he became a Suitor to their Lordships for their Honourable mediation to his Majesty, and thereupon his Writ of Parliament was awarded: But the Duke of Buckingham upon that took occasion, as he had published Copies of the said Letter over all the Kingdom, to read it likewise in that Honourable House, as was best known unto their Lordships, and the Writ was accompanied with a Prohibition from the Lord Keeper; whereupon he addressed himself for Justice to that Honourable House, (being possessed of his Cause by his Petition) for both redress of his own wrongs, and likewise of Complaints against the Duke for many Crimes: And that Honourable House being possessed of his Cause by his Petition, there is preferred against him a succeeding Complaint amounting as high as Treason (as it is pretended) although he for divers years hath not been questioned; yet since his complaint against the Duke he hath been fetcht up like a Prisoner, and brought into the Anno 1626. House as a Delinquent; And the Duke, of whom he hath complained for his great Crimes, is admitted still to sit in the House as one of his Judges. The which with all that he hath formerly said, together with his Life, Fortunes and Honour, he did with all willingness, humility, and duty, submit to the Justice and Honour of that House.

Then the Lords asked him, when he would bring in his Answer? He promised to answer as soon as might be, but knew not how far he should have occasion to use his antient Dispatches. The Lord Keeper told him, that Mr. Attorney might help him by letting him know it: The Attorney said, that his Charge should in nothing look further back than to the year 1621. Which he desired might be recorded.

Whereupon the Earl thanking their Lordships for their patience, he was carried away by Mr. Maxwell the Gentleman-Usher, in whose House and Custody he remained.

Then were read the Earls Articles against the Duke and the Lord Conway, viz.

Articles of the Earl of Bristol, whereby he chargeth the Duke of Buckingham, bearing Date the First day of May, 1626.

The Earl of Bristol's Articles against the Duke.

I. That the Duke of Buckingham did secretly combine with the Conde of Gondomar Embassadour for the King of Spain, before his the said Embassadours last return into Spain, in the Summer, Anno 1622. to carry his Majesty (then Prince) into Spain, to the end he might be informed and instructed in the Roman Religion, and thereby have perverted the Prince, and subverted the true Religion, established in England: From which misery this Kingdom (next under God's mercy) hath by the wise, religious, and constant carriage of his Majesty been almost miraculously delivered, considering the many bold and subtle attempts of the said Duke in that kind.

II. That Mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and sent into Spain; and such messages at his return framed, as might serve for a ground to set on foot this Conspiracy; The which was done accordingly, and thereby the King and Prince highly abused, and their Consents thereby first gotten to the said Journey, that is to say, after the return of the said Mr. Porter, which was about the end of December, or the beginning of January, 1622. whereas the said Duke had plotted it many months before.

III. That the said Duke, at his arrival in Spain, nourished the Spanish Ministers, not only in the belief of his own being Popishly affected, but did (both by absenting himself from all Exercises of Religion constantly used in the Earl of Bristol's House, and frequented by all other Protestant English, and by conforming himself to please the Spaniards in divers Rights of their Religion, even so far as to kneel and adore their Sacrament) from time to time give the Spaniards hope of the Prince his Conversion: The which Conversion he endeavoured to procure by all means possible: and thereby caused the Spanish Ministers to propound far worse Conditions for Religion, than had been formerly by the Earl of Bristol and Sir Walter Aston, settled and signed under their Majesties hands, with a Clause of the King of Spain's Answer of December 12. 1622. that they held the Articles agreed upon sufficient, and such as ought to induce the Pope to the granting of the Dispensation.

IV. That the Duke of Buckingham having several times in the presence of the Earl of Bristol moved and pressed his late Majesty; at the instance of the Conde of Gondomar, to write a Letter unto the Pope, and to that purpose having once brought a Letter ready drawn, wherewith the Earl of Bristol by his Majesty being made acquainted, did so strongly oppose the writing of any such Letter, that during the abode of the said Earl of Bristol in England, the said Duke could not obtain it; yet not long after the Earl was gone, he procured such a Letter to be written from his said late Majesty unto the Pope, and to have him stiled [Sanctissime Pater.]

V. That the Pope being informed of the Duke of Buckingham's inclination and intention in point of Religion, sent unto the said Duke a particular Bull in Parchment, for to perswade and encourage him in the perversion of his Majesty then Prince.

VI. That the said Dukes behaviour in Spain was such, that he thereby so incensed the King of Spain and his Ministers, as they would admit of no reconciliation, nor further dealing with him. Whereupon the said Duke seeing that the match would be now to his disadvantage, he endeavoured to break it, not for any service to the Kingdom, nor dislike of the match in itself, nor for that he found (as since he hath pretended) that the Spaniards did not really intend the said match, but out of his particular ends and his indignation.

VII. That after he intended to cross the marriage, he put in practice divers undue courses; as namely, making use of the Letters of his Majesty (then Prince) to his own ends, and not to what they were intended; as likewise concealing divers things of high importance from his late Majesty, and thereby overthrew his Majesty's purposes, and advanced his own ends.

VIII. That the said Duke, as he had with his skill and artifices formerly abused their Majesties, so to the same end he afterwards abused both Houses of Parliament by his sinister Relation of the carriage of Affairs, as shall be made appear almost in every particular that he spake unto the said Houses.

IX. As for scandal given by his personal behaviour, as also the employing of his power with the King of Spain for the procuring of Favors & Offices which he bestowed upon base and unworthy persons for the recompence and hire of his Lust; These things as neither fit for the Earl of Bristol to speak, nor indeed for the House to hear, he leaveth to your Lordships wisdom how far you will be pleased to have them examined; It having been indeed a great infamy and dishonour to this Nation, that a Person of the Duke's great quality and employments, a Privy-Counsellor, an Embassadour, eminent in his Masters favour, and solely trusted with the Person of the Prince, should leave behind him in a Foreign Court so much scandal, as he did by his ill behaviour.

X. That the Duke hath been in great part the Cause of the ruin and misfortune of the Prince Palatine and his Estates, in as much as those Affairs had relation unto this Kingdom.

XI. That the Duke of Buckingham hath in his Relations to both Houses of Parliament wronged the Earl of Bristol in point of his Honour by many sinister aspersions which he hath laid upon him, and in point of his Liberty by many many undue Courses through his power and practices.

Anno 1626. XII. That the Earl of Bristol did reveal unto his late Majesty both by word and Letter, in what sort the said Duke had diserved him and abused his trust: And that the King by several waies sent him word, That he should rest assured he would hear the said Earl, but that he should leave it to him to take his own time. And thereupon, few daies before his sickness, he sent the Earl word, that he would hear him against the said Duke, as well as he had heard the said Duke against him. Which the Duke himself heard; And not long after his Blessed Majesty sickned and died, having been in the interim much vexed and pressed by the said Duke.

Articles of the Earl of Bristol against the Lord Conway, bearing Date 1 Maii 1626.

The Earl of Bristol's Articles against the Lord Conway.

I. That the Lord Conway is so great a Servant of the Duke of Buckingham's, that he hath not stuck to send the Earl of Bristol plain word, That if businesse could not be accommodated betwixt him and the Duke, he must then adhere and declare himself for the said Duke; and therefore unfit to be a Judge in any thing that concerneth the Duke or the Earl.

II. That the said Lord Conway professeth himself to be a Secretary of the Duke of Buckingham's creation, and so acknowledgeth it under his own hand: And although that he be the King's Secretary of State, and a Privy-Counsellor, he usually beginneth his Letters to the Duke, [Most gracious Patron.]

III. That as a Creature of the said Duke's, the said Lord Conway hath been made the Instrument of keeping the Earl of Bristol from the King's presence, and of Imprisoning of him by Warrants only under his own hand; for which he cannot (as the Earl conceiveth) produce any sufficient Warrant.

IV. That by the space of twelve months last past, the said Lord Conway hath been the Cause of the Earls restraint, only by misinforming his Majesty, and procuring a Letter of restraint upon undue grounds: and when it was made apparent unto him, that the said Earl was restored to his liberty freely to follow his own affairs by his late Majesty of blessed memory, he replied, That that liberty given him by his Majesty expired with the King's death.

V. That the Earl of Bristol's Mother lying sick upon her death-bed, desired for her comfort to see her Son, and to give him her last blessing: Whereupon the Earl writ to the Lord Conway, to desire him to move the King for his leave; which he putting off from day to day, told the person employed, That by reason of the Duke's sickness he could not find opportunity to get the Duke's leave to move the King; And having spoken with the Duke, he made a Negative answer in the King's name. Wherewith the Earl acquainting the King by some of his Bed-Chamber, his Majesty was in a very great anger, swearing the Secretary had never moved him, and that to deny the said Earl leave, was a barbarous part; and thereupon sent him presently free leave, which the Secretary hearing of, sent afterwards a Letter of leave, but with divers clauses and limitations differing from the leave sent him from the King's own mouth.

VI. That the having the businesses of the Earl of Bristol in his own hands, and the Earl being commanded by the King to address himself in his occasions unto his Lordship, He would never deliver any Message from the said Earl, without acquainting the said Duke, and receiving his directions, and in a noble manner of freeness stuck not to send him word.

VII. That the Earl of Bristol having received from the Lord Conway Twenty Interrogatories in his late Majesty's name, drawn up by a Commission of the Lords appointed to search into the Proceedings and Employments of the said Earl, in which search there was more than two months spent, divers of the said Interrogatories involving Felony and Treason; And his Majesty having been pleased to assure the said Earl both by Message and Letters, that upon satisfaction given to himself, and the Commissioners by his answers, he would presently put an end to the Earl of Bristol's Business. The Earl of Bristol having so fully answered as would admit of no reply; and that many of the Commissioners declared themselves to be fully satisfied: the said Lord Conway (being the Secretary in the Commission, to whom it properly belonged to call the Lords to assemble) perceiving the Earl of Bristol was like to be cleared, never moved for any further meeting, neither have they ever been permitted to meet until this day, whereby the troubles of the Earl of Bristol have been kept on foot till this present, and the said Earls Imprisonment hath been enlarged twenty months. And by the Artifices of the said Duke of Buckingham and the said Lord Conway (as shall be made appear) the said Earl hath been insensibly involved and stauked into the troubles he is now in, which he doubteth not but your Lordships will judge to be a very considerable Case.

VIII. That for a colour of keeping the Earl from his late Majesty's presence, it being pretended after the Answer to the twenty Interrogatories, that there were some few Questions more to be added, whereunto when he should have answered, his Majesty swore solemnly, that without any delay he should be admitted to his presence, and that within two or three daies he should have the said Questions sent unto him; the Lord Conway notwithstanding he acknowledged under his hand, that he had received his Majesty's directions for the sending of the said Articles, and was often thereunto solicited on the behalf of the said Earl, would never send the said Questions; and at last answered, That he had no more to do with the Earl's businesses.

IX. That the Earl of Bristol being set free by his late Majesty to come to London to follow his own Affairs as he pleased, and thereupon having his Writ of Parliament sent unto him, without any Letter of Prohibition; but the Earl of Bristol, out of his great desire to conform all his actions to that which he should understand would best please his Majesty, sent to know whether his going or stay would be most agreeable unto his Majesty? who was pleased to answer by a Letter from my Lord Duke of Buckingham, That he took in very good part the said Earl's respect unto him; but wished him to make some excuse for the present: The which accordingly he did, and moved, That he might have a Letter under the King's hand to warrant his absence; but under colour of this Letter of leave, upon the Earl of Bristol's own motion and desire, the Lord Conway sent a Letter from his Majesty absolutely forbidding his coming to Parliament; and therein likewise was inserted a 1626. Clause, That the Earl should remain restrained as he was in the time of his late Majesty; and so thereby a colour of restraint under his Majesty's hand was gotten, which could never be procured in his late Majesty's time; whereby the Earl of Bristol hath been unduly restrained ever since without being able to procure any redress, or to make the Lord Conway willing to understand his Case, although he sent him all the Papers, whereby he might clearly see, that the Earl was not under restraint in his late Majesty's time; but never other answer could be procured from him, but That he judged the said Earl to be under restraint, and that his Liberty was expired by the late King's death, as is aforesaid.

X. That the Lord Conway, knowing that the Match for the marrying of the King of Bohemia's eldest Son with the Emperours Daughter, and being bred in the Emperours Court, was allowed and propounded by his late Majesty: And that his Majesty by his Letters unto his Son-in-law, declareth, That he thinketh it the fairest and clearest way for the accommodation of his Affairs, and that he will take sufficient care for his breeding in true Religion. And notwithstanding that the said Earl received a Copy of the said Letter by the said late King's order, with other Papers setting down all that had been done in the said business, and his Majesty's assent thereunto from the Lord Conway himself; yet hath he suffered all to be charged, as a crime against the Earl of Bristol, both in the twentieth Interrogatory, and in his Majesty's last Letter, that he should consent to the breeding of the young Prince in the Emperours Court. And further in the Interrogatory he alledgeth it as an aggravation against the said Earl, That the breeding of the said Prince in the Emperours Court inferred to the perversion of his Religion, when he knew that his said breeding was never thought nor spoken of by the King, nor any other, but with that express Clause and Condition, That he should be bred in his own Religion, and have such Tutors and Servants, as his Father should appoint.

XI. That the Lord Conway hath been the cause of all the Earl of Bristol's Troubles by his dubious and intrapping Dispatches, and inferring, That the said Earl hath failed in his Directions, when it shall be made appear, that his Dispatches contained no such Directions as he hath alledged were given.

The House not being satisfied to commit the Earl to the Tower, let him remain where he was before, with the Gentleman-Usher; and further ordered, That the King's Charge against the Earl of Bristol be first heard, and then the Charge of the said Earl against the Duke; yet so that the Earls Testimony against the Duke be not prevented, prejudiced, or impeached.

The day following the Lord Keeper delivered a Message from the King to the House of Lords.

A Message from the King to the Lords concerning Bristol's Articles against the Duke.

That his Majesty taketh notice of the Articles exhibited against the Duke of Buckingham by the Earl of Bristol; and he observeth that many of them are such, as himself is able to say more of his own knowledge than any man for the Dukes sincere carriage in them: That one of them, touching the Narrative made in Parliament in the One and twentieth of King James, trencheth as far upon himself as the Duke; for that his Majesty went as far as the Duke in that Declaration; and that all of them have been closed in the Earls own breast now for these two years, contrary to his Duty, if he had known any crime of that nature by the Duke; and now he vents it by way of recrimination against the Duke, whom he knows to be a principal Witness to prove his Majesty's Charge.

And therefore, That his Majesty gave them thanks, that they gave no way to the Earl of Bristol's unreasonable motions, of putting the Duke under the same restraints that they had put the Earl, thereby eschewing what the Earl aimeth at, to alter their dutiful Proceedings toward his Majesty: That thereby they had made his Majesty confident, that as they have, so they will put a difference between his Majesty's Charge against one that appeareth as a Delinquent, and the recrimination of the Earl of Bristol against his Majesty's Witnesses; and they will not equal them by a proceeding Patri Passu.

At this time there was an endeavour to take the Earl's Cause out of the House, and to proceed by way of Indictment in the King's Bench: To which manner of proceeding why the Lords should not give way, these ensuing Reasons were offered to consideration.

I. It was Ordered, That in all Causes of moment, the Defendants shall have Copies of all Depositions both pro and contra after publication, in convenient time, before hearing, to prepare themselves; and if the Defendants will demand that of the House in due time, they shall have their learned Council to assist them in their defence: And their Lordships declared, That they did give their Assents thereto; because in all Cases, as well Civil as Criminal and Capital, they hold, That all lawful help could not before just Judges make one that is guilty avoid Justice; and on the other side, God defend that one Innocent should be condemned.

II. The Earl of Bristol by his Petition to the House complained of his restraint, desiring to be heard here, as well in points of his wrongs, as in his accusations against the Duke; whereof his Majesty taking consideration, signified his pleasure by the Lord Keeper; April the 20. That his Majesty was resolved to put his Cause upon the honour and justice of this House; and that his pleasure was that the said Earl should be sent for as a Delinquent to answer the offences he committed in his Negotiation before his Majesty's going into Spain, whilst his Majesty was there, and since his coming thence; and that his Majesty would cause these things to be charged against him in this House; so as the House is fully possessed of the Cause, as well by the Earls Petition, as by the King's assent, and the Earl brought up to the House as a Delinquent to answer his offences there; and Mr. Attorney hath accordingly delivered the Charge against him in the House, and the Earl also his Charge against the Duke: And now if he be proceeded withal by way of Indictment in the King's Bench, these dangerous inconveniences will follow, viz.

1. He can have no Counsel.
2. He can have no Witness against the King.
3. He cannot know what the Evidences against him will be, in a convenient time to prepare for his Defence; and so the Innocent may be condemned, which may be the Case of any Peer.
4. The Liberties of the House will be thereby infringed, the Honour and Justice thereof declined, contrary to the King's pleasure expressly signified by the Lord Keeper.

All

Car. 2.

The Reasons.

Anno 1626.

All these things are expressly against the Order.

5. The Earl being Indicted, it will not be in the power of the House to keep him from Arraignment, and so he may be disabled to make good his Charge against the Duke.

Therefore the way to proceed according to the Directions and true meaning of the Order, and the King's pleasure already signified, and preserve the Liberties of the House, and protect one from injury, will be,

First, To have the Charge delivered into the House in writing, and the Earl to set down his Answer to it in writing; and that the Witnesses may be examined, and Evidences on both sides heard, by such course and manner of proceedings as shall be thought fit by the House; and if upon full hearing the House shall find it to be Treason, then to proceed by way of Indictment; if doubtful in point of Law, to have the opinion of the Judges to clear it; if doubtful in matter of Fact, then to refer it to a regal Fact; And the rather for that,

1. It appears that the Earl, in the space of two years (till now he complained) hath not been so much as questioned for matter of Treason.

2. He hath been examined upon twenty Interrogatories, and the Commissioners satisfied, That his Answer would admit of no Reply.

3. The Lord Cornway by several Letters hath intimated, That there was nothing against him but what was pardoned by the Parliament. Pardon of the 21 Jac. And signified his Majesties pleasure, That he might rest in that security he was, and sit still.

His Majesty hath often declared both to the Countess of Bristol and others, That there was neither Felony nor Treason against him, nor ought else, but what a small acknowledgment would expiate.

Some Cases happened in Parliament 1 & 2 Car. 1, wherein the Judges Opinions were had; viz.

This Question was put to all the Justices, Whether a Peer impeached for Treason shall be Tried in Parliament? And the Chief Justice, in the name of all the Justices, delivered his Opinion, That the course by Law was Indictment, and this to be signified in Parliament, before the Lord Steward; vide 10 Edward 4. 6. or by Bill, and an Act of Parliament to attain the Party. An Order was made in the upper House of Parliament 21 Jac. That any Peer shall have Counsel in case Criminal or Capital; and upon the Accusation of the Earl of Bristol in Parliament, he made a motion for Counsel; which matter was commended to the King by the Lords with voucher of the said former Orders: The King returned Answer, That this was contrary to the Fundamental Laws of the Realm; but inasmuch as it was for his Benefit and Prerogative, with which he may dispence, therefore out of his Grace he would allow the Earl of Bristol to have his Counsel, with protestation that he would advise in the general; and the same Order was made without his privy, and without hearing the Justices or his Council. And upon the Trial of the Lord Middlesex, in a Case Criminal; afterward, that is to say Friday after, upon the Assembly of all the Justices, the Attorney of the King, by commandment of the King, demanded their Opinion; and they with one voice agreed, That where the Trial is upon Indictment, no Counsel in Felony or Treason is to be allowed, unless a matter of Law happen or upon the Indictment, or upon Plea of the Defendant, or upon Evidence, and in such Cases the Prisoner may have Counsel, but not otherwise.

The Lords hereupon prepared two Questions to the Judges; (1.) Whether his Majesty may be a Witness in case of Treason? (2.) Whether, admitting he may be a Witness, he may in this Case be a Witness or not? But before the Resolution of these, a Message & Command came from his Majesty to the Judges to this purpose, That they should not upon general Questions give in any Answers; but if any point came in particular, they may give their advice: which being declared to the Peers by the Chief Justice, the said matter hereupon ceased.

The Duke of Buckingham being deputed Procurator in this Parliament for fourteen Peers, the House of Peers made an Order that for the future, No Peer should be capable of receiving any more than two Proxies.

About a fortnight after the Charge delivered in against the Earl of Bristol, the Earl gave in his Answer here inserted, and having his Answer in his hands ready to be delivered to the House of Peers by way of Introduction, said as follows:

I Am not insensible upon what disadvantages I come to Trial in this Cause: For first, I am fallen into his Majesties heavy displeasure, and am to encounter with a potent Adversary, highly in favour, and am accused for Treason; for which all Counsel and Friends abandon me, as a man infected with the Plague; I am become bound, and under restraint; whereas a man who is to encounter for his Life and Honour, and with a strong Adversary, had need to come upon equal terms.

But as to the Matter, I find my self charged with divers Articles of High Treason; but looking into them with the eyes of my best Understanding, with the opinion also of my Counsel lately assigned me, and taking them apart one Article from another, I find not any thing in them like Treason, or that hath so much as the shew or countenance of a fault, either in act or words: only by laying all things together, and by wresting the wrests with a strained construction, directly contrary to the true sense and meaning of them, and the occasion whereupon they were spoken, it is informed, and that by way of inference only, That the intent was evil, and the matter to prove the intent to be evil, depends upon two props, viz. ill affection to Religion, and too much affection to Spain; which, if I shall clear, the Inference grounded upon these props, will fall of it self.

Therefore I crave leave of your Lordships, before I give my Answer to the Charge, that I may give you an account of these two particulars; and I humbly beseech you, that what I shall speak in my just defence, may not be conceived to proceed of vain ostentation.

And first for my Religion, I was in my Childhood bred in the Protestant Religion, and rather after the stricter manner than otherwise. When I grew in years fit, I travelled into France, Italy, and Rome it self: In all which Travels, I can produce some that I consorted withal, who will witness with me, that I ever constantly used the Religion I professed, without the least prevarication; no man being able to charge me, that so much

Anno 1626. much as out of curiosity I ever was present at any of the Exercises belonging to the Roman Religion, on, or did the least act of conformity to any their Rites or Ceremonies.

Secondly, After my return home, I was received into the service of his late Majesty of blessed memory, whom I served some years as a Gentleman of his Privy Chamber, and Carver; in which time, none of his Majesties Servants received the Holy Sacrament, frequented Sermons, and other Exercises of our Religion more than I.

Thirdly, In that time of my Youth, not to avoid idleness, but out of affection to Religion, I translated that excellent Book of our Faith, and great Points of our Religion, written by Monsieur Moulins; which his late Majesty having sometimes after seen, approved so well, that he would needs have it printed; which accordingly was printed in the name of Mr. Sampford my Chaplain, to whom I gave the honour: But it was my own act, as Mr. Sampford will not deny, though, to this hour, I had never before spoken it.

Fourthly, About seven or eight and twenty years of my Age, I was employed Ambassador into Spain, in that great business of the Treaty of the Marriage; and whereas others before me carried with them but one Chaplain, I had two, viz. Mr. Sampford and Mr. Boswel; and at my arrival at the Court of Spain, I caused it to be published, that such a day (God willing) I purposed to have a Communion, to the end that such English as were in the Town, might resort thither. Whereat the Duke de Lerma, and other the great Ministers of Spain, took offence, and told me, They might well perceive I brought no good affection to the business I came about, that would so publickly and avowedly in that Court, where never the like was done, proclaim there a Communion; and with high expressions perswaded me to decline it. Whereunto I answered, I came to do my Master's service, which I would heartily and effectually endeavour, but would not omit my service to God, no, though my Master commanded. And at the Communion there were present one hundred persons, some of them Brothers, Kinsmen, and near Dependents upon some of their Lordships, whom I see there in my eye. This I did in Spain; the like I did in Germany, in the Emperor's Court, in my Ambassage thither.

Fifthly, I had in my several Employments into Spain and Germany, above five hundred persons of all qualities attending upon me, and never one perverted in Religion: my children carefully instructed and bred in the same Religion. I had constantly every Sabbath a Sermon in my House; and Sacraments and other Exercises of our Religion frequented.

Sixthly, A foul-mouth'd Skimei railed against our late King and Religion in Spain; how I caused that to be revenged by a near Kinsman of my own, is well known.

Seventhly, One of the English dying in the Town of Madrid, of whose Religion there was some question made; and the King's Chaplains telling me, that they at the day of his death had been with him, and taken an account of his Faith, and that he died a Protestant: I caused him to be brought home to my house, and there buried according to our Rites; whereat much ado was made, and it was threatned, That the Inquisitors and other Officers, would come and fetch him out, and bury him after their manner: I stood upon it, and that it was the King of England's House, and openly protested, that whosoever should come thither with such intent, I would shoot at him with a Piece; and exhorted all my People, that if such an attempt should be, they should, rather then suffer such a dishonour to our Religion, die with me in that quarrel, and hoped such English as were in the Town would do the like.

Eighthly, There having been a Monastery for English Jesuits, founded and settled at Madrid, before my coming thither, and the English Arms set up, I laboured to suppress it, and having written thereof to the late King, his Majesty advised me not to run my head against the Rock, for it was an impossible thing for me to do: yet I undertook it, and it pleased God so to bless my endeavours, that I absolutely dissolved and overthrew it. For which, the Bishop of Winchester, Montague (now with God) wrote unto me by his Majesties direction, a Letter of his Majesties gracious acceptance of so great a Service: telling me, Besides the Service I had done to the Church and Common-wealth, it should remain a Trophy of Honour to me and my Posterity for ever: And the King himself, with his own hand, wrote unto me, beginning his Letter, Good Fortune Digby, your good luck in your Service well deserves that style.

Ninthly, In all Negotiations in Spain, in point of Religion, I ever straitned my Instructions.

Tenthly, The match with Spain was not moved by me, I ever advised a Protestant match, and shewed many Reasons both of Conscience and State; but if with a Catholick, then rather with Spain than France, so as good Conditions might be made for Religion, as appears by a Letter I wrote, and delivered to the Prince, at his first going upon the employment; for which I had like then to have been ruined for being a Puritan, as I am now for being a Papist, and all by one and the same hand.

Eleventhly, And I appeal to the testimony of Dr. Mason and Dr. Wren, the King's Chaplains with me in Spain; and to Mr. Sampford, Mr. Boswel, and Mr. Frewen my own Chaplains there: And that such Papists as have been my ancient Acquaintance and Friends, being men of worth, well known to many of their Lordships, may be examined upon Oath, whether I have not in all places as well in Spain as in England, and at all times upon fit occasions, avowed my self a Protestant, without the least prevarication? Or whether I did ever any the least act that was not suitable to the same Profession? And that Mr. Frewen, Mr. Wake, my own Chaplains, may give their testimonies, whether in the time of several dangerous sicknesses, which I had of late years fallen into, I have not in the time of such my sicknesses (when no man can be supposed to dissemble with the World, being ready to leave it) made before them a Confession of my Faith, and made my Peace with God, resolving to die as befitting a Protestant and good Christian. This I tell your Lordships, was my Religion I was bred in, have ever professed and lived in, and was resolved, by God's grace, to die in; and yet was so unhappy, by reason of employment, to be distasteful to many good men, that I have been suspected even by them, not well knowing me: And this hath been the rise the Duke hath now taken against me. Then for my love to Spain, I wonder from Anno 1626. from whence that opinion should grow, since I was there hated and shamed, as the man whom of all others, they desired to have the least to do withal, having stood ever stricter in point of Religion, than by my Instructions I might have done; as after the Capitulation concluded on, they understood by some intelligence, which caused their hatred towards me.

Sure I am, I shewed it not by the Service I did them; for divers years together there was not a Letter sent by that King to any other State, that the King my Master had not a Copy of before, or by that time it came to the place whither it was directed. There was not any great action on foot, whereof I had not the private Instructions, and sent them thither; nor any Expedition by Sea or Land, wherein I had not some Ministers or Intelligencers, that gave me from time to time advertisements of their actions, and most private intentions, whereof I advertised his Majesty from time to time. I used such industry, as to get all the Papers of that King's private Cabinet into my hands; took Copies and Notes of such of them as I thought useful; and upon every of them set my private mark before they were conveyed back again, to the end, that if I should have had an occasion to have charged him with any thing mentioned in the same Papers, I might have let him see I knew it, by telling him in what Paper it was, and marked with such a mark.

There was not a Port in Spain, that I had not caused the depth of it to be sounded, nor a Fort whereof I knew not the strength, both for the Garrison, Munition, and other matters of advantage and disadvantage; insomuch, as if it should please the King to appoint a Committee of the Lords to take an account of me, I should, by the stores I gathered there, and brought with me, make it appear, I was as useful a Servant to his Majesty in a War, as in Peace. Whereas at his Majesties coming out of Spain, the powers of the Desponsories were to be deposited in some mans hands; and the Duke, upon pretence of doing me honour, but intending to break my neck by it, moved, they might be left with me, and the King of Spain was contented; and so they were put into my hands, not as an Attorney only for the Prince; but the King of Spain having taken the substitution of them by his Secretary of State, entered in Legal form; whereby that King was then become interested in them by their occupation, as well as the Prince by granting of them. And becoming the Instrumentum stipulatum, wherein they were both interested, they were deposited into my hands, as an indifferent person, trusted between the King of Spain and the Prince, with a Declaration of the Trust. And now the Duke was returned out of Spain, he plotted my ruin, and put it in execution in this manner. He concealed, that the powers were to expire at Christmas, and procured his Majesty to write a Letter, (not a direct Commandment) but expressing a desire that the Desponsories should not be till one of the days in Christmas, intending thereby to draw me into a Dilemma, That if I proceeded in the match, this Letter should, as now it is, have been enforced against me, as a breach of Instructions: If I had not proceeded, then I had broken my Trust between the Prince and King of Spain, overthrown the Marriage, so long sought and laboured, it being the main scope of my Ambassage, contrary to express Warrant, and that upon a Letter I must needs know to be a mistake.

Car. 2. And when I had written into England, to have a direct Warrant in the point, the Duke then seeing that Plot would not take, he dealt with divers great Lords, as well known to some of their Lordships there present, to have me, upon my arrival in England, committed to the Tower, before I should ever come to speak with the King; which the Spanish Ambassador, here in England, having gotten private notice of, gave advertisement hereof to that King: who thereupon foreseeing my danger, and consulting with his Council and Divines, what were fit for him in Honour and Conscience to do in that case, they resolved, That seeing my sufferings grew by being an honest man, and endeavouring to perform the trust reposed in me by that King, as well as the Prince; That King was bound both in Honour and Conscience, not only to preserve me from ruin, but to make me a reparation for my loss I should sustain by occasion of the Trust: Whereupon, at his departure, going to Court to take his leave, the Comde Olivares told me, what was plotted against me in England; and in respect of the danger, by reason of the greatness of my Adversary, perswaded me to stay there, and in his Master's name made an offer, not in secret, but in the presence of Sir Walter Aston.

Here he repeated those offers of Reward, Honour, and Preferment, which we have mentioned before in order of time, and at present pass it by; he then proceeded, and said:

Upon what grounds and hope came I to encounter with those dangers? Not upon hope of my greatness in Court, and strength of Friends there, to bolster out an ill cause; no sure, my strength was too weak, and my Adversaries too powerful. But I know my Conscience was clear, and my Cause good; and trusted in God Almighty. And to him now, and to their Lordships Judgments, recommend my self, and my Cause.

And then he delivered his Answer, desiring their Lordships it might be afterward recorded in Parchment, that it might remain to Posterity; which being read by one of his Council, the Lord Keeper asked him, Whether he desired to say any more than he had done? He answered, That he had something more to say, but knew not the Order, or whether Mr. Attorney would speak first; but he being desired to speak, He desired their Lordships he might put them in mind of what he conceived they had already promised; which was, That the Duke, whom he accused in that House of far higher Offences, than any with which he was charged, might be proceeded with as he was, and that they might be upon equal Conditions. And that such Heads as he had delivered against the Duke, being of such matters as he met withal in his Negotiation as an Ambassador, and which he had, according to his duty, acquainted the State withal, might, by their Lordships care and order, be put into Legal form, and prosecuted, for so was the use, when he had the honour to sit at the Council-Table. He said, He conceived he had already done his part to inform, and would be ready to make it good, it concerning their Lordships to see it prosecuted, it not being to be expected that he should sollicite it; or if he would, he could not, being under restraint. And he desired likewise, that the Judges might deliver their opinions, Whether the matter charged against him were Treason? that if it should not be so in their opinions, he might not lie under so heavy a burden.

He

Anno
1616. He put their Lordships in mind, That it was a strange manner of proceeding, that upon a displeasure, a Peer of the Kingdom complaining of those that had practised against him, and had been the causes of his sufferings, should then, and never but then, be charged with Treason. He told them, it was not his case alone, but it equally concerned them, and their Posterity, and, it might be, some others hereafter, more than him now. For, he said, he thanked God, he had some experience in the world, and thereby, and by those things he had kept, was able to make his innocency appear, which, perhaps, would not be every mans hereafter; and so many an honest heart in a good cause distracted with fears, and abandoned of Friends, might perish through the malice of a potent Adversary.

The Lords again asked him whether he had any thing more to say? He answered, No; but desired leave only to explain himself in two things; one in his Speech now spoken, and the other when he was first brought to the House. That in his Speech this day, was, where he affirmed, he had like to have been ruined in his Negotiation: First, for being a Puritan; and now for being a Papist, and both by one hand; he explained it to be by the hand of the Duke of Buckingham. And the other when he first came to the House, saying there, For redress of former sufferings, and meeting on the sudden with Treason charged upon him, he spake in passion, expressing the wrongs and injuries done him by the Duke; and told their Lordships, He had used means to convey part of his sufferings to the late King his Master, who, in the Duke's hearing, swore he would (after he had heard the Duke against him) hear him also against the Duke; for which his Majesty suffered much, or to some such purpose. Now he understandeth this Speech to reflect upon what was in agitation in the lower House; but he said, Although he could not well excuse the Dukes indiscretion in that point, yet he spake it not any ways to corroborate that opinion; for howsoever the Duke were his enemy, yet he could not think so dishonourably of him.

The Answer of the Earl of Bristol to the Articles of several High Treasons, and other great and enormous Crimes, Offences, and Contempts, supposed to be committed by him against our late Sovereign Lord King James of blessed memory, deceased, and our Sovereign Lord the King's Majesty that now is; wherewith the said Earl is charged by his Majesties Attorney-General, on his Majesties behalf, in the most high and honourable Court of Parliament, before the King and the Lords there. And not acknowledging any the supposed Treasons, Crimes, Offences, and Contempts, wherewith he is charged, in, and by the said Articles, to be true; and saving to himself all advantages, benefits, and exception to the uncertainty and insufficiency of the said Articles, and of the several Charges in them contained: And humbly praying, that his Cause may not suffer for want of a Legal form wherunto he hath not been used, but may be judged according to such real and effectual Grounds and Proofs, as may be accepted from an Ambassador (the ground of the Charge growing thence) and that he may have leave to explain himself, and his own meaning, in any thing that may seem of a doubtful Construction. For Answer, saith as followeth,

THe first Article he denieth; and because the matters contained in the said Article consist of several parts; viz. The loss of the said Palatinate, and the match with the said Lady of Spain, and of the several Employments; as of one extraordinary Ambassage to the Emperor, and another to the King of Spain, in the years 1621, 22, and 23. He humbly craves leave of this most Honourable Court to separate the businesses, and distinguish the times.

And beginning with the Palatinate first, to give an account of his Ambassage to the Emperor, and so to make as brief a Deduction as he could of the whole carriage in that business, from the beginning of his employment, to the time he left it; in his Ambassage to the Emperor, he propounded all things faithfully according to his Instructions, and the Answers which he returned to his late Majesty of blessed memory, were the very same, and no other, than such as were given by the Emperor under his Hand and Imperial Seal; the which, according to his duty, he faithfully sent unto his said Majesty, and withal did honestly and truly advertise his said Majesty what he understood and thought then upon the place; but was so far from giving to his Majesty any ill-grounded hopes in that behalf, that he wrote unto the Lords of the Council here in England from Vienna, 26 July, 1624. in such sort as followeth:

I Am further to move your Lordships, that there may be a dispatch made presently into Spain to his Majesties Ambassador, Mr. Cottington, that they deal effectually for the repairing and ripening of the business against my coming; that they use some plain and direct Language, letting the Ministers there know, that the late Letter sent by the King of Spain to the Emperor, was colder and more reserved, than his Master had reason to expect. I shall conclude with telling your Lordships, that although I despair not of good success in that knotty business, yet I hope his Majesty and your Lordships lay not aside the care of all fitting preparations for a War, in case a Peace cannot be honourably had. And amongst other things, I most earnestly commend unto your Lordships, by your Lordships unto his Majesty, the continuing yet abroad, for some small time, of Sir Robert Mansel's Fleet, upon the Coasts of Spain; which, in case his Majesty should be ill used, will prove the best Argument we can use for the Restoration of the Palatinate.

And this his Advice, he saith, was wholly intended by his Actions, by being the cause, as he returned homeward out of Germany, to bring down Count Mansfield, whereby the Town of Frankendale was relieved, by supplying of his Majesties Army, then in great distress, with Moneys and Plate, to the value of 10000 l. meerly out of his zeal and affection to the good of the King and his Children, having no Warrant or Order, but that his heart was ever really bent in effects more than in shews, to serve the King's Son-in-law and his Cause, as by the discourse of this business will appear. And how acceptable these services were, will more appear by the Letters of the Queen of Bohemia, in these words following:

My Lord,

Having understood from Heidelburgh, how you have shewed your affection to the King and me in all things, and in the help of Money you have lent our Souldiers; I cannot let so great Obligations pass, without giving many thanks for it by these Lines, since I have no other means to show my gratefulness unto you: Howsoever assure your self, that I will never be forgetful of the testimonies you give me of your love, which I intreat you to continue, in doing the King and me all good Offices you can to his Majesty. You have been an eye-witness of the miserable estate our Countries are in; I intreat you therefore to sollicite his Majesty for our help: you having given me an assurance of your affection; I intreat you now to show it, in helping of us by your good endeavours to his Majesty; and you shall ever bind me to continue, as I am already,

Your very affectionate Friend,

ELIZABETH.

Which Letters were seconded with others about the same time, both from the King of Bohemia, and Council of Heidelburgh, to the same effect: and how much satisfaction his late Majesty received in that behalf, and touching that business, will plainly appear several ways, and particularly by his Speech in Parliament. And the said Earl likewise appealeth to both Houses of Parliament, to whom, by his late Majesties order, he gave a just and true account of that Employment; with what true zeal he proceeded; and how he pressed that single Treaty, and Promises no longer to be relied on, but that a fitting preparation for War might go along hand in hand with any Treaty of Accommodation. And, for a Conclusion, among many of his late Majesties approbations of his carriage in this Employment, he humbly desired, that a Letter of the Duke of Buckingham's under his own hand, bearing date the Eleventh of October, 1621. may be produced, being as followeth;

My Lord,

I Am exceeding glad that your Lordship hath carried your self so well in this Employment, that his Majesty is infinitely pleased with your service you have done, for which he commanded me to give your Lordship thanks in his names, until he see you himself. You, of all men, have cause to commend his Majesties choice of such a Man, that unless your heart had gone with the business, you could never have brought it to so good a pass. Amongst other things, his Majesty liketh very well the care of clearing his Honour, whereof he will advise further with your Lordship at your next coming over. I hope you will not find your Negotiation with the Infanta of such difficulty, as you seem to fear in your Letter, seeing my Brother Edward hath brought with him a Letter from his Majesties Son-in-law, whereby he putteth himself solely to his Majesties advice and pleasure for his submission, as you will perceive by the Copy of the Letter is self, which I here send your Lordship; wherein, though there be many things impertinent, yet of that point you may make good use for the accomplishment of the business, wherein I have written to the Spanish Ambassador to use his means and credit likewise; which I assure my self he will effectually do, especially seeing the impediments are taken away by Count Mansfield's Composition, and the Conformity of his Majesties Son-in-law to this Submission. For the Money your Lordship hath so seasonably laid forth, his Majesty will see you shall sustain no loss, holding it very unconscionable you should suffer by the care of his Service; which you have shewed so much to his contentment, to the great joy of your Lordships faithful Servant,

Geo. Buckingham

Having given this account of his Employment with the Emperor, he humbly craveth leave to make it known in what sort, before this his Employment, he endeavoured to serve the Prince Palatine and his Cause, which will best appear by his Majesties own testimony, upon the going of Sir Francis Netherfole to the Prince Palatine, at which time his Majesty being, out of his Royal and just heart, desirous to do a faithful Servant Right, commanded Sir Francis Netherfole to let the Prince Palatine understand how good a Servant the said Earl had been unto him, and how active in his affairs, as will best appear by a Dispatch of Sir Francis Netherfole, written all with his own hand to Sir George Calvert, dated in Prague, August 11, 1620. and sent by his late Majesty to the said Earl for his comfort, being as followeth;

Right Honourable,

That you may be the better assured, that I have neither forgotten nor neglected the Commandments received from his Majesty by your Honour; you will be pleased to have the patience to hear me report what I said to this King upon the delivery of my Lord Deputies Letter to his Majesty, which was, That the King my Master, whose Justice is so renowned over the World, did use to shew it in nothing more, than in vindicating his Servants from wrongful opinions, whereof he knew noble hearts more sensible, than of injuries done to their Persons or Fortunes; That out of his Royal disposition his Majesty having found my Lord Digby mistaken by some of his own People at home, by occasion of his being by him employed in the Affairs with Spain, having thereupon received a jealousy, that the same Noble Lord might be also misreported; hitherto his Majesties hands in that respect gave me a particular commandment, to assure his Majesty, he had not a more truly affectionate Servant in England: And for proof thereof, to let his Majesty understand, That whereas the Baron of Doncaster, now his Majesties Ambassador for England, had, since his coming hither, obtained but three great Boons for his Majesties service; viz. the Loan of Money from the King of Denmark, the Contribution in England of the City and Countries, and the sending Ambassadors to the contrary Parties, that my Lord Digby had been the first propounder of all those to the King my Master, before his Majesties Ambassador, or any other of his Majesties Servants in England; although his Lordship were contented, that others, who were but set on, should carry away the thanks and prayers, because his Lordship, being known to be the first mover therein, might possibly weaken the Credit he hath in Spain, and to render himself the more valuable to serve both his own Master and his Majesty; in which respect I humbly prayed his late Majesty to keep this to himself.

By which testimony it may appear, as the said Earl conceiveth, how he, the said Earl, bestowed himself before his Ambassage, and in his said Ambassage with his said late Majesties approbation thereof. Now he humbly craveth leave to give your Lordships account how he proceeded after his return from the Emperor's Court.

As soon as he came into England, he discovered unto his Majesty and the Lords of the Council, in what great wants he had left the Forces in the Palatinate, and solicited the present sending away of Money; thereupon Thirty thousand pounds

Cap. 2.

Ann.
1626. pounds were borrowed of Sir Peter Vanlore, Sir Bayis Hiekt, and Sir William Corinn, and presently sent unto the Palatinate, besides the Ten thousand pounds which he lent, for which he paid the Interest out of his Purse for six months, having also given, not long before, Five hundred pounds, by way of Bepevolence, to the service of the said Palatinate.

Now in the interim, betwixt his return from the English Coasts, which was in November, 1621. and his going into Spain in May, 1622. he first gave his Account, as aforesaid, of his Ambassage to both Houses of Parliament, and moved them effectually, as was possible, for the supplying of his Majesty, and that the money might wholly be employed for the succour of the Palatinate.

The Parliament being dissolved, he solicited, with great care and industry, the settling of some course for the supplying of the Palatinate, and his Majesty was perswaded to maintain Eight thousand Foot, & Sixteen hundred Horse under his own Standard, and at his own Purse, in the Palatinate. To establish a certain course for due payment of the said Army, the Lord Chichester was, upon the said Earl's motion, sent for out of Ireland, and the said Earl, by his Majesties command, took order for his Dispatch. In this estate the said Earl left his affairs at his departure towards Spain, in May 1622. nothing doubting, but that all things would have effectually and constantly been pursued, according to the order which was settled and resolved on at his departure.

His arrival in Spain, and behaviour
there.

At his arrival at the Court of Spain, he presently proceeded according to his Instructions, pressing the business of the Palatinate, as effectually as he could, and faithfully laboured and effected from time to time (as far as to the point of Negotiation) all particulars that were given him in charge, as it will appear by his late Majesties Letter upon every particular occasion; and if by the accidents of War for that Summer, the Marquess of Baden, the Count Mansfeld, and the Duke of Brunswick received each of them an overthrow, (the ordering of whose Affairs his Majesty so far complained of to his Son-in-law, as to give order for the withdrawing of his Forces, as will appear by his Majesties Letters on the third of June, 1622. and also by his Letters unto Sir Horace Vere, and the Lord of Chichester of the same date, if there were not a speedy redress) if by any of those accidents those businesses have miscarried, the said Earl hopes he shall not be liable to the blame, it having no relation to him, or to his employment, having so far and so honestly, with his best affections, employed his care and utmost services in the businesses, as his Majesty was pleased, by many several Letters, upon several actions, to signify his gracious acceptance of his service, as in his Letters of Novemb. 24. 1622. written as followeth; viz.

Your Dispatches are in all points so full, and in them we receive so good satisfaction, as in this we shall not need to enlarge any further, but only tell you, as we are all pleased with this diligent and discreet employment of your endeavours, and all that concerneth our service; so are we likewise with the whole proceedings of our Ambassador, Sir Walter Aston. Thus we bid you heartily farewell.

New-Market, Nov. 24.

And afterwards his Majesty was likewise pleased, in his Letters of 8 January, 1622. a little before our gracious Sovereign Lord the King, then Prince, his coming into Spain; as followeth, Concerning that heavy and unfortunate Affair of the Palatinate, to say the truth, as things stand, I know not what you could have done more than you have done already.

And whereas it is objected, the Palatinate should be lost by the hopes he the said Earl, gave, by his Letters out of Spain, it is an Objection of impossibility; but there was nothing left but Manheim and Frankendale when his first Letters out of Spain could possibly come to his late Majesties hands; for he did not begin to Negotiate that business until August, 1622. and about that time Heidelberg, and all, but Manheim and Frankendale, was lost; and Manheim he had saved by his industry, had it not been so suddenly delivered, as is by his Majesty acknowledged by Letters of 24 Novemb. 1622. written thus; viz.

And howsoever the Order given to the Infanta; for the relief of Manheim, arrived too late, and after the Town was yielded to Tilly; yet must we acknowledge it to be a good effect of your Negotiation, and an Argument of that King's sincere and sound intension.

And Frankendale being, by the said Earls means, once saved, was again the second time saved merely by the said Earls industry; and procuring a Letter from the King of Spain, dated the second of February, 1623. whereupon followed the Treaty of Sequestration, which hath since continued. And he, the said Earl, was so far from hindring Succours by any Letter or Counsel of his, that he was the Solicitor, and, in great part, the Procurer of most of the Succours that had been sent thither, as is formerly set down. And when his Royal Majesty that now is, and the Duke of Buckingham arrived at the Court of Spain, they found the business of the Palatinate in so fair a way, that the Spanish Ministers told them, the King should give his late Majesty a Blank, in which we might frame our own Conditions; and the same he confirmeth unto us now; and the like touching this Blank was likewise acknowledged by the Duke of Buckingham in his Speech in Parliament, after the return of his Majesty out of Spain. And it will appear by the testimony of Sir Walter Aston, and by his and the said Earls Dispatches, that the said Earl wanted not industry and zeal in the business: inso much as the last Answer the said Earl procured herein from the King of Spain, was fuller than he the said Earl was ordered by his late Majesties latest Letters to insist upon. So as by that which hath been alledged, the said Earl hopeth your Lordships will be satisfied, not only that he wanted neither will nor industry, but that he hath, with all true zeal and affection, and with his own means, faithfully served their Majesties, and the Prince Palatine in this Cause: And for assurance in that Affair, he had all that could be between Christian Princes; and if in the said Assurances there hath been any deceit, as by the said Articles is intimated, which he never knew nor believed, he referred it to God to punish their wickedness; for betwixt Princes there can be no greater Tie, than their Words, their Hands and Seals, all which he procured in that behalf; and both the said Earl Anno 1626. Earl and Sir Walter Aston were so confident, that the business would be ended to his late Majesty's satisfaction, that in a joint Dispatch to his late Majesty of 24 November, 1623. after his own Majesties return into England, they wrote as followeth, viz.

We hope that your Majesty may, according to your desire signified to the Earl of Bristol by the Letters of October 8. give to your Majesty's Royal Daughter this Christmas the comfortable news of the near expiring of her great troubles and sufferings, as unto the Prince your Son the Congratulation of being arrived to a most excellent Princess.

And having thus given your Lordships an account of his proceedings touching the Palatinate, he will, by your Lordships good favours, proceed to the other part of that Charge concerning the marriage.

And first, touching his hopes and assurances; that he is charged to have given to his late Majesty, and his Ministers of State here in England, of the Spaniards real proceedings in the said match, when, he said, he knew he never meant it: He saith, he never gave any hopes of their real proceedings, but such, and the very same that were first given to him, without adding or diminishing; neither could he have done otherwise, either with honesty or safety. And he further saith, That the hopes he gave, were not upon any Intelligence; but as well in that of the match, as the other of the Palatinate, his Advertisements were grounded upon all the assurances, both of Words and Writing; that could possibly pass between Christians, as will be made evidently appear by his Dispatch of 9 September, 1623. which he humbly desires may be read, if the length of it may not displease: the Substance being to shew all the Engagements and Promises of the King of Spain, that he really intended the match. And the causes why the Conde Olivares pretended to the Duke of Buckingham, that the match was not formerly meant, was only thereby to free himself from treating any longer with the said Earl, to the end that he might treat for larger Conditions in point of Religion with the said Duke: The said Conde Olivares taking advantage of having the Person of his Majesty, then Prince, in his hands. And with this Dispatch the said Earl acquainted his Majesty that now is, in Spain, before he sent it.

And by this Dispatch the Earl doubted not, but that it will appear to this Honourable Court, that whilst the Treating of this business was in hand, he proceeded in that, not only with care and industry, but with some measure of vigilancy. And for clearing an Objection that hath been alledged, that the match was never meant before the Dukes coming into Spain; nor after; the Earl craveth leave to set down some few Reasons of many, which caused him to believe that the said match was, and hath been really meant, and that it was so conceived by both their Majesties, and the King of Spain, and their Ministers on both sides.

For first, The Duke of Buckingham certified his late Majesty, that the business of the Marriage was brought to a happy conclusion; whereupon his late Majesty was pleased to give order to the Duke and Earl, to proceed in the business; which his said Majesty would not have Treated till the said Marriage was concluded, as will appear by a Letter of his said late Majesty jointly to the Duke of Buckingham and the said Earl, of the 23 July, 1623.

Secondly, It will appear by Letters of the said Lord Conway to the Duke of Buckingham, bearing date, September 4. 1623. That the said Duke had good assurance of the conclusion of the said match; and upon this confidence were all things put in due execution in England, as had been capitulated; and the Lord Conway and others faithfully agreed, and settled all the points of Immunity and Liberty for the Roman Catholics, for the use of their Religion, as was set down in their Declaration, August 6. 1623. hereafter mentioned in the Answer to the fifth Article of this Charge.

Thirdly, The very day his now Majesty and the Duke of Buckingham departed from the Escorial in Spain towards England, the said Duke solemnly swore the Treaty of the said Marriage, and the furtherance of it all that should be in his power, upon the holy Evangelists, in the presence of the said Earl and Sir Walter Aston.

Fourthly, The Treaty of the said Marriage had been formerly signed, sealed, and solemnly sworn by the King of Spain: And when his Majesty and that King took their leaves, he did solemnly, in the words of a King, faithfully and particularly protest to perform all that had been capitulated in the Treaty of Marriage; and thereupon embraced his Majesty at his departure, and sent the very next day a Letter, written all with his own hand, to his Majesty, vowing and protesting to make all good that he had capitulated or promised unto his Majesty, at his departure the day before. So that if there were no true meaning on the part of Spain to make the Marriage, as by Mr. Attorney is pretended, yet certainly the Earl hath not been slightly deceived; neither can it be, as he conceiveth, any fault in him, since not only his late Majesty, but also his Majesty that now is, and the Duke of Buckingham, being then both upon the place, did confidently believe, and that upon other grounds than misinformations, suggestions, and persuasions of the said Earl, that the Marriage was really intended: And to that effect, both his late Majesty of blessed memory, and his most Excellent Majesty that now is, after his return into England, wrote unto him, the said Earl, several Letters, assuring him that their intents and pleasures were to have the said match proceeded in, and thereupon the Proxies of his Majesty, then Prince, were again inrolled and sent unto the said Earl. So that the said Earl having so many and so great causes to be assured, that the match was really intended on both sides, he conceiveth it will be hard for Mr. Attorney to make good that part of his Charge, wherein he affirmeth, that the Earl should know the contrary, or the Assurance to be upon false grounds, as in the said Article is alledged.

II. To the second Article, he directly denieth all the supposed Offences wherewith he stands charged by the said Article. And for a clear declaration and manifestation of the truth and manner of his proceedings, he saith,

First, As to the continuing the Treaties upon Generalities, That the Temporal Articles were by Agreements on both sides not to be treated or settled, until such time as the Articles of Religion were fully agreed on; for that it was held most proper and honourable for both sides, first, to see if the difficulty of Religion might be removed, before they passed to any further Engagements.

Means to shew that the Match was intended by the Spaniards.

And the said Articles of Religion, by reason of the Pope's new Demands sent into England by Mr. Garr, were not signed nor condescended unto by his late Majesty, nor his Majesty that now is, then Prince, until Jan. 5. 1622. and were then sent away in the month of England to the said Earl by Mr. Simon Digby, who arrived with them at Madrid in Spain about the 25th of the same month. But the Earl's care was such to have no time spent in the settling of the Temporal Articles; that before he would condescend so much as to lend off unto the Articles of Religion, that they should be sent back to Rome, he procured the King of Spain to promise, That within the time limited for procuring the Dispensations, which was by March or April following at the furthest, all Temporal Articles should be settled and agreed, to the end that the Infanta might be delivered at the Spring, as by the King of Spain his Answer in writing was declared to be the King's intention; and accordingly Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl did not deal in general, but did most industriously labour to settle all in particular, viz. That the Portion should be Two Millions, it appearing, that it was so agreed by the late King of Spain, That the Dispensation coming, the Dispensations should be within forty days after; and that Don Duarte de Portugal should be the man that should attend the Infanta in the Journey. And all other particulars necessary for the conclusion of the said Treaties, were, by Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl, and the Spanish Commissioners, drawn up into Heads, in writing, and, after many debates, they were consulted with that King; and 2. Martij 1623. styled the Conde Gondomar, and the Secretary Don Andreas de Priola, were appointed to come home to the house of the said Earl, to signify unto Sir Walter Aston and himself, as they did, That the King of Spain had declared his resolution in all the Particulars, and given them order to come to a speedy conclusion with them in all things: And that King's Answer to that Conclusion the Earl saw, and read, all written with the King of Spain's own hand.

On the seventh day of the said month of March 1623. the King's Majesty, then Prince, and the Duke of Buckingham arrived at Madrid; and the Spaniards took new Laws, and the Negotiation was put into a new form. So that whereas it is objected against the Earl, That he entertained and continued the Treaties so long upon Generalities, he conceives it is not meant upon the Spiritual Articles; for they were such as were sent from Rome into England, from thence they came to the Earl: And for the Temporal Articles, they were not to be settled and treated, till the Articles of Religion were concluded. He conceiveth it cannot be alledged with any colour, that his Majesty was entertained with Generalities, since the time that the said Articles of Religion were brought unto the said Earl by Mr. Simon Digby, being about the 25th of January, There were but six weeks until March 7. following, when his Majesty, then Prince, arrived in Madrid; and, in the interim, all the above-mentioned Particulars were settled: And the time that hath been spent in this Treaty, hath not been through his, the said Earl's default, in continuing upon Generalities, without pressing to Particulars, but hath been caused, as well by Difficulties which the business brought with it, as also with exterior Accidents, viz. The Wars of Bohemia, the death of two Popes, and the late King of Spain, without the least fault of the said Earl, as is acknowledged by the late King of blessed memory, in the said Earl his Instructions, on the 14 of March 1622.

Neither could any delay herein be attributed unto him the said Earl; for he was employed in those times into Germany and Flanders, and Sir Walter Aston and Sir Francis Cottington, for the space of three or four years, were resident in Spain; from whence, the hopes they gave were upon all the discreet grounds that Ministers can expect from a State: But the Earl re-assumed this business six months before his Majesties coming into Spain; and he was so desirous to see his Majesty, then Prince, bestowed, that he pressed nothing so much, both to the King and Prince, as that the Prince might lose no more time, and rather to break the match with Spain, than suffer any further delays; as will appear by his Dispatches from his first arrival at the Court of Spain, until his Majesty, then Prince, his coming. For in his Letters of June 20. 1622. being the first he wrote after his first Audience, he was so desirous that no time might be lost, that in them he craveth leave of his Majesty, that in case he should find any Delays in Spain, he might, without expecting any Order, take his leave and come home.

Upon the return of Sir Francis Cottington, in September following, he wrote both to the King, and his Majesty, then Prince. To the King, as followeth;

I Shall presume to add to that which Mr. Cottington shall deliver unto your Majesty by word of mouth, of the present estate of the Match, what I conceive to be the right way to bring it to a speedy issue: That your Majesty will be pleased positively to declare, what you will do in point of Religion, and that you will appoint me a certain limited time, by which this King should procure the Dispensation, or conclude the Match without it; and in case there shall be any further delay therein, that I may then declare your Majesty to be free and disengaged, to bestow the Prince in such sort, as you shall judge most convenient.

And to the Prince, at the same time wrote in these subsequent words, viz.

That which will be necessary for his Majesty presently to do on his Majesties part, is, to declare himself, how far he will be pleased to yield, in point of Religion, as Mr. Cottington will approve unto your Highness: And that he set a prefixed time to break or conclude the Match, either with the Dispensation, or without the same. And for the rest, it may be left to my Negotiation. But your Highness may be pleased to hasten his Majesties resolution with all possible speed.

And the said Earl saith, That having received from his said late Majesty his resolution in point of Religion, and a limited time according to his desire, he was so precise and punctual therein, that although the making or breaking of the Marriage depended upon it, he would not give one months respite longer time for the procuring of the Dispensation, until he had first acquainted his late Majesty therein, and received his Directions under his own hand; as will appear by his Majesties Letters of Octob. 25. 1622, as followeth;

Anno
1626.

Right trusty and well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, We greet you heartily well. Whereas by your last Letter written to our Secretary, dated Sept. 29. you are desirous to have our pleasure signified unto you under our own hand, Whether we will be content or not to grant a Month's time longer, for the coming of the Dispensation from Rome, than we have already limited unto you, in case they shall there conclude all things else to our contentment, with a resolution to send the Infanta hither the next Spring: We do hereby declare unto you, that in that case you shall not break with them for a Month's longer delay. We also wish you not to trouble your self with the rash censure of other men, in case your business should not succeed; resting in that full assurance of our Justice and Wisdom, that we will never judge a good and faithful Servant by the effect of things so coming and variable. And with this assurance we bid you heartily farewell.

And he further saith, That when he had agreed to the Articles of Religion, and that a certain time was set for the coming of the Dispensation, and a Conclusion of the Match, although he would bind himself to nothing without his Majesty's approbation, yet for that no time might be lost, he agreed to the Propositions, de bene esse, sent by Mr. Porter, December 10. 1622. to the end the Articles might be immediately sent to Rome, without losing so much time as to hear first from England: And humbly moved, that in case his Majesty should like of the said Articles, he would send his Approbation directly to Rome for the gaining of time; which his Majesty was pleased to do. And at the same time he wrote both to his said late Majesty, and his Majesty, then Prince, as followeth, viz. to his Majesty,

This is the true state of the business as it now standeth. If your Majesty approve of what is done, I hope it will be a happy and a short conclusion: If your Majesty think it not fit to allow and condescend to the said Articles, I have done the uttermost of my endeavours, and shall humbly persuade your Majesty not to lose a day longer in the Treaty; so much it importeth your Majesty and your Kingdoms, that the Prince were bestowed.

And to the Prince, in Letters of the like date, in this sort,

I have presumed to write to his Majesty, that which I think my duty to say to your Highness; That in case you shall not approve of what is now conditionally agreed, you permit not a day more to be lost in this Treaty: For it is of so great consequence that your Highness were bestowed, that it importeth almost as much that you were speedily, as fully married. But I hope his Majesty, and your Highness, will in such sort approve of this last Agreement, as you will speedily bring this long Treaty to a happy conclusion. I am out of hope of bringing things to any better terms; therefore I deal clearly with your Highness, and do not only most humbly persuade, but, on my knees, beg it of you, that you either resolve to conclude this Match as you may, or speedily to break it, and bestow your self elsewhere; for no less than the happiness of your Kingdom, and the security of the King your Father, and your Self, depend upon it.

All which things being considered, the Earl most humbly submitteth himself to the Judgment of that most High and Honourable Court, whether the delays which Accidents have brought forth in this business, can be attributed to his fault; since on the one side it will evidently appear to your Lordships, that he never moved his Majesty and the Prince to admit of delays, but rather to think of some other course; and it will on the other side appear by all the Dispatches, that he pressed things with the Ministers of Spain to as speedy a conclusion, as the uttermost terms of fair Negotiation and good manners would bear. And whereas it is pretended, that the Spaniards should take occasion, by entertaining the said Treaties, to abuse his said late Majesty (which he knoweth not) yet, he saith, he used all the vigilancy and industry that a careful Minister could do, and had from the Spaniards all the assurances, by Oaths, Words, and Writings, which could be expected from Christians; the which, without adding or diminishing, he faithfully presented unto his said late Majesty; and his said late Majesty was pleased, in those times, to conceive upon those assurances, that they dealt really with him: And he conceiveth that his Majesty that now is, then Prince, and the Duke of Buckingham, were pleased to write as much to the late King's Majesty, at their first coming into Spain, and that all which the Earl had written, touching that employment, was there avowed by the Conde Olivarez and Conde Gondomar, to the said Prince and Duke, at their arrival at Madrid; and he hopeth, that if that Dispatch may be perused, it will as well appear and be adjudged, that he served his Majesty with some measure of vigilancy, as well as fulness of fidelity.

III. To the the third Article the said Earl saith, That he did not, either by words or by Letters to his late Majesty or his Ministers, extol, or magnifie the greatness and power of the King of Spain, nor represented to his late Majesty the supposed danger that might ensue unto him if a War should happen between him and the King of Spain, nor affirmed, nor insinuated the same, as in the said Article is mentioned; but if he did at any time speak or write of the power and greatness of the King of Spain, or represent any danger to his said late Majesty that might ensue by entering into Hostility with the said King of Spain, it was as a faithful Counsellor and Servant to his Majesty by way of his Advice and Opinion, which he ever delivered sincerely, faithfully, and truly, according to the present occasion, and in no wise with such an intent as in the said Article is mentioned, nor to any other evil intent or purpose whatsoever.

But he hath been so far from dissuading his late Majesty to take Arms, that he hath upon all just occasions advised, that all fitting preparations for War might be made, as beginning with the year 1621. from which time he is only charged, will appear by his Speech in Parliament presently after his return out of Germany; and that he hoped his Majesty would no longer rely upon single Treaties, but make all fitting preparations for War; and that the Parliament would enable his Majesty thereunto; and by the care he took before his going again upon his Embassy into Spain, that the establishment of an Army under his Majesty's own Standard, of Horse and Foot, and under his own pay, might be settled and provided for; as likewise his advice to the Lords of the Council, that his Majesty might have a curb upon the King of Spain upon all occasions, by continuing of Sir Robert Mansfield's Fleet upon the Coasts of Spain, as will appear by his Letter written from Vienna, 26 July

Car. 2.

He never dissuaded
the King to take Arms.

Anno 1626. 26 July, 1621. mentioned in the answer to the first Article. By all which it appeareth, that he laboured and endeavoured as much as in him lay, that his Majesty might be well prepared for any occasions of War that should happen. And he no way remembered to have discourag'd, or to have spoken or written any thing that might have been understood to have tended to the discouraging of his said late Majesty for the taking of Arms, and entering into Hostility with Spain, or for resisting of him and his Forces, from attempting the Invasions of his late Majesty's Dominions, or the Dominions of his late Majesty's Confederates, Friends or Allies, as by the said Articles is charged against him; neither remembereth that he had any cause so to do. But if he have in any kind spoken or written of Spain, or the power thereof, it may have been to his late Majesty, or to his Majesty that now is, by way of discourse, speaking of the solidness of the Spanish proceedings, of their serious and deliberate debating of business before they resolve on them, of the constant pursuing of them when they are once resolved, wishing that England and other Nations would therein imitate them: For he supposeth the right way to impeach their greatness was to grow as wise as they, and to beat them at their own Weapons. But otherwise he is confident never to have been heard to speak or write any thing that might have any terror or discouragement, to his late Majesty or his chief Ministers, knowing that England well ordered, need to take little terror at the power of Spain, having almost in all attempts and enterprises won honour upon them. And as for the preventing of dangers that might ensue upon a War, though he knew not what is aimed at in that particular: yet he is most confident out of the Integrity of his own Conscience, That he neither said, nor advised any thing but what befitted a faithful Counsellor and Ambassador, which was truly to deliver his opinion as he understood it upon the present occasion. And as for affirming that his Majesty's quiet should be disturbed, and he not to be permitted to Hawk or to Hunt, he remembereth not what discourse he may have had, or written to any person, how fit it might be upon the being broiled in a great War, seriously to intend it, and make it our whole work. But as he is confident it will appear, that what discourse soever it might have been, it wanted not true zeal and affection which he hath ever born to the King's Service, and he hopeth it will not be found to want due respect and reverence on his part, which he ought to shew to so gracious a Master. Neither can it be conceived, that the considerations of Hunting and Fowling, should be considerations worthy so great and prudent a King, to withhold from a War for the good of Christendom, and his Kingdom, if he should have been justly provoked thereunto.

IV. To the Fourth Article the said Earl saith, That he did not any thing contrary to his duty and Allegiance, or contrary to the faith and duty of an Ambassador, as by this Article is alledged; but did intend the service and honour of his late Majesty; and no corrupt and sinister ends of his own advancement, as by this Article is so alledged. And as for the Conference which is pretended he should hold concerning the Treaty, That being told there was little probability that the said Treaties would or could have good success, he should acknowledge as much; and yet said, he cared not what the success thereof might be, but that he would take care to have his Instructions perfect, and to pursue them punctually, and would make his Fortune thereby, or words to that effect; he doth not remember ever to have held such discourse. Though it be true, the time hath been many years since, when he thought the Match very unlike to be effected, in regard unequal Answers were given in Prince Henry's daies, and of the unlikelihood of accommodating the differences of Religion. And saith further, That the reviving of the Treaty of the said Match for his Majesty that now is, was not by his means, for he ever declared his opinion clearly, both to his late Majesty and to his Majesty that now is, That in the first place he wished and advised a Protestant Match, but in the duty of a Servant understanding that both their Majesties desired the Match really with Spain, he did really and faithfully intend the service and honour of their Majesties, and effectually endeavoured to procure their ends. And it is very likely he might say, he would get his Instructions perfect, and pursue them punctually, as he conceived was lawful and fit for him; but the latter part of his Conference, that he should say he would make his fortune by it, or any other words to that effect, he was in Anno 1621. and ever since of that rank and quality, both in regard of his Employments, Fortunes, and his Majesty's favours, that he assureth himself he did not, and dares Answer so far for his discretion, That it was impossible for him to hold so mean and unworthy discourse.

V. To the Fifth Article he saith, That what is therein alledged, is so far from being so, that contrarily upon all occasions to the uttermost of his power, he did labour to prevent all the inconveniencies in point of Religion that might come by matching with a Princess of a different Religion, as well appeareth by the Paper of his opinion, that his Majesty should marry with a Lady of his own Religion, hereafter mentioned in his answer to the Seventh Article. And for further proof thereof, he saith, That in the whole Treaty with Spain, he stood more strict in points of Religion, than by his Instructions he needed to have done, as will appear by the Testimony of Sir Walter Aston, and his Dispatches, of the Twelfth of December 1622. and other Dispatches, which he desireth may be read. And as for concealing or Perswading to set at Liberty the Priests or Jesuits, he utterly denieth to have done any such thing, as before he hath answered. Although it be true, that the Embassage in Spain be far different from the employment of other places, where there is a Body of our Reformed Religion, and whereby his Majesty hath Kindred and Allies; whereby his Majesty's Ministers may be informed of the necessary Occurrents of State without the helps of Priests or Jesuits. But in Spain there being none but Roman Catholics, nor any manner of correspondence or intelligence but by them, the Embassadors must make use of all sorts of People, especially of Jesuits and Priests, and to that end Embassadors sent thither have a large and particular Warrant under the King's hand, to treat and make use of Priests and Jesuits, and all other sorts of men, unless it be such as are proclaimed Rebels. And divers times the Ministers employed in Spain, to gratifie some whom there they employed for the King's service, have, as he believeth, at their particular Suit moved his Majesty to extend Grace and Favour to some particular Friend, and Kinsman of his, being a Roman Catholic, and imprisoned in England; and that he remembereth

He advised both King and Prince to a Protestant Match.

He never moved his Majesty to set Priests at liberty.

Anno 1626: bereth to have happened to others, but doeth not remember himself to have written to his late Majesty in that kind: And as concerning his advice and Counsel, to set at liberty Jesuits and Priests, and the granting to the Papists a Toleration, or the silencing the Laws against them, he said, that his late Majesty was engaged by the Treaty of Madrid, 1617. in divers matters concerning Religion; likewise by promise to Cande Gondomar, and his Letters to the King of Spain, 17 April, 1620. wherein he is pleased to promise some particulars in favour of Roman Catholicks, as by the said Letters will appear: And understanding the said Earl had sufficient Warrant under the King's own hand to assure the King of Spain whatsoever was agreed in the said Article, or in the said Letters, his Majesty would sincerely perform; yet the said Earl was so cautious in that point, that when for the conclusion of the Match, the other Articles of Religion being allowed, it was pressed by the Spanish Ministers, that a Clause of Convenience might be inserted with Protestation, That the form and way thereof should be wholly left to his Majesty's wisdom and clemency, and that his Majesty's Roman Catholick Subjects should acknowledge this Grace to have come from the King's Majesties mercy and goodness: Yet the said Earl would not condescend hereunto De bene esse, as by his Letters to Master Secretary Calvert, 8 October 1622. will appear, hereby to give his Majesty time to have recourse unto his second Consultation, and to take it into consideration before he would engage or bind himself in this point: But his late Majesty and his Majesty that now is, were pleased to condescend hereunto by signing the said Articles with their own hands, and likewise by writing their private Letters of the eighth of January, 1622. to that effect to the King of Spain, as by the said Letters will appear. Neither did the said Earl by Letters, or otherwise, ever counsel or perswade his late Majesty, to grant or allow unto the Papists or Professors of the Romish Religion a free Toleration, and Silencing of the Laws made and standing in force against them, but ever protested against any such Toleration; and when any such provision hath been offered to be made in Spain, he ever refused so much as to give ear to it, or to suffer it to be propounded; although it be true; that he hath since seen a Paper touching Pardons, Suspensions, and Dispensations for the Roman Catholicks, bearing date the seventh of August, 1623. signed by the Lord Conway, and others, which in effect is little less than a Toleration; which Paper is that which followeth.

Salisbury, 7 August, 1623.

The Declaration touching the Pardons, Suspensions, and Dispensations of the Roman Catholicks.

A Declaration signed by my Lord Conway in behalf of the Roman Catholicks.

FOR the satisfaction of their Excellencies, the Marquess Ynojosa and Don Carlos de Colonia, the Lords Ambassadors for the King of Spain; and to the end it may appear that his Majesty of Great Britain will presently and really put in Execution the Grace promised and intended to the Roman Catholicks his Majesties Subjects, and of his own Grace more than he is tied to by the Articles of Treaty of Marriage:

Car. 2.

We do declare in his Majesties Name, That his Majesties Will and Pleasure is, that a Legal and Authentick Pardon shall be passed under the Great Seal, wherein shall be truly pardoned all those Penalties, Forfeitures, and Seizures, Indemnities, Commitments, and Incumbrances whatsoever, whereunto the Roman Catholicks are liable or have been proceeded against, or might be, as well Priests, as others, for matters of Conscience only, and to which the rest of his Majesties Subjects are not liable. And to the end his Majesty may make himself clearly understood, where it shall happen that any of those Forfeitures and Pecuniary Penalties have been given away under his Majesty's Great Seal; his Majesty will not hide that it is not in his power so to make void those Letters Patents, except they be voidable by Law; and then his Majesty is well pleased that all Roman Catholicks may in these Cases plead in Law, if they find it good; and shall have equal and legal Trial. And his Majesty is likewise pleased, that his General Pardon shall remain in being five years, to the end, all that will, may in that time take it out; and his Majesty will give order for the Comfort of the poorer sort, that the Pardon shall not be costly, but such-like course shall be taken as was in a like occasion at his Majesty's coming into England; and that it shall be lawful to put as many as can be possible into one Pardon.

And we do further Declare, That his Majesty's Will and Pleasure is, to the end the Roman Catholicks his Majesties Subjects may have a present and a free fruition of as much as is intended them by the Articles of Treaty of Marriage, to cause a present Suspension under his Majesties Seal of all those Penal Laws, Charges, and Forfeitures, whereunto the Roman Catholick Subjects of his Majesty have heretofore been subject, and to which the rest of his Majesties Subjects have not been liable; and in the same Grant and under the same Seal, to give a Dispensation and Toleration to all the Roman Catholicks his Majesties Subjects, as well Priests, as Temporal persons and others, of and from all the Penalties, Forfeitures, Commitments, and Incumbrances, which they have been or may be subject to, by reason of any Statute or Law whatsoever, to the observation whereof the rest of his Majesties Subjects are not bound. We do likewise declare, that his Majesty hath promised in his Royal Word, that the execution shall be no waies burthenome or penal to the Roman Catholicks, but that for the manner of publishing, and freeing them from that, he must confer with Bishops and Advocates, into which he will presently enter and expedite by all means.

And we do further declare, That his Majesties intention is presently to pursue his former Directions (which had been before executed, if their Excellencies had so thought good) to put under his Seal severally the said Pardon, and Suspension, and Dispensation; and that his Majesties Attorney and learned Counsel shall have referred to them the Charge to pen them with all those effectual effectual words, clauses, expressions, and reservations, which may presently give satisfaction to the Roman Catholics, his Majesties Subjects, and make them inviolable in the fruition of all that is intended and promised by his Majesty in the Articles of Marriage, and his Majesties further Grace.

And we do declare, That his Majesties further Will and Pleasure is, for the better satisfaction and discharge of the care and endeavour of their Excellencies the Ambassadors, that it shall be lawful to them to assign a discreet person to entertain such sufficient Lawyers as shall be thought fit to take care to the strength, validity, and security of the said Grants: and his Majesties Attorney shall have charge to receive and admit the said Lawyers to the sight and judgment of the said Draughts, and in any doubts to give them satisfaction, or to use such legal, necessary, and pertinent words and phrases, as the said Lawyer shall propound for the security of the Roman Catholics, and sure making of the said Grants.

And we do further declare, That his Majesties pleasure is, to make a dispatch into Ireland unto his Deputy there, by the hands of the Lord Treasurer and Secretary of State Sir George Calvert, for the present confirming and sealing the things concerning the Roman Catholics answerable to the Articles of Treaty, his Royal Promise and Proceedings here. And for Scotland, That his Majesty according to the Constitution of his Affairs there, ad regard to the Publick good and peace of that Kingdom, and as soon as possible, will do all that shall be convenient for the accomplishment of his promise in Grace add favour of the Roman Catholics his Subjects, conformable to the Articles of Treaty of Marriage.

But this Declaration, the said Earl saith and affirmeth was the effect of the Duke of Buckingham's Negotiation, and treated and concluded by the Lord Conway with the Spanish Embassadour here, whilst the Prince was in Spain; neither was his privy or advice in it; For if he had known it, he should have protested against it. All which, together with the difference betwixt the Conditions of Religion agreed at the Treaty of Madrid, 12 December, 1622. by the said Earl, and the said Sir Walter Aston, being by their Lordships considered, the said Earl doubteth not but that it will manifestly appear whose endeavour it was to advance the Romish Religion, and the professors thereof; and judges the said Earl most unfortunate to be charged with an Article of this kind.

VI. To the Sixth Article the Earl saith, That the Assurances which he gave his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, concerning the Treaties, were such, That it had been dishonesty and breach of his duty and trust, for him to have held them back, being the same that were given him by the Emperour, and the King of Spain, and their Ministers, upon as great Assurances as can pass between Ministers of Princes in the like case. And for the Delays of Spain they could be never so ill, and with so little colour complained of, as at the time of his Majesties coming thither; for that a certain time was before then prefixed for the coming of the Dispensation, viz.

in April, 1623. at the furthest, which was the next Month after the Princes arrival at Madrid; the Dispensations were to be within four daies following, and the Infanta begin her Journey into England twenty daies after: So as three months patience longer would have shewed the issue of the business without putting of the person of the Prince, being Heir Apparent to the Crown, in so eminent a hazard for the trying of an experiment. And it is an argument of great suspicion, because the Spaniards were suspected to have dealt falsely, and so the less to be trusted with the Person of the Prince, to be put into their hands to try conclusions: But the truth is, though that were made the pretended ground, and the occasion of the Journey, it was neither the Assurances of the said Earl, nor the jealousies of Spain, but other Motives that were the original cause of his Majesties said Journey, as shall be sufficiently made apparent in due time. And the said Earl having got an inkling of it by something that was let fall from the Conde Gondomar to that purpose, instantly dispatched away by Mr. Grishy to his late Majesty to have his Journey prevented; who upon the Confines of France, met with his Majesty and the Duke of Buckingham on his Journey towards Spain, and told them as much. So that although he confesseth what is laid in the Charge to be true, viz. That by the said Journey, the person of the Prince, the peace and safety of the Kingdom, did undergo further danger. (at the remembrance whereof the hearts of all good Subjects do tremble) yet the blame is due to the Authors and Advisers of the same Journey, and not to the said Earl; And although it pleased God, to the exceeding great joy and comfort of the said Earl, and of all good men, to send his gracious Majesty home with safety, yet never was the person of any Prince, upon such grounds, exposed to so great an hazard; and in such Cases, not the Success but the Counsellors are considerable.

VII. To the Seventh Article the said Earl saith, that he did not move or perswade his Majesty, then Prince, to change his Religion neither in the manner in the said Article mentioned, nor in any other manner whatsoever: Neither doth he conceive, that the charge in it self as it is laid, will in any reasonable construction bear any such inference as is made therein; so as he conceiveth, he needeth not make any further or other answer thereunto. Yet that it may appear that the manner he used to the said Prince, was not traiterously, falsely, or cunningly, nor without ground, or to any such intent, as in the said Article is supposed, and to manifest unto this most High and Honourable Court, how far he was from all such intention, he saith, That he doth acknowledge that within few daies after his Majesties coming into Spain, whilst he had the great honour to have his Majesty lodged at his House and to have so Royal a Guest, finding by the Spanish Ministers, That there was a general opinion, that his Majesties coming thither was with an intention to become a Roman Catholick; and the Conde Gondomar having that very morning pressed the Earl not to hinder so pious a work (as he term'd it) of his Majesties Conversion, and seeming to be assured of the Duke of Buckingham's assistance therein, his Majesty being all alone in a withdrawing Room in the said Earl his House, the said Earl kneeled unto him, and told him, That he had a business to impart unto him, which highly imported his Majesty to know, so that he might be

He perswaded not the Prince to change his Religion.

Anno 1626. be assured his boldness therein might be pardoned; which his Majesty graciously promised. And thereupon the said Earl told his Majesty, That the general opinion of the Court was, that his Majesties coming into Spain, was with an intention to be a Roman Catholick, and there to declare it. And he confesseth, That at the same time in regard of those things he had heard, he humbly besought his Majesty to deal freely with him as a Servant, of whose fidelity he might be confident, or words to that effect: but he was so far from perswading his Majesty to be a Roman Catholick, that without respecting his Majesties Answer he declared himself to be a Protestant; and so should alwaies continue; yet he said, he should alwaies serve his Majesty and labour to advance his and the King his Fathers affairs, with as much fidelity and honesty, as any Catholick whatsoever: and his Majesty was pleased then to make unto the said Earl a full and clear Declaration of his Religion, and of his constant resolution therein; and seemed to be much displeased, that any should have so unworthy an opinion of him, as to think he would for a Wife, or any other earthly respect whatsoever, so much as waver in his Religion. Whereupon the said Earl besought his Majesty to pardon his boldness and then intreated him not to suffer his business to be overthrown by permitting that conceit of his conversion any longer to remain in the Spaniards, nor to any thing that might give them hope therein, alledging, That it was impossible the Marriage could be without a Dispensation; and so long the Spaniards, who were to procure the Dispensation, should have hope of his Majesties Conversion, they would never content themselves with a part; to which they were tyed by the Articles agreed upon with the said Earl and Sir Walter Aston. At which time his Majesty was pleased to approve of his opinion, and said, he would expect the Dispensation, and did thereupon afterwards send Mr. Andrews to Rome to hasten it; and the next day the said Earl dealt very roundly with the Conde Olivares and Gondomar, telling them it was a discourteous manner of proceeding to press his Majesty to further Conditions than were formerly agreed upon in point of Religion, and to make his Conditions the worse, for the great Obligation he had put upon them by putting himself into their hands; whereat they took such great offence, that they estranged themselves from him for along time after. And that the said Earl did thus proceed with the said Condes, and that it was not a new framed Answer to satisfy present Objections; but that which really and indeed passed, will really appear by his Dispatches unto his late Majesty of blessed Memory; and before his Majesty that now is, came out of Spain, they were there shewed unto his Majesty, bearing date the ninth of September, 1623. So that although it be true, That he the said Earl did not dissuade his Majesty, for that there was no cause for it; yet without expecting his Majesties Answer, he first made a clear and true Profession of his own Religion; and when his Majesty had declared to him his zeal and constancy, he humbly besought him, That the Spaniards might not for any respect be longer held in hopes of that point. And because point of Religion is that which all men of honour and honesty should chiefly desire to clear, especially having an imputation of that nature laid upon them, as the said Earl hath in the said Article, He humbly beseecheth your Lordships, that he may not seem to digress from his Charge; intending your Lordships satisfaction in that particular, not by the aforesaid verbal discourse only, which he professeth was in much zeal to Religion and dutiful care to the Prince in that kind, but by some written Testimony of his former opinion both of the Match and Religion. When he was first employed into Spain for the Treaty of this Marriage, 1617. his late Majesty having commanded him to give an account thereof unto his Majesty that now is, he at his departure towards Spain, presumed to give unto his Majesty that now is, his opinion in Writing signed with his own hand, to be kept as a Testimony of future Actions, the Copy whereof is this as followeth.

Sir,

The Opinion which I have ever presumed humbly to offer unto his Majesty concerning your Highness Marriage, hath been, that both in regard of Conscience and Satisfaction unto his Majesties People and Allies; likewise for the security and quiet of your Majesties estates, Your Highness might take for Wife some Protestant Princess, although she neither were Daughter to a King, nor had so ample a Portion as might relieve the King's present Necessities and Wants; for then there might be many waies found to help the King's wants, either by some few years providence, and frugality, or by winning the affections of the people to the supplying of his Majesty by way of Subsidies in Parliament; whereas contrariwise, if the number and power of the Papists shall be increased, as undoubtedly they will be by your Highness marching with any Catholick Princess, through the concession which must be of necessity for the exercise of her Religion for her self and Family, within your Highness Courts, and thereby by degrees these two different Religions shall grow to an equality of power; it will be great hazard and disquiet to the State, and not to be redressed without great danger, and courses of more violence, than is usual for this State to put in practice. But in case his Majesty out of his wisdom and consideration best known to himself, hold it fittest that your Highness march with France, or Spain, or any other Catholick, either for that the present time affordeth no Protestant Princess, who is for years or Blood suitable for your Highness, or that can in any considerable measure by the Portion, supply his Majesties present wants, I then conceive that the Match by which this State shall suffer least inconveniency and cumbers, and whereby his Majesties necessities shall by the greatness of the Portion be the most relieved, is with Spain, if such a Match may be made with such conditions of Religion, as other Catholick Princes will contract themselves withal.

Thus much I thought fit humbly to present unto your Highness, for that I see my employment liable to the censure of many worthy Persons, with whom though I concur in my opinion, yet I seem much to differ from them many waies, for that it is more proper to me to be true to my Master's ends and services, than by the declaring this, to procure their satisfaction: Only to your Highness I thought fit to make this declaration, and shall be a Suitor to you for your favour, as you shall see me really labour to put this in effect. And if his Majesty shall, either upon motion of Parliament, or any other Proposition that can be made unto him, think fit to proceed with a Protestant Match, as I shall wish as well unto it as any man living, so, I hope, in such sort to manage the present business that I have in hand; that it shall rather much further, than any way cross or hinder it. But in case his Majesty shall not be drawn to any Proposition for a Protestant Match, I

then conceive, that your Highness both doth, and Anno will approve, that I really and effectually labour to Conditions, in point of Religion and Portion, as to his Majesty shall seem fit.

He constantly professed the Protestant Religion.

Besides which Declaration of his Opinion, he hath all the daies of his life, and in all places, lived and allowed himself to be a Protestant, never having done any the least act that was not suitable to that Profession: And in all his former Employments for the space of fourteen years, of more than five hundred persons of all qualities that attended on him, there was never one perverted in his Religion, saving two Irish Foot-men, who, in Ireland had been bred Papists. And he humbly desired testimony of Doctor Mason, and Doctor Wren, his Majesties Chaplains, who were with his Majesty in Spain, and of Mr. Sampford, one of the Prebends of Canterbury, Mr. Boswell, Parson of St. Lawrence in London, and Mr. Frewen Divinity-Reader in Magdalen-Colledge in Oxford, and now one of his Majesties Chaplains, who were his Majesties Chaplains in Spain; as well for the frequent use of the Sacrament, as constant profession and exercises of Religion, and the testimony of such Catholicks as are known to have been his antient Acquaintance and Friends, to examine them upon Oath, Whether publickly or privately, in Spain or in England, they had known him in any kind to make shew, or so much as to forbear, upon all occasions to declare the Religion he professeth. And that the said Mr. Frewen and Mr. Wake may be also examined, Whether in extremity of several sicknesses, whereinto he hath of late years fallen, he hath not ever settled his Conscience with them towards God, and made a Confession of his Faith, resolving as befitting a Protestant or good Christian.

VIII. To the Eighth Article the Earl saith, That he did not at any time, or in any place, endeavour to perswade the Prince touching his Religion, to become a Roman Catholick, and to be obedient to the usurped Authority of Rome; neither did the said Earl, to that end and purpose, or otherwise, use unto his Majesty, then Prince, the words in the Article mention'd. But the said Earl acknowledgeth, That upon occasion of a Letter that came to his Majesty, then Prince, putting his Majesty in mind of the great actions of his Royal Progenitors in the Holy War, that the great Kings of those times did not only employ their Forces, but in their Persons went into the Holy Land; the Earl believeth that by way of discourse only, and not otherwise, he may have said, That in regard of the difference in Religion, it was of more difficulty to undertake such great actions now, than in former Ages; and it might well be instanced in the present Treaty of the Marriage, wherein the Pope's consent was to be obtained. And to this effect, and upon the like grounds, he is confident there were very many that have, nay, few of nearness about his late Majesty, that have not often heard his Majesty say, That he was the true Martyr, that suffered more for his Religion than all the Princes of Christendom besides; instancing in divers particulars, but especially in this, That he could not match his Children with Kings of his own rank, without the Pope's leave.

But the said Earl saith, He never alledged any such thing to any other purpose, than to shew, that only Conscience, and love to Truth, (in which regard, Protestants suffered much) not any Temporal respects, made men constant and zealous to the profession of our Religion. By which discourse he ever attributed much to the honour and security of Protestant Religion; but never used it as an Argument to perswade to the contrary, as in the Accusation is insinuated.

Besides, he conceiveth, by way of Answer thereunto, the said Question may be asked, which his Majesty was pleased to ask of the Earl in the Seventh Article, viz. What the said Earl saw in his Majesty, that he should think him so unworthy, as to change his Religion for a Wife, or any earthly respect whatsoever? So, why should it be thought, that being more fit to undertake great Actions in the World (being a meer Moral and Temporal respect) should be an Argument to perswade in Conscience so Religious and wise a Prince, and so well instructed as his Majesty is, as though the Soul of a Christian Prince was to be wrought upon, in point of Truth and Belief, by temporal and worldly respects of Conveniencies and Greatness. It were necessary for the proving, that the said Earl perswaded his Majesty touching Religion, to produce some Arguments that he used out of Scripture, to satisfy him in point of Conscience in some Tenets of the Roman Church, or that he produced any Conference with Learned men for his satisfaction in point of Religion: Otherwise the Articles used in this against the said Earl, do (as he conceiveth) carry little strength to prove the Charge of perswading his Majesty, either in regard of it self, or in regard of his Majesties piety.

IX. To the Ninth Article the said Earl saith, That there was a discourse in Spain of the way of accommodating the Prince Palatine his Affairs; and by way of discourse it was moved, That the Marriage of his eldest Son with a Daughter of the Emperour, and his Son to be bred in the Emperour's Court, would be the fairest way for the pacifying of, and accommodating those businesses: And the Earl, by way of discourse, and not otherwise, did say, That he thought his late Majesty could not be adverse, either to the said Match, or to the breeding of the Prince Palatine his Son with the Emperour; so as thereby the whole Patrimonial Estate of the Prince Palatine, and the Dignity Electoral might be fully restor'd, and that his Son might be bred in his own Religion, and have such Preceptors, and such a Family, as his late Majesty and his Father, meaning the Prince Palatine, should appoint; and they to have free exercise of Religion: For so his late Majesty hath often declared himself to the said Earl, and wished him to lay hold on any occasion for the entertaining of any such Proposition. And otherwise than so, & upon the terms aforesaid, & by that way of Conference and discourse only, he delivered not any opinion to his Majesty at his Majesties being in Spain: For the said Earl is very confident, that his Majesty was returned out of Spain before any Proposition was made for the said Marriage, other than by way of discourse, as aforesaid; the same, as the said Earl believeth, being first moved and debated on by way of Proposition between Mr. Secretary Calvert, and the Embassador of the King of Spain, Octob. 2. 1623. his late Majesty, upon a relation made unto him by a Letter of Mr. Secretary Calvert, approved of the said Proposition, and declared the same to be the only way, as he conceived, to accommodate with honour those great businesses: And wrote to that pur-purpose to his Son-in-Law the Prince Palatine, by his Letters date 9 Novemb. 1623. a Copy of which, he, together with Mr. Secretary Calvert's Relation, and the Lord Conway, by his late Majesties commandment, sent unto the said Earl; the Tenor of which, translated out of French, is as followeth,

James proposeth a Match to the Prince Palatine, between his eldest Son and the Em-perors Daughter.

WE have thought good, that we may provide best and most soundly for your Affairs, not only to procure, but also to assure your peace, were to cut up by the very roots that evil, which hath been settled in the heart of the Emperour, by the great displeasure and enmity he hath conceived against you. For the removing and quite extinguishing of which, it seemeth to us no better or more powerful means can be used, than a good Alliance, which may be proposed by us between your eldest Son, and the Daughter of the said Emperour, upon the assurance we have, we shall not be refused in this nature, if you on your part will give your consent. And for the more surety of the good success thereof, we are determined, before any such Proposition be made to the Emperour, to interest the King of Spain with us in the business, who, we trust, will lend us his helping hand, as well for the effecting of it, and bringing it to a good conclusion, as in procuring likewise, that the Condition be duly observed. Amongst which Conditions, if it happen that the Emperour should demand, that your Son, during his minority, should be brought up in his Court, we shall tell you, that we, for our own part, see no reason why you should stick at it, upon such Conditions as he might be ryed unto, to wit, That the young Prince should have with him such Governour, as you shall please to appoint him, although he be no Roman Catholick; and that neither he, nor any of his, should be any way forced in matter of their Conscience. And our meaning is, so to order our proceeding in this Treaty, that before your said Son be put into the hands of the Emperour, we will have a clear and certain assurance of an honourable, entire, and punctual restitution of all whatsoever belonging to you: As also we will take care to provide accordingly, as fully and exactly for the Assurance requisite for the Liberty of Conscience, for him and his Domesticks, as they have done here with us touching those that have been granted them for the Infanta. And therefore seeing there is on inconvenience at all, that may cause your averfeness or backwardness in this business, which we, for parts, think to be the best, shortest, and most honourable way that you can take, for the compassing of the entire restitution, and making your Peace sure with the Emperour, we hope your opinion will concur with us therein, and shall intreat you, by the first, to send us your Answer.

By which Letters, after his Majesties coming out of Spain, it appeareth to your Lordships, that there was no Proposition of the Marriage between the Son of the Prince Palatine and the Emperour's Daughter, when that Letter was written; for therein his Majesty saith, he was determined to interest the King of Spain in the business, before any such Proposition should be made to the Emperour. And it will also thereby appear, that his late Majesties opinion was of the conveniency thereof; which the said Earl hopeth will acquit him, if by way of discourse only he declared what his Majesties inclination was, which, with honesty, he could not have concealed. And the said Earl saith, He doth not remember what Answer Sir Walter Aston made upon that discourse which he then delivered, nor what Replies the said Earl made; but sure he is, whatsoever the said Earl said, or what Answer or Reply soever was made, as it was by way of discourse, and not otherwise, so it was according to that which he truly conceived to be the best and easiest way to accommodate the business, and to be his Majesties pleasure; (which the said Sir Walter Aston may be ignorant of, (as he is confident that he was) and not out of any disaffection to our Religion, or for any sinister respect or regard to the House of Austria, as by the said Article is intimated: For he did conceive the breeding of the Prince Palatine's Son with the Emperour, having a Governour appointed by his late Majesty and his Father, and he and his Domesticks to have free use of their own Religion, to be a matter of impossibility, or such dangerous consequence in point of Religion, as to imply his Conversion, as by the Article is intimated; well knowing, that in the Emperour's Court, all Princes there, though his Prisoners, and others his Counsellors and Servants about his Person, and of great Command in his Armies, being avowed Protestants, have the free use of their Religion: And it is not to be supposed the Son of the Prince Palatine, Grandchild to the King of Great Britain, should be matched, and no care taken to capitulate for the use of his Religion, being ever granted to the meanest Prince that is bestowed. And his Majesties special care in this point is fully seen in the said Letter.

X. To the Tenth Article he saith, That by comparing of this Article of his too much forwardness, with the Second Article, whereby he is charged with continuing the Treaty upon Generalities, without reducing them to Certainities and direct Conclusions, your Lordships will perceive how impossible it was for him to avoid an Exception. But for direct Answer to the present Charge, he saith, That he did not presumptuously, nor yet to his knowledge, break his Instructions, nor set any day at all for the Desponsories; but was therein merely passive, in admitting the day nominated by the King of Spain, according to the Capitulation before made: Nor did he presumptuously, wilfully, or willingly disobey any Commandment or Direction of his Majesty that now is, then Prince, which he could understand not to be countermanded, either by present or future Instructions otherwise explained.

And for the better manifestation of the truth of his proceedings in, and concerning the same, he saith, That on the day of the departure of his Majesty, then Prince, from the Escorial in Spain, his Highness delivered unto him, in presence of the Commissioners, his Proxies powers, with publick Declaration taken in writing by the Secretary to the King of Spain, of the Prince his pleasure, and how the said Earl should use them, viz. That he should deliver them to the King of Spain, upon the coming of the Dispensation cleared from Rome, according to that which hath been agreed, which was to be within ten daies after the coming of the Dispensation. And he further saith, That it is true, that the Prince afterwards by his Letters sent by one Mr. Clark, commanded him the said Earl not to deliver the said Proxies, till he should have received security, that the Infanta, after her being betrothed, should not enter into any Religious Order, and that before he proceeded, he should send to his Majesty, then Prince, such securities as should be offered, that he might judge whether it were sufficient or not.

Whereupon the said Earl, as became a faithful Servant, presented unto his Majesty that now

Anno
1626. is, then Prince, such Assurances as were offered unto him, for securing of that point, together with such Reasons as he conceived were fit to be offered to their considerations; which gave unto his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, then Prince, such satisfaction, as they were pleased to dispatch a Post presently unto him, absolutely discharging him of that Commandment, as by their several Letters, dated October 8. 1623. will appear, as followeth,

We have received your Letters by Grissy, and the Copy of them to our dear Son; and we cannot forbear to let you know, how well we esteem that dutiful, discreet, and judicial Relation, and humble advice to our Son: Whereupon, having fully deliberated with our self, and communicated with our dear Son, we have resolved, with the good liking of our Son to rest upon that security, in point of doubt, for the Infanta's taking a Religious Order, which you, in your judgment, shall think meet.

And by that other Letter of his Majesty that now is, then Prince, as followeth, viz.

Your Letter to the King and me, concerning that doubt I made after I came from St. Lawrence, hath so satisfied us both, that we think it fit no longer to stick upon it, but leave it to your discretion to take what security you shall think fitting.

Whereby he was absolutely freed of that command; and being so freed thereof, he then remained under the Order which his Majesty, then Prince, had left with him at his departure, which was, to proceed according to the Capitulations, and his Highness's Declaration, when he delivered the said Proxies unto him: And so he intended to have done, till by his Highness's Letters, November 13, 1623. he was directly commanded the contrary; which Commandment he directly and punctually obeyed.

And for such his intentions, till he was countermanded, he conceiveth he had not only sufficient warrant, but had highly offended if he had done otherwise. For first, for his proceedings to consummate the Match, he had warrant and instruction under his late Majesty's hand. Secondly, It was the main scope of his Embassy. Thirdly, He was enjoined by the King and Prince his Commission, under the Great Seal. Fourthly, He had positive order, under his Majesty's hand, by Letters since. Fifthly, It was agreed by Capitulation, that it should be within so many daies after the coming of the Dispensation. Sixthly, His late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, then Prince, signified by their Letters unto him at the same time, when they discharged him of his Commandment touching the Infanta's entering into Religion, that they intended to proceed in the Marriage, as by his Majesty's Letters, October 8. 1623. appear. Seventhly, The Proxies were to that end left in his hands, and after again renewed after his Majesty's return into England. Eighthly, He had overthrown the Marriage without order: For although Sir Walter Aston and himself used possible means for the gaining of time, and deferring the Desponsories; yet the King of Spain caused it to be protested, That in case he, the said Earl, should insist upon the deferring of the Desponsories, he would free himself from the Treaty by the said Earl's infringing of the Capitulations: And in truth, although the King of Spain should have condescended to have prolonged the Desponsories until one of the daies of Christmas, as by the Letter was required; yet the Prince's Proxies had been before that time expired, and he durst not, without a precise Warrant, put such a scorn upon so noble a Lady, whom, he then conceived, was likely to have been the Prince his Wife, as to nominate a day of Marriage when the Proxies were out of date, and he was himself sworn to the Treaty. And lastly, he could not in honour and honesty, but endeavour to perform that publick Trust reposed in him, when the Proxies were deposited in his hands, with publick and legal Declaration, with an Instrument by a Secretary of State to the King of Spain, leading and directing the use of them, and the same being then Instrumentum stipulatum, wherein as well the King of Spain was interested by the acceptance of the substitution, as the Prince by granting of the Proxies, he could not in honesty fail the publick Trust, without clear and undoubted Warrant; which as soon as he had, he obeyed. So as the Case standing thus, the said Earl is very confident, that the supposed Countermands, Directions, and Restrictions, when they should be perused and considered of, will appear to have been very slender and insufficient Warrant against the aforesaid Orders and Reasons before specified: And is also as confident, That what is assured out of his, the said Earl's Dispatches, will also appear to be misunderstood; and that if he had proceeded to the execution of the Desponsories, before he received direct and expresse Commandment to the contrary by the aforesaid Letters, November 13. 1623. which he readily and punctually obeyed, he had not, under favour, broken his Instructions, or deserved any blame for lack of assurance of the restitution of the Palatine, and Temporal Articles.

And first, of the Palatine, his said Majesty did not send to the said Earl expresse Directions not to dispatch the Desponsories, until a full conclusion were had of the other Treaty of the Palatine, together with that of the Marriage, as by the said Article is alledged; only his late Majesty, by the aforesaid Letters of October 8. required the said Earl so to endeavour, that his Majesty might have the joy of both at Christmas. Whereas his Instructions of May 14. 1621. were expresse, that he should not make the business of the Palatine a condition of the Marriage. And his late Majesty's Letters of December 30. 1623. were fully to the same effect. Yet did the said Earl, according to what was intimated by the said Letters of October 8. so carefully provide therein, as that before the Proxies were to be executed, he had an absolute Answer in the business of the Palatine, the same should be really restor'd according to his late Majesty's desire; and the Conde Olivares, both in his Majesty's name, and in his own, desired the said Earl and Sir Walter Aston, that they would assure his Majesty of the real performance of the same, and intreated, if need were, they should engage their honour and life for it, as by their joynt Dispatches of Nov. 23. 1623. will appear; and so much the said Sir Walter Aston, and the said Earl, agreed should be delivered to them in writing, before they would have delivered their Proxies, and so the said Earl declared it; the which Answer in writing should have been the same, which since was given them of Jan. 8. 1623. And both Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl were confident therein, as they, by their said Letters of Nov. 23. wrote to his late Majesty, as followeth, viz.

Car. 2.

The Earl's reasons why he was forward to consummate the Match, till warrant came to the contrary.

The restitution of the Palatine promised by the King of Spain, and Olivares.

Anno 1626. That his Majesty might, according to his desire, signify to the said Earl, by his Letters of Octob. 8, 1626, as well to his Majesties Daughter that Christ-mas, the comfortable news of the aspiring of her great troubles and sufferings, into his Son the Prince the Congratulation of being married to a most worthy and excellent Princess.

By which it will evidently appear, he meant not to leave the business of the Palatine loose, when he intended to proceed to the Marriage; but he confessed, that he was ever of opinion, that the best pawn and assurance his late Majesty could have of the real proceeding of the Palatine, was, That they proceeded really to the effecting of the match; and of the same opinion was his late Majesty also, and the Lords Commissioners here in England, as appeareth by his Instructions, dated March 14. 1621. which opinion still continued in them, as appeareth by his late Majesties Letters of January 7. 1622. And as for the Temporal Articles, the said Earl saith, When the Desponsories were formerly appointed to have been, as he remembreth on Friday, August 29. before the departure of his Majesty, then Prince, out of Spain, which was only hindered by the not coming of the Dispensation, the Prince appointed him and Sir Walter Aston to meet with the Spanish Commissioners, and they drew up the Heads of the Temporal Articles, wherewith the Prince and the Duke of Buckingham were acquainted; and in case the Dispensation had come, and the Desponsories been performed on that day, there had been no other Provision made for them before the Marriage; but presently, upon the Prince his departure, he, the said Earl, caused them to be drawn into form, and sent them to his late Majesty, September 27. 1623. desiring to understand his Majesties pleasure with all speed, especially if he disapproved any thing in them; but never received notice of any dislike thereof, until the aforesaid Letters of November 13. 1623. which put off the Desponsories. So as it appeareth, the said Earl was so far from breaking his Instructions, or from having any Intention to have proceeded to the execution of the Desponsories, before his Majesty and the Prince were satisfied of this point of the Infanta entering into Religion, or before convenient assurance, as well for the restitution of the Palatine, as performance of the Temporal Articles, that he deserveth, as he conceiveth under favour, no blame, so much as in intention; but if he had erred in intention only (as he did not) the same being never reduced into Act, the fault (as he conceiveth) was removed by his obedience before the intention was put into execution: for so it is in Cases towards God. And as to the matter of Aggravation against him, that he appointed so short a time for the Desponsories, as that without extraordinary diligence the Prince had been bound; he thereto saith, as he said before, that he set no day at all thereunto, nor could defer it after the Dispensation came from Rome, without a direct breach of the match so long laboured in, and so much desired; yet he and Sir Walter Aston having used all possible industry to discover how the motion of deferring the match would be taken; and finding an absolute resolution in the King of Spain to proceed punctually, and to require the Proxies according to the Capitulation, within ten days after the coming of the Dispensation; and that time also getting advertisement from Rome, that the Dispensation was granted, and would presently be there; he, the said Earl, to the end, in so great a Cause, he might have a clear and undoubted understanding of his late Majesties pleasures, sent a Dispatch of November 1. with all diligence unto his Majesty, letting his Majesty know, that it could not be possible for him to protract the Marriage above four days, unless he should hazard the breaking, for which he had no warrant.

But that this was no new resolution, nor the King so straitned in time, as by the said Article is pretended, will appear by the said Earls dispatch of September 28. 1623. In which, upon Scruple that was then made of the Infanta's entering into Religion, he wrote to the same effect; viz. That if the Dispensation should come, he knew no means how to detain the Proxies above twenty or twenty four days. So that although difficulty happened until the midst of November, 1623. yet it was foreseen, that it must of necessity happen whensoever the Dispensation should come; and then was warning of two months given thereof; viz. from September 24. until November 29. which was the time appointed for the Desponsories.

So as he most humbly submits himself unto your Lordships, which of the two ways was the safer or dutyfuller for him to take; whether upon inferences and conjectures, to have overthrown so great a business; or, on the other side, first, to have presented unto his Majesty the truth and sincerity as he did, the true estate of his Affairs, with his humble opinion therein, with an intimation, that if his Majesty should resolve to break the match, that for the said Earl his honest discharge of the publick Trust reposed in him, when the Proxies were deposited in his hands, and for his sufficient warrant in so great a Cause, his Majesty would be graciously pleased to give him clear and expresse order (which he had not) and in the interim, whilst his Majesty might take into consideration the great inconveniences that might ensue, the said inconveniences might be suspended, and the business kept upon fair terms, that his Majesty might have his way and choice clear and unfoiled before him.

And as to the evil Consequences which are pretended would have followed, if the said Earl had proceeded to the consummation of the match, before he had expresse order and warrant to the contrary; he supposeth his Majesty should speedily have seen the Marriage, which he so long sought to have effected; that the Prince should have had a worthy Lady whom he loved; that the Portion was much greater than ever was given in Money in Christendom; that the King of Spain had engaged himself for restitution of the Palatine; for which, the said Earl conceived a Daughter of Spain, and two Millions, had been no ill Pawn; besides many other additions of advantage to the Crown of England: Whereas on the contrary side, he foresaw, that the Prince would be kept a year longer unmarried, a thing that so highly concerneth these Kingdoms; he doubteth, that the recovery of the Palatine from the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria by force, would prove a great difficulty, and that Christendom was like to fall into a general Combustion: So that desiring that his Majesty should have obtained his ends, and have had the honour and happiness, not only to have given peace, plenty, and increase unto his own Subjects and Crowns, but to have propounded the greatest differences that had been these many years in Christendom: And by his Piety and Wisdom, to have prevented the shedding of so much

Car. 2.

Anno 1626. much Christian Blood, as he feared, would ensue, if these businesses were disordered. These Reasons, he confessed, and the zeal unto his Majesties service, made him so earnestly desire the effecting of this business, and cannot but think himself an unfortunate man (his Majesties Affairs being so near settling to his Majesties content, as he conceived they were, and hoping to have been to his Majesty, not only a faithful Servant, but a successful Servant) to see the whole estate of his Affairs turned up-side down, without any the least fault of his; and yet he the only Minister on the English and Spanish side that remained under disgrace.

XL. To the Eleventh Article the said Earl saith, That the Article is grounded upon a Petition by him preferred to this Honourable House, supposed to be scandalous; which your Lordships (as he conceiveth) according to the Customs and Privileges of the House of Peers, would have been pleased first to have adjudged so to have been, either for matter appearing in it self, or upon hearing the said Earl; for the matter appearing in the Petition it self, be not to be excepted unto, it cannot, as he conceiveth, by collateral accidents, be taken for a Scandal, till it be examined and found false. For if a plain and direct Answer thereunto, he saith, That the said Petition is such, as will not warrant any such inference, as by the said Article is enforced. And that he hopeth to justify the Contents of the said Petition in such sort, as shall not displease his Majesty, nor deserve that expression which is used in the Charge; but contrarily what he hath said, or shall say therein in his defence, shall in all things tend to the Honour and Service of his Majesty, by reducing into his memory divers Circumstances, and laying before him the passages of divers particulars, which by undue practices have been either concealed from his Majesty, or mis-related to him.

Having thus offered to this High and Honourable Court, such Proofs and Reasons, as he hopeth shall, in your Lordships Wisdom and Justice clearly acquit him of any Capital Crime, or wilful Offence; if it shall appear, that out of Errors of Judgment, too much ferventness of zeal to his Majesties service, or the ignorance of the Laws of this Realm, (wherewith he hath not been able to be so well acquainted as he ought, by reason of Forreign Employments by the space of many years) or by any other ways or means he hath fallen into the danger in the Laws for any thing pardoned in the General Pardon, made in the Parliament holden at Westminster, Anno Vicesimo Primo Regni, Imp. Jacobi Angliae, &c. of blessed memory, he humbly prayeth allowance of the Pardons, and the benefit thereof (with this Clause, That he doth and will aver, that he is none of the persons excepted out of the same) although he is very confident, he shall not need the help of any Pardon, having received many significations, as well from his Majesties own mouth, that he had never offended his Majesty, as lately, by several Letters of the Lord Conway, that he might rest in the security he was in, and sit still, and should be no further questioned. But he hopes your Lordships will not only find him so far from blame, but that he hath served his late Majesty of blessed memory, and his most gracious Son, the King's Majesty that now is, with that fidelity, care, and industry, that your Lordships will take course, as you, in your wisdoms, shall think fit, not only for upholding the Honour and Reputation of a Peer in this Realm, after so many Employments, but likewise become humble and earnest Suitors to his Majesty on his behalf (which he humbly prayeth) that he may be restored to his Majesties good favour, which, above all worldly things, he most desireth.

The Eighth of May, the Commons brought up their Charge against the Duke of Buckingham, which was delivered at a Conference of both Houses, and spun out two days time. It was managed by Eight Members of the Commons House, and Sixteen more as Assistants. The chief Managers were, Sir Dudley Diggs, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Pym, Mr. Sherland, Mr. Wandeford, and Sir John Elliot.

Sir Dudley Diggs, by way of Prologue, made this Speech.

My Lords,

Here are so many things of great importance to be said in very little time to day, that I conceive it will not be unacceptable to your Lordships, if (setting by all Rhetorical Affectations) I only in plain Countrey Language, humbly pray your Lordships favour to include many excuses necessary to my manifold infirmities in this one word, I am commanded by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses of the Commons House, to present to your Lordships their most affectionate thanks for your ready condescending to this Conference; which, out of confidence in your great Wisdoms, and approved Justice, for the service of his Majesty, and the welfare of this Realm, they desired upon this occasion.

The House of Commons, by a fatal and universal concurrence of Complaints, from all the Sea-bordering parts of this Kingdom, did find a great and grievous interruption, and stop of Trade and Traffick: The base Pirats of Sally ignominiously infesting our Coasts, taking our Ships and Goods, and leading away the Subjects of this Kingdom into barbarous Captivity; while, to our shame and hinderance of Commerce, our Enemies did (as it were) besiege our Ports, and block up our best Rivers mouths. Our Friends, on slight pretences, made Imbargoes of our Merchants Goods, and every Nation (upon the least occasion) was ready to contemn and slight us: So great was the apparent diminution of the ancient Honour of this Crown, and one strong Reputation of our Nation. Wherewith the Commons were more troubled, calling to remembrance, how formerly, in France, in Spain, in Holland, and every where by Sea and Land, the Valours of this Kingdom had been better valued, and even in latter times, within remembrance, when we had no Alliance with France, none in Denmark, none in Germany, no Friend in Italy; Scotland (to say no more) ununited, Ireland not settled in peace, and much less security at home; when Spain was as ambitious as it is now, under a King (Philip the Second) they called their Wisest: the House of Austria as great and potent, and both strengthened with a malicious League in France, of persons ill-affected, when the Low Countries had no being: yet, by constant Counsels, and old English ways, even then, that Spanish pride was cooled, that Greatness of the House of Austria, so formidable to us now, was well resisted; and to the United Provinces of the Low Countries, such a beginning, growth, and strength Anno 1626. strength was given, as gave us Honour over all the Christian World. The Commons therefore wondering at the Evils which they suffered, debating of the Causes of them, found there were many drawn like Lines to one Circumference, of decay of Trade, and strength of Honour and Reputation in this Kingdom; which, as in one Centre, met in one Great Man, the Cause of all, whom I am here to name, the Duke of Buckingham.

Here Sir Dudley Digges making a little stop, afterwards read the Preamble to the Charge, as followeth;

The Commons Declaration and Impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham.

For the speedy redress of great Evils and Mischiefs, and of the chief cause of these Evils and Mischiefs which this Kingdom of England now grievously suffereth, and of late years hath suffered; and to the honour and safety of our Sovereign Lord the King, and of his Crown and Dignity; and to the good and welfare of his People, The Commons in this present Parliament, by the Authority of our said Sovereign Lord the King, assembled, Do, by this their Bill, shew and declare against George, Duke, Marquess, and Earl of Buckingham, Earl of Coventry, Viscount Villiers, Baron of Whaddon, Great Admiral of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the Principality of Wales, and of the Dominions and Islands of the same, of the Town of Calis, and of the Marches of the same, and of Normandy, Gascoign, and Guinne, General Governour of the Seas and Ships of the said Kingdom, Lieutenant-General Admiral, Captain-General and Governour of his Majesties Royal Fleet and Army lately set forth, Master of the Horse of our Sovereign Lord the King, Lord Warden, Chancellor, and Admiral of the Cinque-Ports, and of the Members thereof, Constable of Dover Castle, Justice in Eyre of the Forests and Chases on this side the River Trent, Constable of the Castle of Windsor, Gentleman of his Majesties Bed-chamber, one of his Majesties most honourable Privy Council in his Realms both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and Knight of the most Honourable Order of the Garter: The Misdemeanors, Misprisions, Offences, Crimes, and other Matters, comprised in the Articles following; and him the said Duke do accuse and impeach of the said Misdemeanors, Misprisions, Offences and Crimes.

My Lords,

His lofty Title of this mighty Man, methinks doth raise my spirits to speak with a Paulo majora Canamus; and let it not displease your Lordships, if, for Foundation, I compare the beautiful structure and fair composition of this Monarchy wherein we live, to the great Work of God, the World it self: In which, the solid Body of incorporated Earth and Sea, as I conceive, in regard of our Husbandry, Manufactures, and Commerce by Land and Sea, may well resemble us the Commons. And as it is encompassed with the Air, and Fire, and Spheres Celestial, of Planets, and a Firmament of fixed Stars; all which receive their Heat, Light, and Life from one great, glorious Sun, even like the King our Sovereign: So that Firmament of fixed Stars, I take to be your Lordships; those Planets, the great Officers of the Kingdom; that pure Element of Fire, the most Religious, Zealous, and Pious Clergy; and the Reverend Judges, Magistrates, and Ministers of Law and Justice, the Air where in we breathe: All which encompass round with cherishing comfort, this Body of the Commons, who truly labour for them all; and though they be the Foot-stool, and the lowest, yet may well be said to be the settled Centre of the State.

Now (my good Lords) if that glorious Sun, by his powerful Beams of Grace and Favour, shall draw from the Bowels of this Earth an Exhalation that shall take Fire, and burn and shine out like a Star, it needs not be marvelled at, if the poor Commons gaze and wonder at the Comet, and when they feel the effects, impute all to the incorruptible matter of it; but if any such imperfect mixture appear, like that in the last Age in the Chair of Cassiopeia, among the fixed Stars themselves, where Aristotle and the old Philosophers conceived there was no place for such Corruption; then, as the Learned Mathematicians were troubled to observe the irregular Motions, the prodigious Magnitude, and the ominous Prognosticks of that Meteor; so the Commons, when they see such a Blazing Star in course so exorbitant in the Affairs of this Common-wealth, cannot but look upon it, and for want of Perspectives, commend the nearer examination to your Lordships, who may behold it a nearer distance. Such a prodigious Comet the Commons take this Duke of Buckingham to be; against whom, and his irregular ways, there are, by learned Gentlemen, legal Articles of Charge to be delivered to your Lordships, which I am generally first commanded to lay open.

1. The Offices of this Kingdom, that are the Eyes, the Ears, and the Hands of this Commonwealth, these have been ingrossed, bought and sold, and many of the greatest of them holden even in the Duke's own hands; which severally gave, in former Ages, sufficient content to greatest Favourites, and were work enough for wisest Countellors; by means whereof, what strange abuses, what infinite neglects have followed? The Seas have been unguarded, Trade disturbed, Merchants oppressed, their Ships, and even one of the Royal Navy, by cunning practice, delivered over into Foreign hands; and contrary to our good King's intention, employed to the prejudice (almost to the ruin) of Friends of our own Religion.

2. Next, Honours, (those most precious Jewels of the Crown) a Treasure inestimable, wherewith your Noble Ancestors (my Lords) were well rewarded, for eminent and publick Service in the Commonwealth at home; for brave Exploits abroad, when covered all with dust and blood, they sweat in service for the Honour of this Crown. What back-ways, what by-ways, have been by this Duke found out, is too well known to your Lordships. Whereas anciently it was the honour of England (as among the Romans) the way to the Temple of Honour was through the Temple of Virtue. But I am commanded to press this no further, than to let your Lordships know, one instance may (perhaps) be given of some one Lord compelled to purchase Honour.

3. As divers of the Duke's poor Kindred have been raised to great Honours, which some have been, and are likely to be more chargeable and burthensome to the Crown; so the Lands and Revenues, Anno 1626. Revenues, and the Treasuries of his Majesty, have been intercepted and exhausted by this Duke and his Friends, and strangely mis-employed with strange confusion of the Accounts, and overthrow of the well-established ancient Orders of his Majesties Exchequer.

4. The last of the Charges which are prepared, will be an Injury offered to the Person of the late King, of blessed memory, who is with God, of which (as your Lordships may have heard heretofore) you shall anon have further information. Now upon this occasion, I am commanded by the Commons, to take care of the Honour of the King our Sovereign that lives, (long may he live to our comfort, and the good of the Christian World) and also his blessed Father, who is dead; on whom, to the grief of the Commons, and their great distaste, the Lord Duke did (they conceive) unworthily cast some ill odor of his own foul ways; whereas Servants were anciently wont to bear, as in truth they ought, their Masters faults, and not cast their own on them undeservedly. It is well known, the King (who is with God) had the same power, and the same wisdom, before he knew this Duke, yea, and the same affections too; through which (as a good and gracious Master) he advanced and raised some Stars of your Lordships Firmament; in whose hands, this exorbitancy of Will, this transcendancy of power, such placing and displacing of Officers, such irregular running into all by-courses of the Planets, such sole and single managing of the great Affairs of State, was never heard of.

And therefore, only to the Lord Duke, and his procurement, by mis-informations, these faults complained of by the Commons, are to be imputed.

And for our most gracious Sovereign that lives, whose name hath been used, and may perhaps now be for the Duke's justification, the Commons know well, that among his Majesties most Royal Vertues, his Piety unto his Father, hath made him a pious nourisher of his Affections ever to the Lord Duke, on whom, out of that consideration, his Majesty hath wrought a kind of wonder, making Favour Hereditary, but the abuse thereof must be the Lord Dukes own: And if there have been any Commands, such as were, or may be pretended, his mis-informations have procured them; whereas the Laws of England teach us, That Kings cannot command ill or unlawful things, when ever they speak, though by their Letters Patents, or their Seals. If the things be evil, these Letters Patents are void, and whatsoever ill event succeeds, the execution of such commands must ever answer for them.

Thus, my Lords, in performance of my duty, my weakness hath been troublesome unto your Lordships; it is now high time, humbly to intreat your pardon, and give way to a learned Gentleman to begin a more particular Charge.

Then were read the First, Second, and Third Articles, viz.

The Commons Articles against the Duke. His ingrossing many Offices.

I. That whereas the Great Offices, expressed in the said Duke's Stile and Title, heretofore have been the singular Preferments of several Persons, eminent in Wisdom and Trust, and fully able for the weighty Service, and greatest Employments of the State, whereby the said Offices were both carefully and sufficiently executed by several Persons, of such Wisdom, Trust, and Ability: And others also that were employed by the Royal Progenitors of our Sovereign Lord the King in places of less Dignity, were much encouraged with the hopes of advancement. And whereas divers of the said Places severally of themselves, and necessarily require the whole care, industry, and attendance of a most provident and most able Person: He, the said Duke, being young and inexperienced, hath, of late years, with exorbitant Ambition, and for his own profit and advantage, procured and ingrossed into his own hands the said several Offices, both to the danger of the State, the prejudice of that Service, which should have been performed in them, and to the great discouragement of others; who by this his procuring and ingrossing of the said Offices, are precluded from such hopes, as their Vertues, Abilities, and Publick Employments might otherwise have given them.

II. Whereas, by the Laws and Statutes of this Kingdom of England, if any person whatsoever, give or pay any sum of Money, Fee, or Reward, directly or indirectly, for any Office or Offices, which in any wise touch or concern the Administration or Execution of Justice, or the keeping of any of the Kings Majesties Towns, Castles, or Fortresses, being used, occupied, or appointed for places of strength and defence: the same person is immediately, upon the same Fee, Money, or Reward, given or paid, to be adjudged a disabled person in the Law, to all intents and purposes, to have, occupy, or enjoy the said Office or Offices, for the which he so giveth or payeth any sum of Money, Fee, or Reward. He the said Duke did, in or about the month of January, in the Sixteenth year of the late King James of famous memory, give and pay to the Right Honourable, Charles, then Earl of Nottingham, for the Office of Great Admiral of England and Ireland, and the Principality of Wales, and for the Office of General Governour of the Seas and Ships of the said Kingdoms, and for the Surrender of the said Offices, then made to the said King by the said Earl of Nottingham, being then Great Admiral of the said Kingdoms, and Principality of Wales, and General-Governour of the Seas and Ships, to the intent the said Duke might obtain the said Offices to his own use, the sum of Three thousand pounds of lawful money of England; and did also about the same time procure, from the said King, a further reward, for the surrender of the said Office to the said Earl, of an Annuity of One thousand pounds by the year, for, and during the life of the said Earl; and by the procurement of the said Duke, the said late King, of famous memory, did, by his Letters Patents, dated the Seven and twentieth of January, in the said year of his Reign, under the Great Seal of England, grant to the said Earl the said Annuity; which he, the said Earl, accordingly had and enjoyed, during his life, and by reason of the said sum of Money, so as aforesaid paid by the said Duke. And of this the said Duke's procurement of the said Annuity, the said Earl of Nottingham did, in the same month, surrender unto the said late King, his said Offices, and his Patents of them; and thereupon, and by reason of the premises, the said Offices were obtained by the Duke for his life, from the said King of famous memory, by Letters Patents made to the said Duke, of the same Offices, under the Great Seal of England, dated the Eight and twentieth day of January, in the said Sixteenth year of the said late Anno 1626: late King. And the said Offices of Great Admiral and Governour, as aforesaid, are Offices that highly touch and concern the Administration and Execution of Justice, within the provision of the said Laws and Statutes of this Kingdom; which, notwithstanding, the said Duke hath unlawfully, ever since the first unlawful obtaining of the said Grant of the said Offices, retained them in his hands, and exercised them against the Laws and Statutes aforesaid.

His buying the Cinque Ports of the Lord Zouch. III. The said Duke did likewise, in or about the beginning of the month of December, in the two and twentieth year of the said late King James of famous memory, give and pay to the Right Honourable, Edward, late Lord Zouch, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and of the Members thereof, and Constable of the Castle of Dover, for the said Offices, and for the surrender of the said Offices of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Constable of the said Castle of Dover, to be made to the said late King of famous memory, the sum of One thousand pounds of lawful money of England; and then also granted an Annuity of Five hundred pounds yearly to the said Lord Zouch, for the life of the said Lord Zouch; to the intent that he the said Duke, might thereby obtain the said Offices to his own use. And for, and by reason of the said sum of Money, so paid by the said Duke, and of the said Annuity so granted to the said Edward Lord Zouch, he the said Lord Zouch the fourth day of December, in the year aforesaid, did surrender his said Office, and his Letters Patents of them to the said late King: And thereupon, and by reason of the Premises, he the said Duke obtained the said Offices for his life, of the said late King, by his Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, dated the sixth day of December, in the said two and twentieth year. And the said Office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and of the Members thereof, is an Office that doth highly touch and concern Administration and Execution of Justice; and the said Office of Constable of the Castle of Dover, is an Office that highly concerneth the keeping and defence of the Town and Port, and of the said Castle of Dover, which is, and hath ever been appointed, for a most eminent place of strength and defence of this Kingdom; which notwithstanding, the said Duke hath unlawfully, ever since this first unlawful obtaining of the said Office, retained them in his hands, and exercised them against the Laws and Statutes aforesaid.

the first made engaged by Mr. Herbert. These three Articles were discoursed upon by Mr. Herbert, and touching Plurality of Offices, he observed, That in that vast power of the Duke (a young unexperienced man) there is an unfortunate complication of danger and mischief to the State, as having too much ability, if he be false, to do harm, and ruin the Kingdom; and if he be faithful, and never so industrious, yet divided amongst so many great Places (whereof every one would employ the industry of an able and provident man) there must needs be in him an insufficiency of performance, or rather an impossibility, especially considering his necessary attendance likewise upon his Court places.

le- and en- ed by To the Second and Third, namely, The buying the Office of Admiralty and Cinque Ports, (both which he comprised in one) he said, That to set a price upon the Walls and Gates of the Kingdom, is a Crime which requires rather a speedy re-

Car. 2. medy than an aggravation, and is against the express Law of 5 Edw. 6. upon this Foundation, That the buying of such Places do necessarily introduce corrupt and insufficient Officers. And in the Parliament of 12 Edw. 4. it is declared by the whole Assembly, That they who buy those Places (these are the express words) bind themselves to be Extortioners and Offenders; as if they pretended it warrantable, or as if they did lay an Obligation upon themselves to sell again. And though the buying of such Places be not against any particular Law, enjoying a penalty for them (the breach whereof is a particular Offence) yet as far as they subvert the good, and welfare, and safety of the People, so far they are against the highest Law, and assume the nature of the highest Offences.

His neglect of guarding the Seas. IV. Whereas the said Duke, by reason of his said Offices of Great Admiral of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the Principality of Wales, and of the Admiral of the Cinque Ports, and General Governour of the Seas and Ships of the said Kingdoms, and by reason of the trust thereunto belonging, ought at all time, since the said Offices obtained, to have safely guarded, kept, and preserved the said Seas, and the Dominion of them; and ought also, whensoever they wanted either Men, Ships, Munition, or other Strength whatsoever that might conduce to the better safeguard of them, to have used, from time to time, his utmost endeavour for the supply of such wants to the Right Honourable, the Lords and others of the Privy Council, and by procuring such supply from his Sovereign, or otherwise: As the said Duke hath, ever since the dissolution of the two Treaties mentioned in the Act of Subsidies of the One and twentieth year of the late King James of famous memory (that is to say) the space of two years last past, neglected the just performance of his said Office and Duty, and broken the said Trust therewith committed unto him: and hath not, according to his said Offices, during the time aforesaid, safely kept the said Seas: inasmuch that by reason of his neglect and default therein, not only the Trade and Strength of this Kingdom of England hath been, during the said time, much decayed, but the same Seas also have been, during the same time, ignominiously infested by Pyrates and Enemies, to the loss both of very many Ships and Goods, and of many of the Subjects of our Sovereign Lord the King; and the Dominion of the said Seas (being the ancient and undoubted Patrimony of the Kings of England) is thereby also in most eminent danger to be utterly lost.

His raking a Ship called St. Peter of Newhaven. V. Whereas about Michaelmas last past, a Ship called the St. Peter of Newhaven (whereof John Mallerow was Master) laden with divers Goods, Merchandize, Monies, Jewels and Commodities, to the value of Forty thousand pounds, or thereabouts, for the proper accompt of Monsieur de Villiers, the then Governour of Newhaven, and other Subjects of the French King, being in perfect Amity and League with our Sovereign Lord the King, was taken at Sea by some of the Ships of his Majesties late Fleet, set forth under the command of the said Duke, as well by direction from him the said Duke as great Admiral of England, as by the Authority of the extraordinary Commission which he then had for the

Anno 1626. the command of the said Fleet, and was by them, together with her said goods and lading brought into the Port at Plymouth, as a Prize among many others, upon probabilities that the said Ship or Goods belonged to the Subjects of the King of Spain: And that divers parcels of the said goods and lading were there taken out of the said Ship of St. Peter; (that is to say) sixteen Barrels of Cochenal, eight Bags of Gold, twenty three Bags of Silver, two Boxes of Pearl and Emeralds, a Chain of Gold, Jewels, Monies and Commodities to the value of Twenty thousand pounds, or thereabouts, and by the said Duke were delivered into the private custody of one Gabriel Marsh, servant to the said Duke; and that the said ship, with the residue of her goods and lading, was from thence sent up into the River of Thames, and there detained; whereupon there was an arrest at Newhaven, in the Kingdom of France on the seventh day of December last, of two English Merchants ships trading thither, as was alledged in certain Petitions exhibited by some English Merchants trading into France, to the Lords and others of his Majesties most honourable Privy Council; after which (that is to say) on the 28th day of the said month, his Majesty was pleased to order, with the advice of his Privy Council, That the said ship and goods belonging to the Subjects of the French King, should be re-delivered to such as should reclaim them, and accordingly intimation was given to his Majesties Advocate in the chief Court of Admiralty by the Right Honourable Sir Jo. Cooke Knight, one of his Majesties principal Secretaries of State, for the freeing and discharging the said ship and goods in the said Court of Admiralty: And afterwards, that is to say, on the six and twentieth of January last, it was decreed in the said Court by the Judge thereof, with the consent of the said Advocate, That the said ship, with whatsoever goods so seized on, or taken in her, (except three hundred Mexico Hides, sixteen sacks of Ginger, one box of gilded Beads, five sacks of Ginger more mentioned in the said Decree) should be clearly released from further detention, and delivered to the Master; and thereupon under Seal a Commission was in that behalf duly sent out of the said Court to Sir Allen Appesty, Sir John Worstenholme and others, for the due execution thereof: The said Duke, notwithstanding the said Order, Commission and Decree, detained still to his own use the said Gold, Silver, Pearls, Emeralds, Jewels, Monies and Commodities so taken out of the said ship as aforesaid: And for his own singular avail and covetousness, on the sixth day of February last, having no information of any new proof, without any legal proceeding, by colour of his said Office, unjustly caused the said ship and goods to be again arrested and detained, in publick violation and contempt of the Laws and Justices of this Land, to the great disturbance of Trade, and prejudice of the Merchants.

Article
enlarged by Mr.
Selden.

These were enlarged by Mr. Selden, who said, That by nature of his Office, the Duke as Admiral, ought to have guarded the Seas: By his Patent he is made Magnus Admirallus Anglie, Hibernie, & Wallie, Normania, Aquitania, Villa Calesij & Marchiarum ejusdemque prefectus generalis classium Marium dictorum regnorum. The Seas of England and Ireland are committed to the Admiral, as a part of the Demesne and Possessions of the Crown of England; not as if he should thereby have Jurisdiction only, as in case of the Admirals in France or Spain. The State of Genoa, Catalonia, and other Maritime parts of Spain, the Sea-town of Almain, Zealand, Holland, Friesland, Denmark, Norway, and divers other parts of the Empire, shew that the Kings of England, by reason that their said Realm hath used, time out of mind, to be in peaceable possession, are Lords of the Seas of England, and of the Islands belonging to them. And though Grætius that Hollander, wrote of purpose to destroy all Dominion in the East Ocean; yet he speaks nothing against the Dominion of our English Seas, howsoever he hath been misapprehended; but expressly elsewhere saith, Meta Britannicæ littoræ sunt ori; the utmost limits of the Demesne of the Crown of England, are the shores of the neighbouring Countries; the whole Sea, or the Territorium Maximum that intervenes, being parcel of the possession of the Crown: the keeping and safeguard of these committed to the Lord Admiral by the name of the Prefectus Marium & Admirallus, being but the same anciently: Before the use of the word Admiral came in, which was under Edw. 1. the Admirals had the Titles of Custodes Maris.

And this Prefectura or Custodia, or Office of safeguarding the Seas, binds him to all care and perpetual observance of whatsoever conduceth to that safeguard, as in Custos Sigilli, Custos Marchiarum, Custos Portuum, & Custos Comitatum, agreeable to the Practice of former times.

1. In certifying yearly to the King and his Council, the many Forces, both of the Kings ships, and ships of Merchants, the names of the Owners, the number of the Mariners, &c. that the King and his Council may always know his Force by Sea.

2. In shewing wants of ships, &c. for the safeguarding of the Seas, with the Estimates of the supply, that so they might be procured. In personal attendance upon the service of guarding the Seas upon all occasions of weight: In 7 H. 4. Nicholas Blackburn, and Richard Cliderowe one of the Knights of Kent, were made Admiral for keeping the Seas, upon consideration had of it in Parliament, and the other Knight being Robert Clifford, it was agreed in Parliament that he should have the voices of both, because the other must of necessity be absent: And they both, amongst other things, petitioned the Council, That if the King in his Person should come on the Sea, they might have such a liberty to wait upon him, as they might make him their Lieutenant during the time for the service of their places. But the Council that allowed the rest, or most of their demands, answered to that, Le Council ne peut faire.

Then he estimated the nature of the Offence, by the consequences which follow the not guarding of the Seas, viz.

1. The losses already shewed.

2. The prevention of Trade, which gives life to the wealth of the Kingdom.

3. The weakening of the Naval strength, the Merchants being thereby discouraged from building ships which they cannot use. In 1 Rich. 2. the Commons opened the two chief and almost whole Causes of the weakning the Kingdom at that time; the neglect of Chivalry and eminent Vertue not regarded nor rewarded; the decay of Trade since the Navy was grown weak, besides all the loss of quiet possession of so large a Territory as the Seas of England and Ireland, by the free use of which, the ancient glory and greatness of the Crown of England hath so constantly subsisted.

Then

Anno 1626. Then he instanced in Michael de la Pool, Lord Chancellor, who in 9 Rich. 2. mis-spent Subsidies given pro salva custodia Maris, as appears in the Roll, and was adjudged in Parliament (though for other offences, because some other Lords of the Council had been trusted with him, and it was not fit to impeach him sans les compagnons) the taking it for a crime without question fit to be complained of.

Secondly, in William Duke of Suffolk, who for the same fault, being Admiral only in the right of Henry Earl of Exeter his Ward, was by the King extraordinarily commanded into banishment.

Then he brought examples of such who had been put to death, and confiscated for not safe-guarding Towns, and Castles, and Forts, which are of like nature with not safe-guarding the Seas, and with losing the possession of the Crown.

V. To the Fifth he said, The staying of the Ship called the Peter of Newhaven, and detaining part of the Goods, was against the Marine Laws of England, against the Common Laws, against the Laws of Merchants, and consequently the Law of Nations.

By the Marine Laws, agreeable to the Civil Laws, sentence given by any Subject or other against the King, may, upon new proof, be revoked, but not without new proof. He made, by his Patent, a Judge of all Maritime Causes, as well as Keeper of the Seas, his Jurisdiction was to be exercised juxta leges nostras Civiles & Maritimas, and accordingly to hear all Causes, and generally to proceed ex officio mero mixto & promoto secundum leges nostras Civiles & Maritimas.

Against the Common Laws.

All Justices, and all other deputed to do Law or Right, are commanded by Act of Parliament to permit the course of ordinary Justice, and although they be commanded to do the contrary, that they do execution aright, and according to Justice as far as in them lies; and so for any Letters of Commandment which may come unto them from us, or from any other, or by any other cause.

Against the Law of Nations.

Against what is agreed by the Leagues between us and Forreign Nations, That the Subjects of Nations in Amity with us, shall be well used, and permitted, without molestation, for what cause or occasion soever, according to the Laws and Customs of the Places where they shall be.

Lastly, against the Laws of Merchants, which is to have Celerem justitiam.

The Consequences of this offence are,

1. Great damage to our English Merchants; that have suffered by reason of it in Forreign Parts, as they alledge. 2. It is a discouragement to those that are Subjects to the Marine Jurisdiction. 3. An Example that may serve hereafter to justify all absolute Authority in the Admiral, without Law or Legal Course, over the Ships and Goods of all Merchants whatsoever, and so no security to Merchants. Lastly, He instanceth in the Duke of Suffolk, who was adjudged in Parliament for Treason, and among other offences it was laid to his Charge, that he took to his own use Goods Piratically taken, and expressly against the Order determined by the Lord Protector and the whole Council, whereunto his hand had been for the restitution of them.

Next we read the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Articles, viz.

VI. Whereas the honour, wealth, and strength of this Realm of England is much encreased by the Traffick, chiefly of such Merchants as imploy and build great warlike Ships, a consideration that should move all Counsellors of State, especially the Lord Admiral, to cherish and maintain such Merchants:

The said Duke abusing the Lords of the Parliament, in the One and twentieth year of the late King James of famous memory, with pretence of serving the State, did oppress the East-India Merchants, and extorted from them Ten thousand pounds, in the subtil and unlawful manner following.

About February, in the year aforesaid, he the said Duke, hearing some good success that those Merchants had at Ormuz, in the parts beyond the Seas, by his Agents cunningly, in or about the month aforesaid, in the year of the said late King, endeavoured to draw from them some great sum of money; which their poverty, and no gain by that success at Ormuz, made those Merchants absolutely to deny: Whereupon he the said Duke perceiving, that the said Merchants were then setting forth, in the course of their Trade, four Ships, and two Pinnaces, laden with Goods and Merchandize of very great value, like to lose their Voyage if they should not speedily depart: The said Duke, on the first of March then following, in the said year of the said late King, did move the Lords then assembled in the said Parliament, whether he should make stay of any Ships which were then in the Ports, (as being High Admiral he might) and namely, those Ships prepared for the East-India Voyage, which were of great burthen, and well furnished; which motion being approved by their Lordships, the Duke did stay those Ships accordingly: But the fifth of March following, when the Deputy of that Company, with other of those Merchants, did make suit to the said Duke for the release of those Ships and Pinaces; he the said Duke said, He had not been the occasion of their staying, but that having heard the motion with much earnestness in the Lords House of Parliament, he could do no less than give the Order they had done; and therefore he willed them to set down the reasons of their suit, which he would acquaint the House withal; yet in the mean time gave them leave to let their said Ships and Pinaces fall down as low as Tilbury. And the tenth of March following, an unusual joyned Action was by his procurement entered in the chief Court of Admiralty, in the name of the said late King, and of the Lord Admiral, against them, for fifteen thousand pounds, taken Piratically by some Captains of the said Merchants Ships, and pretended to be in the hands of the East-India Company; and thereupon the King's Advocate, in the name of Advocate for the then King and the said Lord Admiral, moved and obtained one Attachment, which by the Serjeant of the said Court of Admiralty was served on the said Merchants in their Court, the sixteenth day of March following: Whereupon the said Merchants, though there was no cause for their molestation by the Lord Admiral, yet the next day they were urged in the said Court of Admiralty to bring in the Fifteen thousand pounds, or go to Prison. Wherefore immediately the Company of the said Merchants did again send the Deputy aforesaid, and some others, to make new suit unto the said Duke, for the release of the said Ships and Pinaces; who unjustly endeavouring to extort money from the said Merchants, protested,

V 2 that

Anno 1626. that the Ships should not go, except they compounded with him; and when they urged many more reasons for the release of the said Ships and Pinaces, the Answer of the said Duke was, That the then Parliament must first be moved. The said Merchants therefore being in this perplexity, and in their consultation, the three and twentieth of that month, even ready to give over that Trade, yet considering that they should lose more than was demanded by unlading their Ships, besides their Voyage, they resolved to give the said Duke Ten thousand pounds for his unjust demands.
And he the said Duke, by the undue means aforesaid, and under colour of his Office, and upon false pretence of Rights, unjustly did exact and extort from the said Merchants the said Ten thousand pounds, and received the same about the 28 of April following the discharge of those Ships, which were not released by him, till they the said Merchants had yielded to give him the said Duke the said Ten thousand pounds for the said Release, and for the false pretence of Rights made by the said Duke, as aforesaid.

His delivering

King of France.

VII. Whereas the Ships of our Sovereign Lord the King, and of his Kingdoms aforesaid, are the principal strength and defence of the said Kingdoms, and ought therefore to be always preserved, and safely kept, under the command, and for the service, of our Sovereign Lord the King, no less than any the Fortresses and Castles of the said Kingdoms: And whereas no Subject of this Realm ought to be dispossessed of any his Goods or Chattels without order of Justice, or his own consent first duly had and obtained: The said
Duke being Great Admiral of England, Governor-General and Keeper of the said Ships and Seas, and therefore ought to have and take a special and continual care and diligence how to preserve the same; the said Duke in or about the end of July last, in the first year of our Sovereign Lord the King, did, under the colour of the said Office of Great Admiral of England, and by indirect and subtil means and practices, procure one of the principal Ships of his Majesties Navy-Royal, called the Vanguard, then under the command of Captain John Pennington, and six other Merchants Ships of great burthen and value, belonging to several persons inhabiting in London, the natural Subjects of his Majesty, to be conveyed over, with all their Ordnance, Munition, Tackle, and Apparel, into the parts of the Kingdom of France, to the end that being there, they might the more easily be put into the hands of the French King, his Ministers and Subjects, and taken into their possession, command and power: And accordingly the said Duke, by his Ministers and Agents, with menaces and other ill means and practices, did there, without order of Justice, and without the consent of the said Masters and Owners, unduly compel and enforce the said Masters and Owners of the said six Merchants Ships, to deliver the said Ships into the said possession, command and power of the said French King, his Ministers and Subjects; and by reason of his compulsion, and under the pretext of his power as aforesaid, and by his indirect practices, as aforesaid, the said Ships aforesaid, as well the said Ship Royal of his Majesty, as the others belonging to the said Merchants, were there delivered into the hands and command of the said French King, his Ministers and Subjects, without either sufficient security or assurance for re-delivery, or other necessary caution in that behalf taken and provided, either by the said

Duke himself, or otherwise by his direction, contrary to the duty of the said Offices of Great Admiral, Governor-General, and Keeper of the said Ships and Seas, and to the faith and trust in that behalf reposed, and contrary to the duty which he oweth to our Sovereign Lord the King in his place of Privy Counsellor, to the aparent weakning of the Naval strength of this Kingdom, to the great loss and prejudice of the said Merchants, and against the liberty of those Subjects of our Sovereign Lord the King, that are under the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty.

VIII. The said Duke, contrary to the purpose of our Sovereign Lord the King, and his Majesties known zeal for the maintenance and advancement of the true Religion established in the Church of England, knowing that the said Ships were intended to be employed by the said French King against those of the same Religion at Rochel, and elsewhere, in the Kingdom of France, did procure the said Ship Royal, and compel, as aforesaid, the said six other Ships to be delivered unto the said French King, his Ministers and Subjects, as aforesaid, to the end the said Ships might be used and employed by the said French King, in his intended War against those of the said Religion in the said Town of Rochel, and elsewhere within the Kingdom of France: And the said Ships were, and have been since so used and employed by the said French King, his Ministers and Subjects, against them. And this the said Duke did, as aforesaid, in great and most apparent prejudice of the said Religion, contrary to the purpose and intention of our Sovereign Lord the King, and against his duty in that behalf, being a sworn Counsellor to his Majesty, and to the great scandal and dishonour of this Nation. And notwithstanding the delivery of the said Ships by his procurement and compulsion, as aforesaid, to be employed, as aforesaid, the said Duke, in cunning and cautelous manner, to mask his ill intentions, did, at the Parliament held at Oxford in August last, before the Committee of both Houses of Parliament, intimate and declare, That the said Ships were not, nor should they be so used and imployed against those of the said Religion, as aforesaid, in contempt of our Sovereign Lord the King, and in abuse of the said Houses of Parliament, and in violation of that Truth which every man should profess.

These three Articles were aggravated by Mr.
Glanville.

MY Lords, (said he) in this great business of impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham, I am commanded by the Commons in Parliament to bear a part of some importance.

The Articles allotted to my Charge are three,
the sixth, seventh, and eighth; which I shall open with as much brevity and perspicuity as I may:
The substance of several Cases concerning the same; The Evidence to make them good, together with such Observations as naturally arise out of the matter; whereby your Lordships may the better discern wherein the Duke's faults do consist, and what punishment may be answerable to such offences.

The sixth Article is a distinct Charge, different from the other two, wherefore I will handle it, with the Incidents thereof, by it self. The Seventh and Eighth Articles being of one nature and subject, are indeed several parts of one Charge,

Mr. Glan-

sixth Article.

Anno 1626. Charge, rather than several Charges, and have such a connexion in themselves, that, with your Lordships leaves, I will handle them both together without dividing them, which I hold will be the shortest and fittest way to do right to the Cause, and to your Lordships.

The Sixth Article giveth me occasion (my Lords) thus to enlarge my self. In a Treaty the 18 of August, 1604. between our late Sovereign King James of glorious memory, and Philip the Third King of Spain, It was agreed, That there should be perfect Amity and Peace to endure for ever by Land, Sea, and Fresh-waters, between these King, their Heirs and Successors, their Dominions, Liege-men and Subjects then being or which should be; And that either party should then after abstain from all depredations, offences and spoils, by Sea, Land, and Fresh-waters, in what Dominions or Government soever of the other, and should cause restitution to be made of all depredations which then after should be committed, and the damages growing by means thereof; And that the said Kings shall take care that their Subjects should from thenceforth abstain from all force and wrong-doing, and that they likewise should revoke all Commissions and Letters Patents of Reprisal or Mart, or otherwise, containing Licence to take Prizes; All which are declared by the said Treaty it self to be void, and that whosoever should do any thing contrary, should be punished not only criminally according to the merit of his offence, but should also be compelled to make restitution and satisfaction for the losses to the parties damnified, requiring the same. Lastly, It was concluded, That between them and every of their Subjects might be free Commerce in all the Dominions by Sea, Land, and Fresh-waters, in which before the Wars there hath been Commerce, and according to the use and observance of the ancient Leagues and Treaties before the Wars, the Customs as they were at that present rated according to the Ordinance of the Places, being paid.

This Treaty being settled and continuing, his late Majesty King James by his Highness Letters Patents bearing date the 14 of September, Anno 13 of his Reign, did grant unto the Governours of the Merchants of London trading into the East-Indies, and to their Successors, in case they be justly provoked or driven thereunto, in defence of their Persons, Goods, or Ships, by any disturbance or hinderance in their quiet course of Trade, or for recompence or recovery of the Persons, Ships, or Goods of any of his Majesties Subjects, that had been formerly in or near the East-Indies, or for any other just cause of their defence, or recompence of losses sustained; That then the Captains or principal Commanders of the said Company, or any other under their Government, should or might attempt, surprize or take the Persons, Ships, and Goods of any Prince or State, by whose Subjects they should sustain any wrong or loss in manner as aforesaid, as by the said Letters Patents appeareth. Some years after the granting of these Letters Patents under pretext that the said Treaty was broken, there was some interruption and violence offered by the King of Spain's Subjects in the Ports of East-India to the Merchants of the East-India Company trading into those parts, whereby they were much damnified; and thereupon suspecting that it might be in vain to complain for redress in an ordinary course of Justice in the East-

India, or in default thereof to return into Spain to make complaint to that purpose, where nothing was likely to be done till they had sent from thence again into the East-Indies, and received an answer; And after all this, upon denial of Justice in Spain, to come into this Kingdom for Letters of Request, without which in ordinary course they should not use Reprisal, and many years would be spent before they could come to have an end of their suits; It is true, that thereupon, partly in their defence, and partly for amends, and partly for revenge, they did by pretext of the said Letters Patents take some Goods of the Portugals in the East-Indies, Subjects to the King of Spain; and afterwards being Commanded by the King of Persia to transport certain Forces of his in Ormus an Island situate in the Country of Persia, some Goods of Portugals Subjects to the King of Spain were there taken by Captain Blish and Captain Wedel, and others of their Company, being servants and in pay under the East-India Company.

In July, 1623. Two Ships called the Lyon and the Jonas, being part of a Fleet belonging to the said Company, returned from Ormus aforesaid out of an East-Indian Voyage, and arrived in the Downs richly laden with Goods and Merchandise lawfully belonging to the said Company and estimated to the value of One hundred thousand pounds. The Duke of Buckingham, in or about October 1623. being advertised thereof, well knowing the Company to be rich, and apprehending in himself a probable ground how he might exact and extort some great sum of Money from the said Company out of the profit of these Ships and their lading, by colour of his Office of Lord Admiral of England, and out of his power and greatness, his Office being used for a ground-work of his design therein, did thereupon pretend, that the lading of the said Ships was for the most part with Goods Pyratally taken at Sea in the parts about Ormus aforesaid, and that a Tenth part, or some other great share thereof, did belong to him in the right of his said Office of Lord Great Admiral of England, and by vertue of his Letters Patents and Grant from his late Majesty in that behalf; alledging withal, howsoever the said Company might peradventure answer the matter, yet there would and might be strong opposition against them. These words were used to possess them with fear, and to make them stand in awe of his power, when he should come afterwards particularly to press them to yield to his unjust demands. Having once resolved of his ends, which was to get Money, he thus proceeded to effect the same. In the Months of November, December, January, and February then next following, he had divers times Treaties by himself and his Agents with the then Governour and others of the said Company, for the effecting of his said designs, wherein he still unlawfully pretended that a Tenth part, or some other great share out of the Lading of the said Ship belonged unto him; albeit the said Company upon right information of their Cause to their Council, both Civilians and Common-Lawyers, were advised that there did no Tenths or other such shares belong to the said Duke, as he pretended.

And whereas the said Duke by this time finding that he could not prevail to get his ends by any fair course, continued yet resolute to make his gain upon the Company by right or wrong,

Car. 2.

1626. as he might; and to that purpose made use of the following opportunities and advantages; in such cunning and abusive manner as I shall further open to your Lordships: The said Duke well knowing that the said Company had then four Ships, called the Great James, the Jonas, the Star, and the Eagle, and two Pinaces called the Spy, and the Scout, the said Ships and Pinaces, with their Victuals, Store and Ordnance, were of the value of Fifty four thousand pounds and more, laden with Lead, Cloth, and other Merchandise in them to the value of Twenty thousand Pounds and more, and having in them also about Thirty thousand pounds in Royals of Spanish Money; in all, One hundred thousand pounds and more.

These Ships and Pinaces were well near ready to set Sail for a Voyage into the East-Indies by the first day of March, in the One and twentieth year of his said late Majesties Reign; and he well knowing how great a hinderance it would be to the said Company, if the said Ships and Pinaces should be stayed for any long time, the rather in regard if they did not set Sail about that time of the year, or within Twenty daies after, they had utterly lost their Voyage for that year; the reason thereof dependeth upon a secret of Winds, called the Man-sounds, which are constantly six Months Easterly, and six Months Westerly, every year, at their set times, in those parts of Africa, about the Cape of Bona Speranza; (for of those Winds, all Ships going hence into the East-Indies, are to make their use, in the usual and due time; which yet cannot be done, if men take not their opportunity by coming to the Cape in their proper and due season, and in so long and dangerous a Voyage, wherein the Equinoctial Line is twice to be passed, it is no good discretion to stay the utmost time in going from hence, in confidence of fair Winds, but rather to take time enough beforehand, for fear of the contrary: Nor can the Lord Admiral of England, who is Custos marium Domini Regis, and hath Jurisdiction of all Foreign parts, Super altum mare, be admitted to pretend himself ignorant of this Secret, or of any other particulars belonging to the Seas and Voyages.) The Duke therefore apprehending, and well weighing how great a hinderance, or rather what an absolute loss it would be to the Company, if these their Ships and Pinnaces of so great value, and bound forth in so instant and difficult a Voyage, should be stayed for any long time, now they were ready to set Sail, and the season of going upon point to expire: The said Duke, upon the said first day of March, 1623. to effect his designs upon the said Company, and to get that by circumvention and surprisal, which in a legal and due course of Justice he had no hopes to obtain: Not thinking it sufficient, that the sense of his displeasure lying over the Company as an ominous cloud threatening a storm, if they did not appease him by some great Sacrifice; and to cast them yet further into a farther strait, not sparing to abuse your Lordships in Parliament, by making you unwilling Instruments to give colour and advantage to his secret and unlawful practices: Upon the said first day of March, he put your Lordships, sitting in Parliament, in mind, touching the great business likely to ensue upon dissolution of the then Treaties with Spain, and that a speedy resolution thereof was necessarily required, for that the Enemy would pretermitt no time; and if we should lose the benefit of that Spring, he said it would be irrevokable; and thereupon he took occasion to move that House, whether he should make stay of any Shipping that were then in the Ports, (as being High Admiral he might) and namely, the said Ships prepared for the East-Indian Voyage, which were of great burden, well furnished, and fit to guard our own Coasts: Which motion was generally approved of the whole House, knowing nothing of the Duke's secret designs and private intentions. And the same day a motion was made amongst the Commons in Parliament to the same effect, by Sir Edward Seymour, Knight, the Vice-Admiral to the Duke of the County of Devon; which, in respect of the time when, and person by whom it was propounded, is very suspicious, that it issued all from one Spirit, and that he was set on by the Duke, or some of his Agents; the truth whereof, your Lordships may be pleased to search out, and examine as you shall see cause. By colour of this Order of the Lords House of Parliament, the Duke caused John Pexal, Marshal of the Admiralty, to make stay to be made of the said Ships and Pinnaces; howbeit, notwithstanding all the occasion pretended for the defence of the Realm, there were not any other Ships staid at this time.

The Company perceiving, by the course of things, from whence these Evils moved, upon the Fifth of March, 1623. became earnest Suitors to the said Duke for a Release of their said Ships and Pinaces; whereunto the said Duke replied, That he had not been the cause of their stay; but having heard the motion in the Lords House, he could do no less than order as they had done: Yet to attain his ends, and put them in some hope of favour by his means, he told them withal, That he had something in his Pocket that might do them good, and willed them to set down what Reasons they would for their Suit, and he would acquaint the House therewith: Nevertheless about this time, he presumed of himself at Thobalds, to give leave for the Ships and Pinaces to fall down as far as Tilbury, there to attend such further directions as should be given unto them, with leave so to signify by word of mouth to the Sergeant of the Admiralty, for that the Duke had then no Secretary with him. Thus sometime by threatening of strong oppositions and terrors, and otherwhile by intimating hopes of favour, and good assistance, the Duke sought to accomplish his purpose, yet prevailed not; and so the Tenth of March, 1623. the King's Advocate, Mr. Dr. Reeves, Advocate for the King, and Lord Admiral, made Allegation in the Admiralty on the Duke's behalf; and by his procurements, that it appeared by Examinations there taken, that 150000 l. and more, Pyratikally taken by the said Captain Blith, and Wedel, and their Complices, upon the Sea near Ormus, and in other parts, within the Jurisdictions of the Admiralty, was come into the possessions of the Treasures of the East-India Company, and remained in their hands, and prayed it might be attached; and the said Treasurers be monished to appear the Wednesday then next following, and there to bring in the 150000 l. to remain in Deposit with the Register of that Court.

The same Tenth of March, a Warrant issued forth accordingly, directed to the Marshal of the said Court; and upon the same next Wednesday, the Seventeenth of March, the said Warrant, rant was returned by the said Marshal, that the day before he had attached the said Moneys in the hands of Mr. Stone, then present in the Court, and had admonished him, and Mr. Abbot, the Deputy-Governour of that Company, and divers others then present, to bring in the same into Court. Upon the same Wednesday also, it was pray'd by the King's Advocate, That Mr. Stone, and all that had an interest in this Money, might be pronounced as in Contumacy, and therefore be arrested and detained until 150000*l*. were brought into the Register. Hereupon Sentence of Contumacy was pronounc'd, but the payment thereof was respited until Friday following. Upon which Seventeenth of March, this Sentence being pronounced, Mr. Stone, Mr. Abdy, and others, Officers of the said Company, then present, informed how the Governour was lately dead, and buried but the day before; and that upon Wednesday then next following, they had appointed a Court for Election of a new Governour, and until then they could resolve of nothing, and therefore desired further respite. The Advocate nothing relenting at this reasonable excuse, and desire of the Company, did again earnestly press their Imprisonments, but the Judge took time to consider of it. The Company finding by these extraordinary and extreme courses, the drift of the Duke, whose greatness and power seemed unresistable, and his mind implacable, without satisfaction to his own content, and withal observing what a streight they were cast into, by reason of the stay of their Ships; which, if it were much longer, they must needs lose their Voyage utterly for this year, and the very unloading of them would endamage them to the value of the sum extorted; And being told, that the Eye of the State was upon this business, and that it would light heavy upon them; and hearing the Duke protest, their Ships should not go, unless they compounded with him; and finding that he made difficulty of releasing their Ships, by saying, The Parliament must be moved, before they could be discharged, albeit the Wind were now fair for them. And making overture of some reasonable grounds of composition, by offering to grant Letters of Mart to the said Company for the future, against the Subjects of the King of Spain, while yet the Peace and Treaty between his late Majesty and the King of Spain, were not broken or dissolved.

Anno

The said Company being intangled by the Duke's subtilty, and overcome at last by the terror of his power and greatness, was drawn to make offer of Six thousand pounds to the said Duke, which was rejected as a base offer. And now the time pressing them on very hard, some consultations were had amongst them, Whether it were better for them to make use of a Clause in their Patent, allowing them Three years to draw home their Estates, and so to let their Company die, and be dissolved, or else to yield to the Duke's desire: Yet in conclusion, they were drawn in to offer him Ten thousand pounds for their Peace, if it could serve; which offer was made unto him accordingly, but at first he would not accept it; howbeit, about the Three and twentieth of March, 1623. they agreed to give him the said Ten thousand pounds, which he accepted; and forthwith moving the Lords of Parliament, or acquainting them therewith, he retracted their Ships, and gave them leave to depart on their Voyage; which they accordingly did, setting Sail the Seven and twentieth day of the Month from the Downs. And afterwards upon the Fifth of April, 1624. the Duke signified unto the Lords House of Parliament, That his Majesty, at the humble Petition of the East-India Company, had commanded him to discharge the East-India Ships, which he had once stayed, according to the order of this House, made the First day of March then last past; and moved, That the said Order might be countermanded: and thereupon it was ordered, That the Clerk of that House should cross the said Order of the First of March out of his Book, which was done accordingly; and afterwards the said Ten thousand pounds was paid unto the said Duke; which he received and accepted accordingly. And upon the Eight and twentieth day of April aforesaid, suffered a colourable Sentence in the Admiralty to be given against him for their discharge, in such sort, as by the same Sentence appeareth. And for a colour, he sealed and delivered unto the said Company, a Deed of Acquittance or Release of the said Ten thousand pounds, and of all his pretended rights against them, as by the Deed thereof also appeareth. And whereas it may be imagined by some misconceit, that out of this an aspersion may be laid upon his late Majesty, in regard the Duke was pleased to say in the Conference between both Houses, 18 March last, That the said King had Ten thousand pounds of the said Company, by occasion of this business: The House of Commons have been very careful in their proceedings in this, as in all other things they have, and ever shall be, to do nothing which may reflect upon the Honour of their Kings: And in this particular, by that which hath been here at first declared of the manner and occasion of the said Goods and Moneys taken from the said Portugals, and receiving the same as aforesaid, while the said Peace was continuing, and the said Treaties indissolved; it appeareth, that it had not been safe for the said Company to stand out a Suit concerning that business, wherein they might have need of his Majesties Mercy and Pardon, but it was both safe and good for them to give Ten thousand pounds; and it well stood with his late Majesties Honour, for that sum to grant them a Pardon, which he did, to their great contentment and satisfaction; and yet we find, that this Ten thousand pounds also was paid into the hands of Mr. Oliver, the Duke's Servant, but find not any Record, by which it doth appear unto us, that ever it came unto his late Majesties use. And it is observable in this case, That the oppression fell upon the same Company shortly after the great affliction which happened unto some of them at Amboyna in the East-Indies, by means of the Dutch, which might have moved a Noble mind, rather to pity than punish the Company, after such a Distress so lately suffered.

Having now finished the Narrative part belonging to this Charge, I shall observe unto your Lordships upon the whole matter, the nature of the Duke's offences by this Article complained of, and what punishment it may deserve. His default consisteth in the unjust extorting and receiving the Ten thousand pounds from the East-India Company, against their wills, by colour of his Office. Yet, as offenders in this kind have commonly some colour to disguise and mask their Corruptions, so had he: His colour was the Anno 1626. the release of his pretended right to the Tenth part, or some other share of the Goods, supposed to be Pyratcally taken at Sea by the Captain, and the Servants, or the Company: And though his Lordship may perhaps call his Act therein, a lawful Composition, I must crave pardon of your Lordships to say thus, That if his supposed Right had been good, this might peradventure have been a fair Composition: The same pretence being unsound, and falling away, it was a meer naked Bribe, and an unjust Extortion; for if way should be given to take Money by colour of Releases of pretended Rights, men, great in power, and in evil, would never want means to extort upon the meaner sort at their pleasures, with impunity. It remains therefore, that I should prove unto your Lordships only two things: First, That a pretence of Right by the Duke, if he had none, will not excuse him in this case; and in the next place, to shew by reason and good warrant, That he had in Law no Right at all to Release.

For the former, I will rely upon the substance of two notable Presidents of Judgments in Parliament, the one ancient in the 10 Rich. 2. at which time the Commons preferred divers Articles unto the Lords in Parliament, against Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chancellor of England, accusing him, amongst other things, by the first Article of his Charge, That while he was Lord Chancellor, he had refused to give Livery to the chief Master of St. Anthony's, of the profit pertaining to that Order, till he had security from them, with Sureties by Recognizance of Three thousand pounds, for the payment of One hundred pounds per annum to the Earl, and to John his Son, for their lives. The Earl, by way of Answer, set forth a pretended Title in his Son, to the chief Mastership of that Order, and that he took that One hundred pound per annum, as a Composition for his Sons Right. The Commons replied, shewing amongst other things, That the taking of Money for that which should have been done freely, was a selling of the Law, and so prayed Judgment. In conclusion, the pretended Right of his Son not being just, or approved, the offence remained single by it self a sale of Law and Justice, as the Law termeth it, and not a Composition for the Release of his Interest. So the Earl for this, amongst the rest, was sentenced, and greatly punished, as by the Records appeareth.

The other President of like nature, is more Modern, in the Case of the Earl of Middlesex, late Lord Treasurer of England, who was charged by the Commons in Parliament, and transmitted to your Lordships for taking of Five hundred pounds of the Farmers of the Great Customs, as a Bribe, for allowing of that Security for payment of their Rent to the late King's Majesty, which, without such reward of Five hundred pounds, he had formerly refused to allow of. The Earl pretended for himself, That he had not only that five hundred pounds, but five hundred pounds more, in all, one thousand pounds, of those Farmers, for a Release of his Claim, to Four of Two and thirty parts of that Farm: But, upon the proof, it appearing to your Lordships, that he had not any such part of that Farm as he pretended, it was in the 13 of May, in the 22 year of his late Majesties Reign, adjudged by your Lordships in Parliament (which I think is yet fresh in your memories) That the Earl for this, amongst other things, should undergo many grievous Censures, as appeareth by the Records of your Lordships House, which I have lately seen and perused.

And now being to prove, that the said Duke had no Title to any part of the Goods by him claimed against the East-India Company, I shall easily make it manifest, if his Lordships pretence by his own Allegation in the Admiralty were true, That the Goods whereof he claims his share, were Pyratcally taken. From which Allegation, as he may not now recede, so it is clear by Reason and Authority, That of such Goods, no part or share whatsoever is due to the Lord Admiral, in right of his Office, or otherwaies.

1. For that the Parties from whom the same were taken, ought to have restitution, demanding it in due and reasonable time; and it were an injury to the intercourse and Law of Nations, if the contrary should be any way tolerated.

2. By Law; for so are the Statutes of this Kingdom, and more especially in 27 Edw. 3. 13. whereby it was provided, That if any Merchant, Privy or Stranger, be robbed of his Goods upon the Sea, and the same came afterwards into this Realm, the Owner shall be received to prove such Goods to be his, and upon proof thereof shall have the same restored to him again.

Likewise 1, 2, 3 Edw. 6. 18. in the Act of Parliament, touching Sir Thomas Seymour, Great Admiral of England, who therein, amongst divers other things, is charged with this, That he had taken to his own use Goods Pyratcally taken against the Law, whereby he moved almost all Christian Princes to conceive a grudge and displeasure, and by open War to seek remedy by their own hands: And therefore for this, amongst other things, he was Attainted of High Treason, as appeareth by that Act, wherein the Law is so declared to be as before is expressed.

But if it should be admitted, that the Duke had Right in this case, for which he might compound; yet the manner of his seeking to try and recover his Right, is, in it self, an high offence, and clearly unlawful in many respects, whereof I will touch but a few: As, in making the most Honourable House of Parliament an Instrument to effect his private ends for his profit: In proceeding to arrest and stay the Ships of men not apt to fly, but well able to answer and satisfy any just Suits which he might have against them, though their Ships had gone on in their Voyage, In prosecuting things so unseasonably, and urging them so extremely by his Advocate, for bringing in of so great a sum of money upon the sudden, and formally under colour of Justice and Service for the State: In reducing that Company into that strait and necessity, that it was as good for them to compound, though the Duke had no Title, as to defend their own just Right against him upon these disadvantages, which by his power and industry he had put upon them.

Then he read the Seventh and Eight Articles, which he handled jointly, as being not two Charges, but two several parts of one and the same Charge, as followeth:

Your Lordships may have observed, how in handling the former Articles, I have in my discourse used the method of time, which I hold to be best for the discovery of the truth: I shall therefore, by your Lordships patience, whereof now I have had some good experience, use the like order in my enlargement upon these latter Articles; touching which, that which I have to say, is thus:

In

Anno 1626:
In or about the two and twentieth year of the Reign of our late dear Sovereign Lord King
James, of famous memory, there being then a Treaty between our said late Sovereign and the French King, for a Marriage to be had between our then most Noble Prince (now our most gracious King) and the French King's Sister (now our Queen) and for entering into an active War against the King of Spain, and his Allies in Italy, and the Valloine. Our said late Sovereign passed some promise to the French King's Embassadour here, the Marquess D'Effiat, for procuring or lending some Ships to be employed by the French in that Service, upon reasonable conditions; but without thought or intent that they should be employed against the Rochellers, or any others of our Religion in France: For it was pretended by the French King's Ministers to our King, That the said Ships should be employed particularly against Genoa, and not otherwise. But afterwards some matter of suspicion breaking forth from those of our Religion in France, that the Design for Italy was but the pretence to make a Body of an Army fall upon the Rochellers, or other of our Religion in that Kingdom; the King grew so cautious in his Conditions, that as he would perform his promise to lend his Ships, so to preserve those of our Religion, he contracted or gave directions, that the greatest part of the Men in the same Ships should be English, whereby the power of them should be ever in his hands.

And the Duke of Buckingham then, and yet, Lord Great Admiral of England, well knowing all this to be true, pretended he was and would be very careful, and proceed with Art, to keep the said Ships in the hands of our King, and upon our own Coasts; and yet nevertheless underhand he unduly intended, practised and endeavoured the contrary: For afterwards by his direction or procurement, in or about the Two and twentieth year aforesaid, a Ship of his Majesties called the Vanguard, being of his Majesties Royal Navy, was allotted and appointed to be made ready for the Service of the French King, and seven other Merchant Ships of great burden and strength, belonging to several persons, Natural Subjects of our said late Sovereign Lord, were by the Duke's direction impressed as for the Service of his said late Majesty, and willed to make themselves ready accordingly. The Names and Tonnage of the said seven Merchants Ships were
as followeth.

1. The Great Neptune, whereof Sir Ferdinando Gorge was Captain.
2. The Industry, of the burden of four hundred and fifty Tons, whereof James Moyer was Captain.
3. The Pearl, of which Anthony Touchin was Captain.
4. The Marigold, of 300 Tons, Thomas Davies Captain.
5. The Loyalty, of 300 Tons, Jasper Dare Captain.
6. The Peter and John, of 350 Tons, John Davies Captain.
7. The Gift of God, of 300 Tons, Henry Lewen Captain.

Also about the same time a Contract was made by and between Sir John Cook, and other the Commissioners of his Majesties Navy, as in behalf of his Majesty for his said Ship the Vanguard, and on behalf of the Captains, Masters, and Owners of the said seven Merchants Ships, but without their privy or direction, for the service of the French King, upon conditions to be safe and reasonable for our King, this Realm and State; as also for the said Captains, Masters, and Owners of the said seven Merchants Ships, and for the Companies. For Sir John Cook drew the Instructions for the Direction, of the said Contracts; which Instruction passed and were allowed by the King, and such of the Council, as were made acquainted therewith, and used in this business. In which Instructions, as Sir John Cook hath since alledged in the House of Commons, there was care taken for provision to be made, that the said Ship of his Majesty called the Vanguard, should not serve against the City or Inhabitants of Rochel, or those of that Religion in France; nor take into her more men of the French, than she could from time to time be well able to command and Master. But whether the Instructions for the Merchants Ships, and the King's said Ship, were all one, is not yet cleared unto the Commons; howbeit, it appeareth not, but that the intent of our King and State was, to be alike careful for both. Nevertheless a form of Articles, dated the Five and twentieth day of March, in the three and twentieth year of his said late Majesties Reign, was prepared, ingros-sed, and made ready to be sealed, without the knowledge of the Captains, Masters, and Owners of the said Merchants Ships, between the said Marquess D'Effiat, the Embassadour, on the one part, and the several Owners of the said Merchants Ships respectively, on the other, viz. A several Writing or Instrument for every of the said Ships respectively, whereby amongst other things, as by the same appeareth, it was cove-nanted and agreed by and on the part and behalf of the Owners, to and with the said Marquess D'Effiat, to this effect, namely,

1. That their said Ships respectively, with a certain number of men for every of them limited, with Ordnance, Munition, and other necessaries, should be ready for the French King's Service, the 13 of April then next following.
2. That they should go in that Service under a French General, to be as Captain in every of the said Merchants Ships respectively; of the appointment of the French King, or his Embassadour.
3. That they should serve the French King against any whomsoever, but the King of Great Britain.
4. That they should take in as many Souldiers into their said several Ships as they could stow or carry, besides their Victual and Apparel.
5. That they should continue Six Months, or longer, in the Service, so that the whole time did not exceed Eighteen Months.
6. That they should permit the French to have the absolute command of their Ships, for Fights and Voyages.

And it was amongst the said Articles, besides other things, covenanted and agreed by the said Marquess D'Effiat; as, for and on the behalf of the French King, to this effect, namely.

- I. That there should be paid to every Owner a Months Freight in hand, after the rate agreed on; and Freight for two Months more after the same rate, within fifteen daies after the date of the Articles; the computation of the Months to begin from the 28 of March.

II. And

11. 'And that the Ships should be ready in a certain form prescribed at the end of the Service.

Anno 1626.

'When all things were in a readiness for circumvention and surprisal of the Owners, Captains, and Masters of the said Ships, then, and not before, they were suddenly pressed to seal the Counterparts of the prepared Articles, and they were about the same time released and discharged from the Imprest of his Majesties Service, and acquainted and designed to serve the French King, the said three Months Pay being offered, and afterwards paid unto them beforehand, as a Bait to draw on and intangle them in the business. Nevertheless, the Captains and Owners of the said Merchants Ships doubted upon some points, (to wit) First, against whom they should be employed. Secondly, what Foreign Power they should be bound to take into their Ships. And Thirdly, What sufficient security they should have for that Freight, and redelivery of their Ships.

'But there were private Instructions given to Captain John Pennington, Captain of the King's Ship the Vananguard; as for him and the whole Fleet, that he should observe the first Instructions, to wit, Not to serve against those of the Religion, and to take into his Ship no more French-men than they could Master. The pretence of Genoa, and these private Instruments for Pennington, were but a further Artifice of the Duke's to draw the Ships into France, and to conceal the breaking forth of the matter here in England: And the more to endear them, and confirm them in an opinion of right intention, they were commanded to conceal these private Instructions, as if the Duke and his Agents had trusted them more than they did the Embassadors: By these and other like cunning and undue proceedings of the said Duke, the said Marquess D'Effiat sealed one part, and the Owners of the said Merchants Ships respectively sealed the other parts of the said pretended Articles, trusting they should not be bound to the strict performance thereof, by reason of the said private Instructions to the contrary. After the passing of these Articles, the said Ships being formerly ready, the said Duke May 8. 1625. made a Warrant under the Great Seal, to call the companies aboard which had been raised & fitted for the said French service, according to former Instructions, & with first opportunity to go to such Port as the French Embassador should direct, &c. there to expect Directions of the Party that should be Admiral of the said Fleet, so prepared, with a require of all Officers to be assistant hereunto.

'All things being now in readiness, Captain Pennington being Admiral of this whole Fleet, in May 1625. went with the King's said Ship the Vananguard, and the seven Merchants Ships aforesaid to Diep in France: There instantly the Duke of Memorancy, Admiral of France, would have put 200 French Souldiers aboard the Ship called the Industry, being no more men than she could stow, but a far greater proportion of men than her proper Company was able to command or master; and offered also to do the like to every one of the said Ships, telling the said Captain Pennington, and other the said English Captains, and Owners, and their Companies in direct terms, that they were to go, and should go to serve against the City and Inhabitants of Rochel, and against those of our Religion: whereunto they all shewing themselves unwilling, there were

'Chains of Gold and other Rewards offered unto some of the Captains, Masters, and Owners, to induce them: All which they utterly refused, protesting unanimously against the Design, and would not take in above a fit number of men, such as they might be able to command.

'Also the Company of the Kings Ship did there inform Captain Pennington of this Overture made to go against Rochel, and exhibited a Petition to him against the same, subscribing their names to the Petition in a Circle or Compass, that it might not appear who was the beginner of the same, and then they laid it under his Prayer-Book, where he found and read it. Whereupon Captain Pennington and the rest consulted more seriously of the matter, and by a general assent returned all back to the Downs, where they arrived about the end of June, or beginning of July 1625. From thence Captain Pennington sent a Letter to the Duke of Buckingham by one Ingram, with the said Petition, and imployed him to become a Suitor to get a discharge from serving against Rochel: Ingram delivered the Letter to the Duke, and saw him read it together with the said Petition: whereby, as by other former and later means, he had full notice of the Design, and intent of the French to go against the Rochellers: James Moyer also about the same time came to the Court, and had conference with my Lord Conway and Sir John Cook, (now Secretary) acquainting them what had passed at Diep, praying them to acquaint the Duke, which they did, and the Duke delivered the said Letter and Petition to Sir John Cook. The Duke of Chevreux and Monsieur de Villocleer being now come into England, as Extraordinary Embassadors from the French King, they and the said Marquess D'Effiat, more especially D'Effiat, solicited and got a Letter from the Lord Conway by the Duke's means, dated July 10. 1625. directed to Captain Pennington, whereby he took upon him to express and signify his Majesties pleasure to be, That his Majesty had left the command of the Ships to the French King, and that now Captain Pennington should receive into them so many men as that King should please for the time contracted, and recommended his Letter to be as a sufficient Warrant in that behalf. All this while the King or body of the Council were never made acquainted with any other design than that of Genoa, nor heard any thing of the passages at Diep, nor of the design of Rochel, nor of our Masters and Companies Petitions, Informations, or Complaints thereupon. This Letter of the Lord Conway's was sent by Parker from Hampton-Court unto Pennington, being now about the Downs, and was not long after delivered into his hands. About this time Monsieur de la Touche, and others, as from the Duke de Rohan, and others of the Protestant party in France, solicited our King and Council against the going of the Ships, and had good words and hopes from both, but from the Duke the contrary, who told them, the King his Master was obliged, and so the Ships must and should go.

'The Ships remain still in the Downs, and afterwards, viz. about July 15. 1625. there was a Treaty at Rochester between the three Embassadors Extraordinary of France, and James Moyer, and Anthony Touchin for themselves and other English Captains, and Masters of Ships, &c.

Anno 1626. The said Moyer and Touchin being by message commanded to attend the Duke of Buckingham at Rocheſter, for concluſion and ſettlement to be had of this buſineſs, the ſaid Ambaſſadors did there proffer and offer to the ſaid Moyer and Touchin an Instrument in French purporting thus, viz.

1. That the ſaid Engliſh Captains and their Companies ſhould conſent and promiſe to ſerve the French King againſt all, none excepted but the King of Great Britain, in conformity of the Contract formerly paſſed between d'Effiat and them.

2. That they ſhould conſent and agree, in conſideration of the aſſurance given them by the Ambaſſadors, to the Articles of March 25. 1625. whereby the French King ſhould be made Maſter of the ſaid ſhips, by indifferent Inventory; that then they ſhould by him be warranted againſt all hazards of Sea-fight, & if they miſcarried, then the value thereof to be paid by the French King, who would alſo confirm this new Propoſition within fifteen days after the ſhips ſhould be delivered to his uſe by good caution in London.

3. That if the French King would take any men out of the ſaid ſhips, he might, but without any diminution of freight for or in reſpect thereof.

The ſaid James Moyer having gotten the French Instrument interpreted, answered, 1. They would not go to ſerve againſt Rochel; 2. nor ſend their ſhips without good warrant for their going; and 3. not without ſufficient ſecurity to their liking for payment of their freight, and reddition of their ſhips, or the value thereof; for the Ambaſſadors ſecurity was by them taken not to be ſufficient, and they proteſted againſt it, and utterly reſuſed this peraffetted Instrument: Here alſo Sir John Epſly and Sir Thomas Love diſſwaded the Duke from this enterpriſe, telling him, he could not juſtifie nor answer the delivery of the ſhips to the French.

The Lord Duke being at Rocheſter, and there acquainted with all theſe proceedings, commanded the ſaid Moyer and the reſt before theſe Ambaſſadors, that they ſhould obey the Lord Conway's Letter, and return to Diep to ſerve the French, and that ſo was our King's pleaſure; Howbeit, herein his Majeſties pleaſure appeared not, but the contrary: yet privately at the ſame time the Duke told them, that the ſecurity offered, or formerly given by the Ambaſſador, was inſufficient, and that though they went to Diep, yet they might and ſhould there keep their ſhips in their own power, till they had made their own Conditions to their own liking. July 16. 1625. the Duke of Chevereux, and Monsieur Villocleer, finding that they could not accompliſh their deſigns at Rocheſter, but they muſt be fain to defer the getting thereof till the coming of the ſhips back again to Diep, where it was thought that better opportunity, and more advantage for their ends would be had, did, to that purpoſe, make and ordain the Marqueſs d'Effiat their Deputy to contract with the Captains and Maſters of the Engliſh ſhips for the French King's ſervice, as effectually as themſelves might do, thereby transferring their power in that behalf to the ſaid d'Effiat, who intended to go over to Diep forthwith about this buſineſs. The Duke of Buckingham having thus the ſecond time dealt with the Captains and Maſters to go to Diep, and arm'd and prepar'd d'Effiat how and in what manner there to circumvent them, ſent over to Diep privately; and underhand, his Secretary, Mr. Edward Nicholas, together with d'Effiat. Mr. Nicholas at and before the going over, had inſtructions from the Duke by word, to ſee the execution of the King's pleaſure ſignified by the Letter from my Lord Conway, and to procure the Captains and Maſters of the ſaid Merchants ſhips, to deliver over their ſhips into the hands of the French, upon the ſecurity peraffetted at Rocheſter, by the three French Ambaſſadors, and by them delivered to the Duke of Buckingham, who committed the ſame to the ſaid Mr. Nicholas, as the ſecurity, which in that behalf he was to take and accept. Mr. Nicholas, according to thoſe Inſtructions, went to Diep with d'Effiat, and was there very urgent to get the ſhips delivered to the French, according to the ſaid Inſtructions at their coming over to Diep: d'Effiat entred a Suit and Proteſt againſt our Captains and Maſters, and their original Articles, the better to enforce them to perform the ſame, without reſpect to the Duke's verbal pretences or allegations, made to the Captains and Maſters at Rocheſter, and in other places formerly to the contrary.

The Captains and Maſters came over again to Diep about July 20. where they found themſelves in a ſtrait, by reaſon of the ſaid Proteſt there entred againſt them, the Duke's inſtructions by word being too weak to exempt them from obtaining their Contract under their Hands and Seals; alſo Mr. Nicholas uſing the King's Name with threatning words, was there very earneſt from day to day, and very vehemently preſſed them to deliver over their ſhips, before ſecurity given to their content, contrary to the former Propoſition (viz. the Lord Duke's word to them at Rocheſter) which they reſuſing to yield unto, advertiſement thereof was ſpeedily ſent to the Duke of Buckingham, and to his Agents in England; and Mr. Nicholas continued ſtill at Diep about his former Negotiation.

July 27. 1625. Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Amb. Touchin, James Moyer, Hen. Lewen, Tho. Davies, Jasp. Dard, and James Davies, as Owners and Captains of the ſaid ſeven Engliſh ſhips hired for the French, did expreſs in writing, that they held it fit they ſhould not quit their ſhips till they had made their own reaſonable conditions, and were freed from the queſtions and troubles they were in; and in particular,

1. They pray to be free of the ſaid Proteſt, that they might the better treat of their affairs.

2. If the French King would have delivery of their ſhips into his power and poſſeſſion, that then they might have ſecurity by money depoſited in London, without revocation for ſatiſfaction of their ſhips, the former ſecurity by Merchants being inſufficient, and a ſtop already made of their Pay, which, upon that ſecurity, they know not how to come by.

3. Becauſe their ſhips, being Fortreſſes of this Kingdom, and the delivery of them over into the hands of a Foreign Prince without good warrant, concerneth even their very lives, that they might have a Warrant in that behalf under the Great Seal of England, before they ſhould be bound to deliver them over.

4. To be free of their bonds entred into for not ſelling their Ordnance, and alſo free of puniſhment in that behalf; and they ſhewed how they were more cautious herein, for that Commiſſioners drew the firſt Articles, which were now wholly broken, and theſe Articles were to be done by themſelves.

And this writing they sent from their ships by one Mr. Basset Cole, to present on shoar to the Marquess d'Effiat at Diep, who appointed the said Mr. Cole to treat for a speedy conclusion according to these Articles, who treated accordingly: And the said Marquess, to induce him to yield to his demands, shewed a Letter in French, signed by the Duke of Buckingham, whereby the Duke promised his endeavours to get the Marquess his turn served touching these ships.

The next day, viz. 28 July, 1625. Mr. Nicholas came aboard the Neptune, and declared in writing under his hand, how and why he was sent over by the Duke of Buckingham, as before, and craved the Captain and Master's Answer in writing under their hands, whether they would conform to the Lord Conway's Letter, and to the Instrument peraffetted at Rochester, for delivery over of the said ships, yea or no, offering to procure them a sufficient discharge to their contentment, for their so doing.

The same day also, Sir Ferdinando Gorge, and the rest, by writing, under their hands subscribed, did declare as followeth; namely,

That they were all willing to obey our King, but held not the security peraffetted at Rochester, by the three Ambassadors, to be sufficient (though honourable) and so they absolutely refused to deliver their Ships upon that security, desiring better caution in that behalf.

1. By Merchants of Paris.
2. To be transferred to London.
3. Irrevocable.
4. And such as might not be protected by Prerogative; and to have this under the Hands and Seals of both Kings.

All this while our King, or Body of the Council, knew nothing in certain of any other design of the French, than only of their pretence against Genoa, and believed, that all the Articles and Instruments that had passed between the French and us, or the Captains, Masters, and Owners of the English ships had been penn'd and contriv'd with full and good cautions accordingly, for prevention of all dangers that might grow to the contrary. Also the same 28 July, the Captains and Masters taking notice of Mr. Nicholas pressing them to deliver their ships before security given to their content, contrary to former Propositions, which they held unreasonable, did make answer unto the Marquess in writing, That until they should have security to their contentment, they would not quit the possession of their ships unto the French, (which was but reasonable) and they sent therewith a valuation of their several ships, as they would stand to. They likewise demanded a performance of all things, formerly sent to his Lordship from them by Mr. Nicholas (save only for the security by money deposited) saying, That for all the rest they durst not proceed otherwise.

Lastly, They prayed for a speedy Answer, that the delay in this business may not seem to be in them.

But d'Effiat being confident of the Duke of Buckingham's Letters, promises, and proceedings aforesaid, would not consent to these reasonable demands of the Captains and Masters of the English ships, protracting the time till he might hear further from the said Duke out of England.

While these things were thus in handling both in France and in England, there were written over out of France into England Letters of advertisement, how, and upon what ground, or by what act or means procured or occasioned, appeareth not; yet from one Mr. Larking, a servant to the Earl of Holland, and a kind of Agent, a person some way employed by our State, or under some of our Ambassadors or Ministers in France; That the Peace was concluded with those of our Religion in France; and that within fourteen days the War would break forth, or begin in Italy, with a design upon Genoa; a matter of great importance for annoying the Spaniard.

This Letter of Larking came to the English Court at Richmond, 28 July, when the Dutches of Cheveraux's child was there Christned; and the Contents thereof (as hath been alledged) were confirmed by the Ambassadors of Savoy and Venice: By the advantage and colour whereof, the Duke of Buckingham drew the King, who all this while knew nothing of the design upon Rochel, or those of our Religion, but thought the former Articles had been safe and well penned, both for him and his Subjects, (according to the most Religious and Politick intention, and instructions in that behalf originally given by his late Father) to write a Letter dated at Richmond the same 28 July, directed to the said Captain Pennington to this effect, viz.

His Majesty did thereby charge and command the said Captain Pennington, without delay, to put his Highness former command in execution, for consigning the Vanguard into the hands of the Marquess d'Effiat for the French, with all her Furniture, assuring her Officers, his Majesty would provide for their indemnity; and to require the seven Merchants ships, in his Majesties name, to put themselves into the service of the French King, according to the promise his Majesty had made unto him; and in case of backwardness or refusal, commanding him to use all forcible means to compel them, even to sinking; with a charge not to fail, and this Letter to be his Warrant.

This Letter was sent by Captain Thomas Wilbraham to Captain Pennington, who was yet in the Downs. In the beginning of August 1625. Captain Pennington went over again to Diep, carrying with him the said Letters of his Majesty, and certain Instructions in writing from the Duke of Buckingham to Mr. Nicholas, agreeable in substance to the former verbal Instructions given by the Duke to him at Rochester, as the said Nicholas alledged: who also affirmeth, that in all things what he did touching that business, he did nothing but what was warranted by the Duke's Instructions to him: which, if it be true, then the Duke of Buckingham who commanded and employed him therein, must needs be guilty of the matters so acted by the said Mr. Nicholas. If there be any subsequent act or assent of Council, or of some Counsellors of State for the going of these ships to the French, or for putting them into their power, it was obtained only for a colour, and was unduly gotten, by misinforming the Contents of the sealed Articles, and concealing the Truth, or by some other undue means: Neither can any such latter act of Council in any sort justify the Dukes proceedings, which, by the whole current of the matter, appears to have been indirect in the business even from the beginning. About the time of Capt. Pennington's coming over to Diep the second time, Mr. Nicholas did, in his speeches to the Captains and Masters of the 7 Merchants ships, threaten and tell them, That it was as much as their lives were were worth, if they delivered not their ships to the French, as he required; which put them in such fear, as they could hardly sleep: And thereupon two of them were once resolved to have come again away with the Ships; and because the former threats had made them afraid to return into England, therefore to have brought and left their ships in the Downs, and themselves, for safety of their lives, to have gone into Holland.

Captain Pennington being the second time come into Diep, there forthwith delivered and put the said ship, the Vanguard, into the absolute power and command of the said French King, his Subjects and Ministers, to the said French King's use, to be employed in his service at his pleasure; and acquainted the rest of the Fleet with the effect of his Majesties Letter and Command, and demanded and required them also, to deliver and put their ships into the power and command of the French King accordingly. The Captains, Masters, and Owners of the seven Merchants ships refused so to do, as conceiving it was not the King's pleasure they should so do, without security for delivery of their ships, or satisfaction for the same to their good contentment. Hereupon Pennington went on shoar at Diep, and there spake with d'Effiat the Ambassador, and shortly after returned aboard, and gave the Captains, Masters, and Owners an answer, resting upon the validity, and urging the performance of the former Contract made and peraffected in England.

Then the said Masters and Captains prepared to be gone, and weighed Anchor accordingly. Whereupon Captain Pennington shot at them, and forced them to come again to Anchor, as yielding themselves for fear to his mercy and disposal. Upon this, Captain Pennington and the Frenchmen, that now commanded the Vanguard, came aboard the Merchants ships, and there proposed unto them a new way for their security touching their ships, namely, to accept the security of the Town of Diep: Whereupon they all went ashore, except Sir Ferdinando Gorge, who, with his ship, the Great Neptune, adventured to come away, as not liking these new and unreasonable Propositions. At their coming ashore they speak with Mr. Nicholas, and there by his enforcement came to a new agreement to accept the Security of the Town of Diep, upon certain hard Conditions; namely, The said Marquefs d'Effiat, as Extraordinary Ambassador in England, and as having power by deputation from the Duke of Cheverex and Villocleer, on or about August 15. 1625. did agree and promise to the said Moyer Touchin, Thomas Davies, Dard, John Davies, Leyen, as Captains and Owners of the said ships, called the Industry, the Pearl, the Marygold, the Loyalty, the Peter and John, and the Gift of God, then being in the Road of the Town of Diep, That the French King should give and furnish to the said Owners (they being present, and accepting it in this Town) this sufficient security, That within fifteen days after the said French King should be in possession of the said ships, he should give sufficient caution in London, for the sum of Two hundred and thirteen thousand Livers, whereat the said Ships were estimated, with all that appertaineth to them, as Cannons and other Munitions of War, viz. Fifty thousand pounds. And in or about the same 15th of August, 1625. the Commonalty of the said Town of Diep entered security, and bound the goods of their Commonalty to the said English Captains and Owners, That the said French King and his Ambassadors should furnish the security within the City of London within the time, and for the sum aforesaid.

On or about August 16. 1625. the said Marquefs d'Effiat, as well in his quality of being Ambassador, as by vertue of his said Deputation, did by publick Act promise unto the said Moyer, Touchin, &c. to give and furnish to them (they being present, and requiring it in the Town of Diep) sufficient security in the City of London, within fifteen days after the French King should be in peaceable possession of the said ships, for the sum of Two hundred and thirteen thousand Livers Turnoys, whereat the said ships were valued, namely, for the said ship called the Industry, and so a several sum for every ship, which security should remain for assurance to pay to every of them the prices of their ships, before specified in that Act, in case they should be left in the French King's hands, with other particulars in the said Act mentioned, without derogating nevertheless from the Clauses of the said Contract March 25. 1625. Albeit, because the said Ambassadors had found it good now to discharge the English Mariners out of the said ships, that therefore the freight agreed upon by the said former Contract should not be wholly paid, but only for the space of the first six months; yet if the French King would use them for twelve months longer, or for any less time, that then he should pay freight for the same according to a new particular rate and manner expressed in the said Articles, and bound the goods of himself and the said Duke of Cheverex and Monsieur Villocleer, for the performance hereof, as by the said Article it self, reference being thereto had, amongst other things more fully appeareth.

This Article being passed and recorded at Diep, all the said seven Merchants ships, except the Great Neptune, who was gone away in detention of the Action intended by the French, were forthwith delivered into the absolute possession, power, and command of the French King, and of his said Ambassador d'Effiat, and other the Ministers and Subjects of the French King; to be employed by him in his service at his pleasure, and not one of all the English Company, Man or Boy, (other than one only man, a Gunner as it should seem) would stay in any of those ships, to serve against the Rochellers, or those of our Religion.

As soon as these ships were thus delivered into the possession and power of the French, the said Ambassador then moved them, and dealt earnestly with them for the sale of their ships. Mr. Nicholas having finished the work he went for, at his coming from Diep, he received a Diamond Ring worth fifty pounds, and an Hatband set with sparks of Diamonds, worth one hundred Marks, of the Ambassador, as a recompence for his painstaken in this Employment, which (although Ambassadors do confer greater rewards sometimes at their parting upon persons of Mr. Nicholas his quality, for less service done) yet was it more then so ill an office as he was employed in, could in any sort deserve.

The said Captain Pennington returned speedily into England, and took his journey towards the City of Oxford, where the Parliament was then sitting, by adjournment from Westminster thither, and there several Propositions were taken into debate for the good of our Religion, and the supply

Anno 1626. supply of his Majesties occasions: For the well resolving and settling whereof the true knowledge who, and upon what occasions and terms the severall ships were sent, delivered, imployed, and to be imployed, was very requisite. Afterwards nevertheless upon or about August 6. 1625. at a meeting and conference between both the Houses of Parliament in Christ-Church Hall, after the reading there of his Majesties most gracious Answer to a Petition of the Lords and Commons formerly exhibited unto his Majesty touching our Religion, and much for the good thereof, the Duke of Buckingham well knowing all the passages which I have now related to your Lordships to be true, did not only cautiously conceal the same, but also much boldly and untruly, by colour of a message delivered from his Majesty to both the Houses, affirm unto them touching those ships to this effect; That it was not always fit for Kings to give account of their Counsels, and that about five of the six months were already past, and yet the said ships were not imployed against Rochel; willing and advising the said Lords and Commons to judge the things by the event, to which he seemed to refer the matter. By which cunning Speeches the Duke intended, and accordingly did make the Lords and Commons then to believe that the said ships were never meant, or any way in danger to be employed against the Rochellers; or those of our Religion in France; and herein he did great injury and disservice to his Majesty, to the great scandal and prejudice of our Religion and Affairs, and highly abused both the Lords and Commons by this cautelous and subtle Speech and Insinuation, and thereby gave both Houses occasion to forbear petitioning or suing to his Majesty for Redress in this business, while the time was not then passed; for his ships were not as then actually imployed against the Rochellers, albeit in truth they were then delivered into the French King's Power.

And the same time before the Parliament was dissolved, Captain Pennington, who could have opened the whole truth of the business for the service of the King and the Realm, came to Oxford, but was there drawn to conceal himself by means of the Duke, and not to publish in due time his knowledge of the Premises, as was there shortly after reported. The truth whereof, the Lords in this Parliament may be pleased to examin, as they shall see cause; the Parliament at Oxford being shortly after, viz. August 12. unhappily dissolved.

In or about September, 1625. the said ships were actually employed against the Rochellers, and their Friends, to their exceeding great prejudice, and almost utter ruin. It hath been said by some of the French, that the Vanguard, she mowed them down like grass; to the great dishonour of our Nation, and the scandal of our Religion, and to the disadvantage of the great Affairs of this Kingdom, and all Christendom.

Also the ships themselves were in eminent peril to be utterly lost, for lack of sufficient cautions. If they be come home since this Parliament sate down, long after the matter was here expounded and taken into examination; it may be well presumed, that it is by some underhand procuring of the Duke, and the secret complying of the French with him, to colour out the matter; which the Lords may examin as they see cause. The one and only English man that presumed to stay in one of the ships, and serve against the poor Rochellers of our Religion, at his return was slain in charging a Piece of Ordnance, not by him well sponged. Car. 2.

Upon February last, 1625. Monsieur de la Touche having speech with Mr. Thomas Sherwell, a Member of the Commons House of Parliament, at Salisbury; as he was coming up to the Parliament, and Monsieur de la Touche going down into Somersetshire to Mr. John Paulers to Monsieur Sobysa; He told Mr. Sherwell, in the hearing also of one Mr. John Clements of Plymouth, who is now in Town, the words that the Duke had spoken to him the last Summer, touching these ships; and thereupon used these words, Ce Duque est un méchant homme.

Upon this whole Narration of the Fact touching the manner of Delivery of the Ships to the French, divers things may be observed, wherein the Duke's offences do consist: as, in betraying a ship of the King's Royal Navy unto a Forreign Prince's hand, without good Warrant for the same; the dispossessing the Subjects of this Realm of their ships and goods by many artifices and subtilties, and, in conclusion, with high and open violence, against the good will of the Owners; In breaking the duty of Lord Admiral and Guardian of the Ships and Seas of this Kingdom; In varying from the original good Instructions, and presuming to give others of his own head in matters of State; In violating the duty of a sworn Privy Counsellor to his Majesty; In abusing both Houses of Parliament by a cautelous Misinformation, under a colour of a Message from his Majesty; and in disadvantaging the Affairs of those of our Religion in Forreign parts: Offences of an high and grievous nature.

For the proof of some parts thereof, which are not the least, I offer to your Lordships consideration the Statute of the 2 & 3 of E. 6. touching the Duke of Somerset; wherein is recited, That amongst other things, he did not suffer the Piers, called the Newhaven and Blackest, in the parts beyond the Seas, to be furnished with Victuals and money, whereby the French were encouraged to invade and win the same; and for this offence, amongst others, it was Enacted, That a great part of his Land should be taken from him. And if Non-feazance in a matter tending to lose a fixed Castle belonging to the King, be an high offence; then the actual putting of a Ship-Royal of the Kings, into the hand of a Forreign Prince, which is a moveable and more useful Castle and Fortrefe of the Realm, must needs be held a greater Offence.

I will forbear to cite any more Presidents of this kind, because some of those who have gone before me, have touched at divers Presidents of this nature, which may be applied to this my part. Only, because the abuse of the Parliament, which is the chiefeft Council of State and Court of Judicature in the Realm, is not the least offence in this business, I shall desire your Lordships to take into consideration the Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 30. whereby such as seem to beguile Courts of Justice, are to be sore judged in the same Courts, and punished, as by that Statute appeareth.

So he concluded, and left the Duke to their Lordships equal Justice.

Anno 1626.

The Ninth and Tenth Articles were read next.

IX. Whereas the Titles of Honour of this Kingdom of England were wont to be conferred as great Rewards, upon such vertuous and industrious Persons as had merited them by their faithful service; the said Duke, by his importunate and subtle procurement, had not only perverted that ancient and most honourable way, but also unduly, for his own particular gain, he hath enforced some that were rich (though unwilling) to purchase Honour: as, the Lord R. Baron of T. who, by practise of the said Duke and his Agents, was drawn up to London, in or about October, in the Two and twentieth year of the Reign of the late King James of famous memory, and there so threatened and dealt withal, that by reason thereof he yielded to give, and accordingly did pay the sum of Ten thousand pounds to the said Duke, and to his use: For which said sum, the said Duke, in the month of January, in the Two and twentieth year of the said late King, procured the Title of Baron R. of T. to the said Lord R. In which practise, as the said Lord R. was much wronged in this particular, so the example thereof tendeth to the prejudice of the Gentry, and the dishonour of the Nobility of this Kingdom.

X. Whereas no Places of Judicature in the Courts of Justice of our Sovereign Lord the King, nor other like Preferments given by the Kings of this Realm, ought to be procured by any Subject whatsoever for any Reward, Bribe, or Gift; he the said Duke, in or about the month of December, in the Eighteenth year of the Reign of the late King James of famous memory, did procure of the said King, the Office of High Treasurer of England to the Lord Vicount M. now Earl of M. which Office, at his procurement, was given and granted accordingly to the Lord Vicount M. And as a Reward for the said procurement of the same Grant, he the said Duke, did then receive to his own use, of and from the said Lord Vicount M. the sum of 20000*l.* of lawful money of England. And also in or about the month of January, in the Sixteenth year of the Reign of the said late King, did procure of the said late King, of famous memory, the Office of Master of the Wards and Liveries, to and for Sir L. C. afterward Earl of M. which Office was, upon the same procurement, given and granted to the said Sir L. C. and as a reward for the same procurement, he the said Duke, had, to his own use, or to the use of some other person by him appointed, of the said Sir L. C. the sum of Six thousand pounds of lawful money of England, contrary to the Dignity of our Sovereign Lord the King, and against the duty that should have been performed by the said Duke unto him.

Mr. Pym aggravateth and enlargeth on these and the eleventh Article as followeth.

My Lords,

Although I know that I shall speak to my own disadvantage, yet I shall labour to speak with as little disadvantage to the matter as I can. I have no learning or ornament, whereby I might shew my self, and I shall think it enough plainly to shew the matter: For all that I aim at, is, that I may lose nothing of the Cause. And therefore, my Lords, I shall apply my self with as much convenient brevity, as one that knows that your Lordships time is much more precious than my words: Your Lordships being such Judges, as will measure things by true and natural proportions, and not by the proportion of the action or expression.

The first entrance into my service must be reading the Articles.

My Lords, this Charge, for matter of fact, is so notorious and apparent, that it needs no proof, that these Honours have been procured: And therefore I will only insist upon the Consequence. First, I will shew, that by this fact the Duke hath committed a great offence: And secondly, That this offence hath produced a great Grievance to the Commonwealth. And I will conclude, in strengthening the whole by some Precedents of former times, that Parliaments have proceeded in that course, in which your Lordships are like to proceed.

First, to prove it a fault or an offence, I must prove that there was a duty; for every fault presupposeth a duty: And in this case the first work is to shew, that the Duke was bound to do otherwise: For which I need to alledge nothing else, than that he is a sworn Servant and Counsellor to the King, and so ought to have preferred his Majesties Honour and Service before his own pride, in seeking to Ennoble all that Blood that concerned him. And it is not enough to say, that it is not questionable; for there have been great Men questioned in the like cases. There be some Laws made that are particular, according to the temper and occasions of several States: There are other Laws that be coessential and collateral with Government; and if those Laws be broken, all things run to disorder and confusion. Such is that Rule observed in all States, of suppressing Vice to encourage Vertue, by apt Punishment and Rewards: And this is the fittest Law to insist upon in a Court of Parliament, when the proceedings are not limited either by the Civil or Common Laws, but matters are adjudged according as they stand in opposition or conformity with that which is Suprema Lex, salus Populi.

2. By this late Law, whoever moves the King to bestow Honour, which is the greatest reward, binds himself to make good a double proportion of Merit in that party who is to receive it; The first, of value and excellence; the second, of continuance and durableness. And as this Honour sets men up above others, so they should be eminent in Vertue beyond others: As it is perpetual, not ending with their persons, but descending upon their posterity; so there ought to be in the first root of this Honour some such active merit in the service of the Commonwealth, as might transmit a vigorous Example to his Successors, whereby they may be raised to an imitation of the like Vertues.

He said, He would forbear to urge this point further; out of a modest respect to those persons whom it did collaterally concern, professing his Charge to be wholly against the Duke of Buckingham.

3. From the consideration of Honour, together with the price of Money; the which being compared together, may be reduced to two heads (may it please your Lordships;) the one being earthly and base, may be bought with a proportionable price of white and red Earth, Gold and Silver: The other, which is Spiritual (which is sublime) to which Money cannot be a proportionable price. Honour is transcendent, in regard

Car. 2.

Mr. Pym
enlargeth the Eleventh Article.

Anno 1626. *W*gard it was held a Sacred and Divine thing; insomuch that there was a Temple dedicated to her by the Romans: And so I conclude by prescription, that Honour is a Divine thing; for the Scripture calls Kings, Gods; and then those that are about Kings must needs be resembled to those Powers and Principalities that attend next to the Throne: And if Honour be such a Divine thing, it must not then be bought with so base a price as Money.

4. Lastly, Honour is a publick thing, it is the reward of publick deserts.

And thus your Lordships have seen, that the sale of Honour is an offence unnatural against the Law of Nature. Now what an offence this is, your Lordships may discern, considering the kinds of the offence, and the Adjuncts, which I now fall upon.

1. It extreemly deflowers the Flowers of the Crown; for it makes them cheap to all behold-ers.

2. It takes from the Crown the most fair and frugal Reward of deserving Servants: For when Honour comes to be at so mean a rate as to be sold, there is no great man will look after it.

3. It is the way to make a man more studious of lucre and gain, than of sufficiency of Vertue;
when they know that they shall be preferred to Titles of Honour according to the heaviness of purse, and not for the weightiness of their merit.

4. It introduceth a strange confusion, mingling the meaner with the more pure and refined metal.

5. Lastly, It's a prodigious scandal to this Nation, (as the House of Commons think.)

For Examples and Presidents, I am confident there are none; and your Lordships can look for none, because it is not parallel'd to any President.
But certainly it is now a fit time to make a President of this Man, this great Duke, that hath been lately raised to this transcendent height in our Sphere; who thinketh he cannot shine enough unless he d'm your Lordships Honours, in making the same contemptible through the sale of it, by the commonness of it.

Yet I am commanded further to observe another step of unworthiness in this Gentleman, who hath not only set Honour to sale by his Agents, but compelled men likewise, unwilling to take Titles of Honour upon them. For the particular, that Noble Gentleman that this concerns, I am commanded to say of him from the House of Commons, That they conceive of him, that he was worthy of this Honour, if he had not come to it this way; They can lay no blame upon him, that was constrained to make this bargain to redeem his trouble. But we must distinguish of this, as Divines do between the Active and Passive Usurers; they condemn the Active, speaking favourably of the Passive.

And I must here observe to your Lordships, by the Direction of the House of Commons, That it seems strange to them, that this Great man, whom they have taken notice of to be the principal Patron and Supporter of the Semipelagian and a Popish Faction, set on foot to the danger of this Church and State, whose Tenets are Liberty of Freewill, though somewhat mollified;
That a man, embracing these Tenets, should not admit of Liberty in Moral things: And that he should compel one to take Honour and Grace from a King whether he will or no; what is that, but to add Inhumanity and Oppression to Injury and Incivility? Car. 2.

But here I must answer a President or two, which may be by misunderstanding enforced against me; 5 H. 5. There was Martin, and Barbington, and others, which were chosen to be Serjeants, and they did decline from it out of their modesty, and doubted that their Estates were not answerable to their Place: Yet upon the charge of the Warden of England, they accepted it, and appeared to their Writs. Likewise there is a Writ in the Register, that many, by reason of the Tenure of their Lands, may be compelled to be made Knights. But this makes rather against than for this Faction: For it is true, that this is the wisdom and policy of the Common Law, that those that be thought fit men for Employment, may be drawn forth to be employed for the good of the Commonwealth, where otherwise they would not take it upon them: But that any man, for his gain, should force a man to take Degrees of Honour upon him; certainly this is beyond all Presidents, and a thing not to be exemplified, either in our Nation, or any other.

And further, I am commanded to tell your Lordships, That it is dangerous, that if a great Lord, by his power or strength, may compel a Subject to take such Honours, why may he not compel them as well to take his Lands at what price he will, and to sell them again as he thinks fit; yea, to marry his Children as it pleaseth him? The consequence of this is great, if that it be well considered; and they conceive that it is of so great a consequence, that if it be not stopped, it may come in time to make way for a dangerous Subversion, and demonstrates a great Tyranny of a Subject, under a most wise, most gracious, and most moderate King.

And thus, my Lords, I have done with the first Article allotted to my Charge, and so I proceed to the next.

My Lords, Before I enter into the enforcement of this Article, I shall, by way of Protestation from the House of Commons, do in this, as I did in the other Article. And first, for the King's Majesty, under whom we are now happily governed and placed, I must, by their direction, say, for his honour, and our comfort, and, with humble acknowledgment, confess, that since his coming to the Crown, there have been men of as great parts and learning advanced into Places in Church and Commonwealth, as any have been heretofore. And then for the first of those Lords, whose names are mentioned in this Article, I must say, that they do not intend to reflect at all upon him; nay, they think his person so worthy, as to be advanced to as high a Place, without any price at all, and that he ought to have kept it longer, if those that shuffled in those times, had not shuffled him out. The tenth Article enlarged.

Now to the matter of this Article, which is the Sale of Places of Judicature, being an offence:
And to prove this, is all one as to make the Glass clear by painting of it. The grounds whereon I shall go, shall be laid open; Magna Charta, chap. 29: the words are these; Nulli ven-demus, nulli negabimus Justitiam. It may be said, this comes not close to my purpose; yet, by your Lordships favour, I shall make it good, that it doth,

doth, and I shall begin with the latter of the two Anno first, Nalli negabimus: For if any that hath pow-1626. er or favour with the King, should procure him to delay the making of Judges, when there were Judges to take it, it will not be denied, that they do their best endeavour to make the King break his word; for if any use their favour about the King to procure Places of Judicature for money, they do what in them lies to make Justice sale-ble; for it is plain, that he that buys, must sell, and cannot be blamed if he do sell.

I shall open the evil consequences that depend upon the sale of Places of Judicature, or any Places of great Trust.

1. By this means, unable men shall be sure of the precedence unto Places; for they being conscious of their own want of Merits, they must be made up by the weight of Gold.

2. It must needs hence follow, that Suits, Contentions, Brawls, and Quarrels shall be increased in the Commonwealth. For when men come to seats of Judicature by purchase, they must, by increase of Suits, increase their own profit.

3. Men will not study for sufficiency of Learning to be able to discharge their Places, but how they may scrape together money to purchase Places.

4. It will follow, That those that have the best Purfes, though worst Causes, will carry away the Victory always.

5. It will follow, That when they be preferred for money to those Places, they are tied to make the best of those Places, vis & modis: And then the Great Man that sold those Places to them, must uphold them in their Bribery; and he is tied to it, because they are his Creatures;
 nay further, he is tied to support them in their Bribery, to advance their Places upon the next remove.

6. And lastly, when good men, and well deserving, come to any Place, they shall not continue there, but they shall be quarrelled at, so that there may be a vacancy in that Place, and then some other shall suddenly step into the saddle, by giving a competent price.

Upon these and the like Reasons, this fact of selling and buying Places and Offices of Trust, hath not only been declaimed against by Christians, but also by Moral Pagans. Aristotle in his 5. lib. of Ethics, cap. 8. gives it as a Ca- vas, That no man amongst the Thebans was to take upon him any place of Government in the Commonwealth, if that he were a Merchant, unless there were Ten years distance between.
 And the Reason is this, Because Merchants are used to buying and selling, it is their Trade and Art to get money, so that their fingers are accustomed to that which they cannot leave, when they come to Places of Trust and Judicature. Nay further, in honour of the Merchants, He is accounted the wisest Merchant that gains most; so that if such comes to Offices and Places of Trust, he thinks it best to advance his profit.

Next to the Pagans, the Popes, a Generation full of Corruption, yet they, by their Bulls, are full of Declamation against such. And this is plainly by a Bull of Pius Quintus, who lays the penalty of Confiscation of Goods of any that do for money acquire any Offices, and condemns them by his Papal Sentence to be great sinners. So Gregory the Thirteenth condemns the like.

And now to come nearer home, to come to that which will principally lead your Lordships, which are the Judgments of your Ancestors in Parliament; wherein it appears by the Statute of 5 H. 6. that the same Statute condemns the Seller and Receiver, as well as the Buyer and Giver. It further appears by the Preamble of that Statute, that such offences were against the Law, and they foresaw the Corruptions of those that came into those places by those means, and that it is a hindrance of sufficient and worthy men from those places. And also 2 & 3 E. 6.
 which was likewise cited in the Case of the Duke of Somerset, by which he was to forfeit his Estate, that one thing was for selling of Places in the Commonwealth for money. And certainly with your Lordships favour, it is most just and probable, that they that profess themselves to be Patriots, and shew by their actions, that they aim at their own lucre, and labour to hinder the distributing of Justice; it is most just and proper, that those men should return back again to the publick Treasury of the King and Kingdom, what they have by their unsatisfied lucre gotten.

And so, my Lords, craving pardon of you for my boldness, confusion and distractions, in going through this business, I humbly leave my self to the judgments of your favours and charities, and this great Man, the Duke, to your wise Censure and Justice.

Then was read the Eleventh and Twelfth Articles.

XI. That he the said Duke hath, within these ten years last past, procured divers Titles of Honour to his Mother, Brothers, Kindred, and Allies; as, the Title of Countess of Buckingham to his Mother, while she was Sir Thomas Compton's Wife; the Titles of Earl of A. to his younger Brother Christopher Villiers; the Titles of Baron of M. P. Vicount F. and Earl of D. to his Sister's Husband, Sir W. F. the Titles of Baron of S. and Vicount P. to Sir John Villiers, elder Brother unto the said Duke; and divers more of the like kind to his Kindred and Allies: whereby the Noble Barons of England, so well deserving in themselves, and in their Ancestors, have been much prejudiced, and the Crown disabled to reward extraordinary Vertues in future times with Honour; while the small Estates of those for whom such unnecessary Advancement hath been procured, are apparently likely to be more and more burthensome unto the King, notwithstanding such Annuities, Pensions, and Grants of Lands annexed to the Crown, of great value, which the said Duke hath procur'd for those his Kindred, to support these their Dignities.

XII. He the said Duke not contented with the great Advancement formerly received from the late King, of famous memory, by his procurement and practise, in the Fourteenth year of the said King, for the support of the many Places, Honours, and Dignities conferred on him, did obtain a Grant of divers Mannors, parcel of the Revenue of the Crown, and of the Duchy of Lan- caster, to the yearly value of One thousand six hundred ninety seven pounds two shillings half-penny farthing, of the old Rent, with all Woods, Timber, Trees, and Advowson; part whereof amounting to the sum of Seven hundred forty seven pounds thirteen shillings four pence, was rated at Two and thirty thousand pounds, but in truth of a far greater value. And likewise in the Sixteenth year of the same King's Reign, did procure divers other Mannors annexed to the Crown of the yearly value, at the old Rent, of Twelve hundred pounds, or thereabouts, according as in a Schedule hereunto annexed appeareth: In the Warrant for passing of which Lands, he, by his great favour, procured divers unusual Clauses to be inserted, (viz.) That no Perquisites of Courts should be valued, and that all Bailiffs Fees should be reprised in the particulars upon which those Lands were rated; whereby a President hath been introduced, which all those who, since that time, have obtained any Lands from the Crown, have pursued to the damage of his late Majesty, and of our Sovereign Lord the King that now is, to an exceeding great value. And afterwards, he surrendered to his said Majesty divers Mannors and Lands, parcel of those Lands formerly granted unto him, to the value of Seven hundred twenty three pounds eighteen shillings and two pence half penny per annum; in consideration of which surrender, he procured divers other Lands of the said late King to be sold and contracted for, by his own Servants and Agents, and thereupon hath obtained Grants of the same, to pass from his late Majesty, to several persons of this Kingdom, and hath caused Tallies to be stricken for the Money, being the consideration mentioned in those Grants in the Receipt of the Exchequer, as if any such Monies had really come to his Majesties Coffers; whereas the Duke (or some other by his appointment) hath indeed received the same sums, and expended them upon his own occasions. And notwithstanding the great and inestimable gain by him made by the sale of Offices, Honours, and by other Suits by him obtained from his Majesty, and for the countenancing of divers Projects, and other Courses, burthensome to his Majesties Realms, both of England and Ireland; the said Duke hath likewise, by his procurement and practise, received into his hands, and disbursed to his own use, exceeding great sums, that were the monies of the late King of famous memory, as appeareth also in the said Schedule hereunto annexed: And the better to colour his doings in that behalf, hath obtained several Privy Seals from his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, warranting the payment of great sums to persons by him named, causing it to be recited in such Privy Seals, as if those sums were directed for secret Services concerning the State, which were notwithstanding disposed of to his own use; and other Privy Seals by him have been procured for the discharge of those persons without accompt; and by the like fraud and practise, under colour of free gifts from his Majesty, he hath gotten into his hands great sums which were intended by his Majesty to be disbursed for the preparing, furnishing, and victualling of his Royal Navy; by which secret and colourable devices the constant and ordinary course of the Exchequer hath been broken, there being no means by matter of Record to charge either the Treasurer or Victualler of the Navy with those sums which ought to have come to their hands, and to be accounted for to his Majesty; and such a confusion and mixture hath been made between the King's Estates and the Dukes, as cannot be cleared by the Legal Entries and Records, which ought to be truly and faithfully made, and kept, both for the safety of his Majesties Treasure, and for the indemnity of his Officers and Subjects whom it doth concern. And also in the Sixteenth year of the said King, in the Twentieth year of the said King, he did procure to himself several Releases from the said King of divers great sums of Money of the said King by him privately received, and which he procured, that he might detain the same for the support of his Places, Honours and Dignities. And these things, and divers others of the like kind, as appeareth in the Schedule annexed, hath he done, to the exceeding diminution of the Revenue of the Crown, and in deceit both of our Sovereign Lord the King that now is, and of the late King James of famous memory, and to the detriment of the whole Kingdom.

Before Mr. Sherland entred and enlarged upon the Twelfth Article, in general concerning Honours mentioned in the preceding Article, and spake as followeth,

My Lords,

‘I hath pleased God (who hath the disposing even of all things in his hands) to cast this service now upon me, who did formerly endeavour to decline it, considering the weightiness of the business, the greatness of this presence, and my manifold defects, best known to myself: But another that should have with better contentment, I doubt not; performed this service, being fallen now sick, there is a necessity imposed on me by the House of Commons, wherein I shall be very plain and short, according to the warning I had; yet I shall deal plainly and faithfully, according to the sense of that House by whose command I now appear: And since I am now thrust as a Bush into the Gap, I hope your Lordships will not expect such a composition and strength of Speech which you have had from others of my Companions. The Subjects that fall to my Lot to speak of before your Lordships, are Honour and Justice, two great Flowers of the Crown: I confess my self exceeding unfit and unable to speak of these Points before an Assembly of such Persons of so great Honour, and such Superiour Judges of this Kingdom; but I must take my Lot: It pleaseth your Lordships, as in Sphere to take knowledge of the Grievances presented by the Commons House, which I desire and hope your Lordships will not take presumption.

‘May it please your Lordships, the parts of this Charge, as you discern upon the reading of it, are two; the one general, the other particular: The general is, perverting the ancient and noble course of attaining to the Title of Honour. 2. The other, the compulsion or enforcement of Men unwilling to purchase Honour.

‘For the first by way of Protestation, I am Mr. Sherland commanded by the House of Commons, to say, that they repine not at their advancement upon whom those Honours were conferred, but they think them worthy thereof; yet they wish, for their sakes, and the safety of this Nation, their vertues had solely raised them, and that they had not been forced and constrained to contribute to this bottomless Gulf to attain their Titles.

‘They complain again of this unworthy way brought in by this great man, they fall upon this in this manner, and found the Evils under which the Commonwealth suffers, and the causes of them being two principal Evils, which are the decay and stopping of the Trade, and the determination of Honour. In examination of

1626: of which second Evil, the Trade and Commerce of Honour, we have, as the Commons do, received, confusum rem: For he endeavouring to colour the matter, says for himself, That he was not the only introducer and first bringer in of this; but they find that he was the first that defiled this Virgin of Honour so publicly, making an account, that all things and persons should stoop and subject themselves to his vain desires and extravagancy. Now that this commerce of Honour is an offence; then to prove what kind of offence it is, is the only thing I shall trouble your Lordships with.

1. And first that it is an offence, I shall draw my first Argument from the Nature of Honour; Honour is a Beam of Vertue; now this Honour can be no more fixed upon an undeserving Person for Money, than fire can be struck out of a stick.

2. From the Subject of Honour, which is Merit, for the which no price ought to be paid to any great man by any undeserving person for the same, but their own merit and desert.

Then he passed to the Grievances which are caused by the selling of Titles, and they are Three.

1. First, It is prejudicial to the Noble Barons of this Kingdom.
2. To the King, by disabling him to reward extraordinary vertues.
3. To the Kingdom, which comprehends both Kings, Lords, and People.

For the first, he said, He would not trouble their Lordships with recital, how ancient, how famous the Degree of Barons hath been in these Western Monarchies; He said, the Baronage of England hath longer upheld that Dignity, and doth yet retain a greater height than in any other Nation; they are great Judges, a Court of the last resort, they are great Counsellors of State, and not only for the present, but as Law-makers, Counsellors for the time to come; and this not by Delegacy and Commission, but by Birth and Inheritance; So that when any man shall be made a Member of this great Body, who is not qualified for the performance of such noble Functions, it must needs be a prejudice to the whole Body, and dishonour to the Head. As if a little water be put into a great Vessel of Wine, as it receives spirit and strength from the Wine, so it doth impart some degrees of its own infirmity and coldness to the Wine.

Secondly, It is prejudicial to the King; not that it can disable him from giving Honour (for that is a power inseparable) but by making Honour ordinary, it becomes as an incompetent Reward for extraordinary vertue. When men are noble, they are taken out of the Press of the common sort, and how can it chuse but fall in estimation, if Honour it self be made a Press?

Thirdly, It is prejudicial to the Kingdom; the Stories and Records are full of the great assistance which the Crown hath received from the Barons, both in Forreign and Domestick Actions, not only by their own persons, but by their Retinue and Tenants, and therefore they are called by Bracton, Robur Belli; how can we now expect the like from such as have no Tenants, and are hardly able to maintain themselves?

But this is not all; for the prejudice grows not primitively by defect of that assistance which they might give the State, but positively they have been a great burthen to the Kingdom by Gifts and Pensions already received, and yet stand in need of more for the future support of their Dignities. This makes the Dukes offence the greater, that in this weakness and consumption of the Commonwealth, he hath not been contented alone to consume the Publick Treasure, (which is the blood and nourishment of the State) but hath brought in others to help him in this work of Destruction. And that they might do it more eagerly, by enlarging the Honours, he hath likewise enlarged their Necessities, and their Appetites. He did second his Charge with two Presidents; the first, 28 Hen. 6. in the Complaint against the Duke of Suffolk, in the one and thirtieth Article of that Complaint, this was one of his Charges, That he William de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, had procured one who had married his Niece to be made Earl of Kendal, and obtained for him One thousand pounds per Annum in the Dutchy of Guienne; and yet this Party was the Son of a Noble and well deserving Father. So you see this is no new thing for the House of Commons to complain, that those that are near the King should raise their Kindred to an unnecessary Honour; and if that were worthy of punishment for advancing of one, then what punishment is he worthy of that hath advanced so many?

The second President is 17 Edw. 4. There passed an Act of Parliament for the degrading of John Nevil, Marquess Montague, and Duke of Bedford; the reason expressed in the Act is, because he had not a Revenue sufficient for the maintaining of that Dignity; to which is added another reason of that nature, that when men of mean birth are called to a high Estate, and have not livelyhood to support it, it induceth great poverty, and causeth briberies and extortions, imbraceries and maintenance.

And now, my Lords, how far these Reasons shall lead your Judgments in this Case, I must leave it to your Lordships.

Then he read the Twelfth Article, the Title whereof was, the Exhausting, Intercepting, and Misemploying the King's Revenues.

My Lords, This Article consists of several Clauses, which in some respects may be called so many distinct Charges; for though they all tend to one end and scope, the diminishing the King's Treasure, yet it is by divers ways, so that every Clause is a particular Branch. Therefore he desired to break it into parts, and to select the most material, either in point of offence or grievance, intending to pass through them with this order; first, to declare the state of the proof, and then to add such reasons and inforcements as he did conceive most conduceable to that Judgment which the Commons were to expect from their Lordships.

He made two main Branches of this Article. The first concerns Lands obtained from the Crown; the second concerns Money in Pensions, Gifts, Farms, and other kind of profit.

Touching the Lands he observed four things,

1. The sum of three thousand thirty five pounds per Annum of old Rent, besides the Forest of Loxfield of which we have no value, and we can find no Schedule granted by the late King to my Lord of Buckingham within ten years past, as appeareth by the several Grants vouched in the Schedule annexed; and it was in it self a grievance, that in a time of such necessity, when the King's Revenues are not able to support such a great charge, that so much Land should be conveyed to a private man: this he acknowledged was not the Duke's case alone, for others had received divers Grants from the King, but none in so great measure.

And because the Commons aim not at judgment only, but at Reformation, he wished, that when the King should bestow any Land for support of Honours, that the caution which was wont to be carefully observed might again return into use; that is, to annex those Lands to the Dignity, lest being obtained and wasted, the Party repair to the King for a new support; by which provision the Crown will reap this benefit, that as some Lands go out of new Grants, others will come in by spent Intails.

He said he would not trouble their Lordships with repetition of the Laws heretofore made for preventing the alienation of the King's Lands, and for resuming those that had been alienated, nor of the Ordinances made in this high Court for the same purpose, and Fines set upon those that presumed to break such Ordinances; he only added, as a further enforcement of the Grievance, that when the King's Revenues be unable to defray publick necessities, the Commons must needs be more burthened with Supplies.

2. His second Point was, the unusual Clauses which the Duke by his greatness hath procured to be inserted into the Warrants for passing of those Lands, of which two were mentioned; the first, That the casual profits should not be rated in the particulars; the second, That all Bailiffs Fees should be reprimed: Both which are to be proved by the Warrants remaining with the Auditors of the Rates, and other Auditors; whereupon he presented these Considerations.

First, That it was a mark of Ingratitude and Infatiableness in the Duke, thus to strain the King's Bounty beyond his intention; and that he would not receive this Bounty by the ordinary way, but by the way of practice.

Secondly, It argued Unfaithfulness in him, that being a sworn Counsellor, he should put the King into such Courses of so much prejudice, deceitfully, in concealing the value of that which he bought; so that the King gave he knew not what; For under the proportion of Two thousand pounds, he gives it may be Four thousand pounds. And by this the King did not only sustain great loss for the present, but it opened a way of continual loss, which hath ever since been pursued by all those who have passed Lands from the Crown.

Thirdly, The King is hereby not left Master of his own Liberality, neither in proportion nor certainty; for it might so fall out, that the Quantity passed from him, might be treble to that he intended.

3. The third was, The Surrender of divers parcels of these Lands back to the King, after he had held them some years, and taking others from the King in exchange. Where he noted,

That the best of the Lands and most vendible being passed away, the worst lay upon the King's hand; that if he should have occasion to raise Money by sale of Lands, that course is not like to furnish him. Besides, that in the meantime betwixt the Grants and the Surrenders, opportunity was left to the Duke to cut down Woods, to enfranchise Copyholds, to make long Leases, and yet the old Rent remaining still, the Land may be surrendered at the same value. Whether this have been practised, he could not affirm, not having had time to examine it; yet he desired the Lords to enquire after it, the rather for that the Mannor of G. in Lincolnshire being dismembered, and Seventeen pounds of the old Rents sold out of it, was by a Surrender turned back upon his Majesty.

4. The fourth point of this Branch was, The colourable Tallies divers parcels of these Lands had from the Crown in lieu of this surrender, being sold and contracted for by his own Agent, and the Money received by himself or to his use, and yet Tallies were stricken out, as if it had really come to the Exchequer for his Majesties service. This is to be proved by his own Officers, by the Officers of the Exchequer, and by the Tallies themselves, which Tallies amount unto 20563 l. 16 s. 8 d. Whence he observed,

First, That there ran a trade of Falshood toward the King throughout all this his dealing.

Secondly, That this was a Device thought upon to prevent the wisdom of Parliament; for by this means the Grant seems to have the face of valuable purchases, whereas they were indeed free Gifts.

Thirdly, If the Title of those Lands should prove questionable, it appearing by Record, as if the King had received the Money, he was bound in honour to make restitution, and yet the Duke had the profit.

But it may be said, This was the Purchasers desire for their own security. Of which Objection he made this use, That the Subjects generally took notice of so much Lands given to the Duke, that there is good cause to expect a Resumption.

In the second general branch of this Article concerning Money, the first point observed was, the total sum received by him in ten years space, amounting to 162995 l. besides the Grant he hath of the Overplus above Three thousand pounds per Annum to be made of the Third imposed upon Strangers Goods, and besides the Moiety of Seven thousand pounds out of the Customs of Ireland, which he is bound to pay to the King; but whether it hath been paid, or no, is doubtful.

This he delivered as a Sum Estimative, yet so computed as it may be more, but not less. And this total ariseth by free Gifts or Pensions to himself, else by profit of Farms, by Pensions to others; for Offices, whereof he received the profit, as the Admiralty, and Mastership of the Horse. All which appear by a Schedule annexed to his Charge.

The Grievances consist in this; That the Commonwealth hath been bereaved of the use and employment of so publick Treasure in a time of as great want, and great occasions in this State, as it hath had in many Ages, when the expences of the King's Court can hardly be supplied, when his Houses and Castles were unfurnished, when the Seas have been unguarded, the Coast subject to the incursion and spoil of Enemies by default of Provision in the Navy, to the dishonour dis honour of the Nation, and damage of the Subjects, and hazard of the whole. And the offence is this, that the wants in the Navy and the Stores being within his own Charge, he was no more sensible of them; whereby it appears, he preferred the serving of his own turn before his duty and before the safety of this State.

The second point observed in this branch, was, That the Duke under pretence of secret services, had procured great sums of Money to be issued by Privy-seals to sundry persons named by himself, but afterward employed to his own use. Hereof two instances are propounded: the one of eight thousand pounds paid to Sir Robert Pye, 12 Aug. 1610. and by him disbursed for the Duke's purchase of Burleigh; and Sir Robert Pye discharged by another Privy-seal, 4 Junij following. The second instance is of Sixty thousand pounds paid to Burleigh by a Privy-seal, in September 1625. Which time he rather noted, because the Parliament at Oxford was broken up a little before out of discontent that the King was not supplied for the setting out of the Fleet, which would have been done with a less sum. For the proof of that the House of Commons will offer to your Lordships Witnesses.

The quality of this offence he left to their Lordships judgment; yet propounding some things by way of enquiry, from whence it might receive measure and proportion. 1. Whether it had not affinity with the Crime in the Civil Law, called Crimen peculatus; which was when a man did unjustly turn to his own use that Money which was either sacra, dedicated to God's service religiously; or Religiosa, used about Funerals and Monuments of the dead; or Publica, of which kind the matter now in question is. And this offence by that Law was Death and Confiscation of Goods and Estate. Which he notes the rather, that their Lordships might perceive, that in the wisest State the Publick Treasure was held in the same reputation with that which was dedicated to God and Religion. 2. And whether it doth not resemble another Crime in the same Law termed Crimen falsi, and is defined to be when a man shall imitatione veri suum compendium alieno dispendio per dolum facere, by semblance of truth make gain to himself of other mens losses: Which in the case of a Bondman was death, and in case of another man Banishment and Confiscation, or otherwise very penal, as the Judges should find cause of moderation, or rigour, in the nature and circumstances of the Fact. 3. Whether their Lordships will estimate it according to any Sentences in the Star-Chamber, which have been very frequent in cases of Fraud, or according to the Common-Law, which so much detests this kind of dealing, as that they term it Covins, and make it vitiate ordinary and lawfull actions. Or lastly, Whether they will Measure it by that Judgment which the Duke hath pass'd against himself in the guilt of his own Conscience? (Direct Actions are not afraid to appear open-faced; but Injustice and Fraud desire to be masked with subtilty and closeness.) It were offence enough, if there were no more but a cunning concealing of unthankfulness to hide his Majesties bounty; or guilt of unworthiness, as if he durst not avow the receipt of that which he hath not merited; both which proceed from Malum culpa, or else that other kind of guilt which proceeds from Malum poena, the fear of punishment, fore-seeing this Inquisition into his actions, and hoping, under this disguise of Publick service, to escape their Lordships censure.

The third Point in this branch is, That he hath received sundry sums of Money intended for the maintenance of the Navy: whereof there are two instances: the one whereof is 20000 l. the other of 30000 l. both in January 1624. By Privy-seal, by the which these sums are issued, they appear to be Free gifts: But by the affirmation of some in answer for the Duke, it hath been said, He was only the hand to convey them to the Treasury of the Navy. If the truth be according to the Privy-seal, they are to be added to the former Total as parcel of his own gain: If according to that allegation, it may prove a President of greater damage to the King, than the Money is worth; for by this way his Majesty hath no means by matter of Record to charge the Treasurer of the Navy with these sums, and may lose the benefit of the Act of Parliament 13 Eliz. whereby Accomptants Lands are made liable to the payment of their Debts to the King, and in many cases may be sold for his Majesties satisfaction. The Treasurer of the Navy is a worthy man, but if he should die, the King loseth the benefit.

The fourth Point of this branch is, That he hath caused so great a mixture and confusion between the King's Estate and his own, that they cannot be distinguished by the Records and Entries which ought to be kept for the safety of his Majesties Treasure, and indemnity of the Subject. This is proved in divers instances, whereof the last alledged is one, and others follow.

By the wisdom of the Law in the constitution of the Exchequer, there be three Guards set up on the King's Treasure and Accompts. The first is a legal Impignoration, whereby the Estates personal and real of the Accomptants are made liable to be sold for the discharge of their Debts, which I mentioned before. The second an apt Controllment over every Office; by which the King relies not upon the industry and honesty of any one man; but if he fail in either, it may be discovered by some other sworn to take notice of it, and either to correct his Errors, or amend his Faults. The third is; a durable Evidence and Certainty, not for the present time only, but for perpetuity because the King can neither receive, or pay, but by Record.

All these Guards have been broken by the Duke, both in the Cases next before recited, and in these which follow. The custom of the Exchequer is the Law of the Kingdom, for so much as concerneth the King's Revenue. Every breach of a Law by a particular offence, is punishable; but such an offence as this, being destructive of the Law it self, is of a far higher nature.

The fifth Point of this second branch, is concerning two Privy-seals of Release; the one 16, the other 20 Jac. whereby this Duke is discharged of divers sums secretly received to his Majesties use, but by virtue of these Releases to be converted to the support of his own Estate. The proof hereof is referred to the Privy-seals themselves. From which he made one observation, of the subtilty he used to wind him-

Anno 1626. 'himself into the possession of the King's Money, and to get that by cunning steps and degrees, which peradventure he could not have obtained at once. A good Master will trust a Servant with a greater sum that is out of his Purse, than he would bestow upon him being in his Purse; and yet after it is out of his hands, may be drawn more easily to make a Release, than at first to have made a Free gift. This is a proper instance to be added to the proof of the point of mingling his own Estate with the King's; and of the same kind be other particulars mentioned in the Schedule, though not expressed in the Charge; as twenty thousand pounds received in Composition for the Earl of M. his Fine, which cannot be discovered whether part or all be converted to the Dukes benefit, and yet it appears by a Private-Seal to be clearly intended to the King's own service for the Household and Wardrobe, till by the Duke's practice it was diverted into this close and by-way.

'Another instance in this, is, His endeavour to get the Money which should be made of Prize-goods into his own hands; and for this purpose, he first laboured to procure that his man Gabriel Marsh might receive it; and when it was thought fit some partner should be joyned with him, trial was made of divers, but none of any credit would undertake the charge with such a Consort: And the Commons have reason to think there was good cause of this refusal; for he is so ill an Accomptant, that he confessed in their House (being examined) that by authority from the Duke he received divers bags of Gold and Silver out of the St. Peter of Newhaven, which he never told.

'When this practice of employing his own man would take no effect, then he procured a Commission from Sir William Russell, who is indeed without exception an able and worthy Officer; but that is not enough for the King's security; For however he was to receive the Money, it was to be disbursed by and to the Duke's warrant and profit. Which Clause hath been altered since this was questioned in Parliament; and now it is to be issued from an immediate Warrant from his Majesty: But as it was before, it may be noted as an incroachment upon the Office of my Lord Treasurer, whereby he might make a more easie way to some sinister end of his own; so that upon the matter, Sir William was but a safeguard of the Money for the Duke himself. And this I must note of some guilt in the very act of it.

'The last point upon this whole Charge, was a reduction of the value of the Land, together with the Money into one total, and to that purpose he rated the Land, being valued at a reasonable value, at forty years purchase; for although some of it was sold for thirty, yet a great part was worth more than a hundred years purchase, so as forty years is conceived to be an easie Medium; at this rate, 3035*l.* amounteth to 121400*l.* which being added to the total of the Money received, 162995*l.* both together make the sum of 284395*l.* besides the Forest of Leyfield, and besides the profit made out of the thirds of Strangers Goods, and the Moiety of the profit made out of the Customs of Ireland.

'This is a great sum in it self, but much greater by many Circumstances; if we look upon the time past, never so much came into any private man's hands out of the publick Purse; if we respect the time present, the King never had so much want; never so many Foreign occasions, important and expensive; the Subjects have never given greater supplies, and yet those supplies unable to furnish these expences. But as the Circumstances make the sum greater, so there be other Circumstances which make it less, if it be compared with the inestimable gain he hath made by the sale of Honours and Offices, and by projects hurtful to the State, both of England and Ireland; or if it be compared to his profusion, it will appear but a little sum. All these gifts and other waies of profit notwithstanding, he confessed before both Houses of Parliament, that he was indebted 100000*l.* If this be true, how can we hope to satisfy his prodigality? if false, how can we hope to satisfy his covetousness? and therefore their Lordships need not wonder, if the Commons desire, and that earnestly, to be delivered from such a Grievance.

'That this complaint and proceedings of theirs may appear to be suitable to the proceedings of their Predecessors in like cases; he alledged three Presidents, which he said were Presidents in kind, but not in proportion, because there hath never been the like.

'The first, 10 Rich. 2. in the complaint against Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk; out of which he took three Articles: The first, That being Chancellor, and sworn to the King's profit, he had purchased divers Lands from the King, more than he had deserved, and at an under rate; yet this was thought to be an offence against the State.

'The second, That he had bought of one Tydeman an Annuity of five hundred pounds per annum; which Grant was void by the Laws, yet he being Chancellor, procured the King to make it good by a new Grant, upon surrender of the old. This was complained of in Parliament, and there punished.

'The third, Whereas the Master of St. Anthony's, being a Schismatick, had forfeited his Possessions into the King's hand; this Earl took them in Farm at twenty Marks a year, converting the over-plus, which was one thousand Marks, to his own profit, which would have come to the King.

'The next President, 11 Rich. 2. in the Judgment against Robert de Vere of Oxford, and others; out of which he took two Articles, the Fifth and Seventh: The Fifth was for taking Mannors and Lands annexed to the Crown, whereby they themselves were enriched, and the King made poor. The Seventh was for intercepting the Subsidies granted for the defence of the Kingdom.

'The third President is that of 18 Hen. 6. in the Parliament-Roll, out of the complaint against William de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, Article 29. That he being next and primest of Council to the King, he had procured him to grant great Possessions to divers persons, whereby the King was much impoverished, the expence of his House unpaid, Wages, Wardrobe, Castles, Navy, Debts, unsatisfied; and so by his subtil Council, and unprofitable Labour, the Revenues of the Crown, and the Dutchy of Lancaster, and other the King's Inheritances, so much diminished, and the Commons of the Kingdom so extremely charged, that it was near to a final destruction.

'The

Anno 1626. The Fourth was, That the King's Treasure was mischievously distributed to himself, his Friends and well-willers; so that for lack of Monies, no Army, nor Ordnance, could be provided in time; and because these great Persons were not brought to judgment upon these Articles alone, but for other misdemeanors, he made this observation, That ravening upon the King's Estate, is alwaies accounted with other great faults that deserve judgment.

Then he said, he had done with that which had been left to him; and so he left the Duke to their Lordships Justice, That as he had exceeded others in this offence, so he might not come behind them in punishment. And so he humbly desired their Lordships to be pleased to pardon his Delivery, and to give a favourable censure of him.

Lastly, The Thirteenth Article was read.

XIII. Whereas special care and order hath been taken by the Laws of the Realm, to restrain and prevent the unskilful Administration of Physick, whereby the health and life of Men may be much endangered. And whereas most especially, the Royal Persons of the Kings of the Realm, in whom, we their Loyal Subjects humbly challenge a great interest, are, and alwaies have been esteemed by us so sacred, that nothing ought to be prepared for them, or administered unto them in the way of Physick or Dyet, in the times of their sickness, without the consent and direction of some of their sworn Physicians, Apothecaries, or Chirurgeons. And the boldness of such (how near soever to them in place and favour) who have forgotten their duties so far, as to presume to offer any thing unto them beyond their experience, hath been alwaies ranked in the number of high Offences and Misdemeanors. And whereas the sworn Physicians of our late Sovereign Lord King James, of blessed memory, attending on his Majesty in the Month of March, in the two and twentieth year of his most glorious Reign, in the times of his sickness, being an Ague, did, in due and necessary care of, and for the recovery of his health, and preservation of his Person, upon, and after several mature Consultations in that behalf had and holden, at several times in the same Month, resolve and give directions, That nothing should be apply'd or given unto his Highness, by way of Physick or Dyet, during his said sickness, but by, and upon, their general advice and consents, and after good deliberation thereof first had: more especially by their like care, and upon like consultations, did justly resolve, and publicly give warning to, and for all the Gentlemen, and other Servants, and Officers of his said late Majesties Bed-Chamber, That no Meat or Drink whatsoever should be given unto him, within two or three hours next before the usual time of, and for the coming of his Fit in the said Ague, nor during the continuance thereof, nor afterwards, until his cold Fit were past. The said Duke of Buckingham, being a sworn Servant of his said late Majesty, of and in his Majesties said Bed-Chamber, contrary to his duty, and the tender respect which he ought to have had of his Majesties most Sacred Person; and after the Consultations, Resolutions, Directions, and Warning aforesaid, did nevertheless, without any sufficient warrant in that behalf, unduly cause and procure certain Plaisters, and a certain Drink or Potion to be provided for the use of his said Majesty, without the direction or privity of his said late Majesties Physicians, not prepared by any of his Majesties sworn Apothecaries or Chirurgeons, but compounded of several Ingredients to them unknown. Notwithstanding the same Plaisters, or some Plaister like thereunto, having been formerly administered unto his said Majesty, did produce such ill effects, as that some of the said sworn Physicians did altogether disallow thereof, and utterly refused to meddle any further with his said Majesty, until these Plaisters were removed, as being hurtful and prejudicial to the health of his Majesty; yet nevertheless the same Plaisters, as also a Drink or Potion, was provided by him the said Duke; which he the said Duke, by colour of some insufficient and slight pretences, did upon Monday, the one and twentieth day of March, in the two and twentieth year aforesaid, when his Majesty, by the judgment of his said Physicians, was in the declination of his disease, cause and procure the said Plaisters to be applied to the Breast and Wrists of his said late Majesty. And then also at, and in his Majesties Fit of the said Ague, the said Monday, and at several times within two hours before the coming of the said Fit, and before his Majesties then cold Fit was passed, did deliver, and cause to be delivered, several quantities of the said Drink or Potion to his said late Majesty; who thereupon at the same times, within the seasons in that behalf prohibited by his Majesties Physicians, as aforesaid, did, by the means and procurement of the said Duke, drink, and take divers quantities of the said Drink or Potion.

After which said Plaisters, and Drink or Potion, applied and given unto, and taken and received by his said Majesty, as aforesaid, great distempers, and divers ill symptoms appeared upon his said Majesty; insomuch, that the said Physicians finding his Majesty the next morning much worse in the estate of his health, and holding a Consultation thereabout, did, by joyned consent, send to the said Duke, praying him not to adventure to minister to his Majesty any more Physick, without their allowance and approbation. And his said Majesty himself finding himself much distressed and affected with pain and sickness, after his then Fit, when by the course of his Disease he expected intermission and ease, did attribute the cause of such his trouble unto the said Plaister and Drink, which the said Duke had so given, and caused to be administered unto him. Which said adventurous act, by a Person obliged in duty and thankfulness, done to the Person of so great a King, after so ill success of the like formerly administered, contrary to such Directions as aforesaid, & accompanied with so unhappy event, to the great grief and discomfort of all his Majesties Subjects in general, as an offence and misdemeanor of so high a nature, as may justly be called, and is, by the said Commons, deemed to be an act of transcendent presumption, and of dangerous consequence.

Mr. Wandesford deputed to enlarge and aggravate upon the Thirteenth Article, commended the charity and providence of that Law, which makes it penal for unskilful Empyricks, and all others to exercise and Practise Physick upon common persons, without a lawful Calling and Approbation, branding them that thus transgress as Improbos, Ambitiosos, Temerarios, & Audaces homines: But he that without skill and calling shall direct a Medicine, which upon the same person had wrought bad effects, enough to have dissuaded a second adventure; and then when Physicians were present, Physicians selected for Learning and Art, prepared by their Office and Oaths, without their consent, nay, even contrary to their Direction, and in a time unseasonable; he must needs (said he) be guilty, albeit towards a common person, of a precipitate and unadvised rashness, much more towards his own Sovereign. And so pious are our selves to put the Subjects in mind of their duty towards their Princes, Persons so Sacred, that in the attempt of a Mad-man upon the King, his want of Reason, which towards any of his fellow Subjects might have quit him of Felony, shall not excuse him of Treason. And how wary and advised our Ancestors have been not to apply things in this kind to the Person of a King, may appear by a President, 32 Hen. 6. where John Arundel, and others the King's Physicians and Chyrurgeons, thought it not safe for them to administer any thing to the King's Person, without the assent of the Privy Council first obtained, and express Licence under the Great Seal of England.

This Medicine found his Majesty in the declination of his disease, (and we all wish it had left him so) but his better daies were shortly turned into worse; and instead of health and recovery, we hear, by good testimony (that which troubles the poor and Loyal Commons of England) of great distempers, as Droughts, Raving, Fainting, an intermitting Pulse, strange effects to follow upon the applying of a Treacle Plaister. But the truth is, Testimony tells us, that this Plaister had a strange smell, and an invective quality, striking the malignity of the disease inward; which Nature otherwise might have expelled outward. Add to this the Drink, twice given to his Majesty, by the Duke his own hands, and a third time refused, and the following complaint of that blessed Prince, the Physicians telling him, to please him for the time, That his second impairment was from cold taken, or some other ordinary cause: No, no, said his Majesty, it is that which I had from Buckingham. And though there be no President (said he) of an act offered to the Person of a King, so insolent as this; yet it is true, that divers persons as great as this, have been questioned and condemned for less offences against the Person of their Sovereign; It was an Article amongst others laid against the Duke of Somerset, for carrying Edward the Sixth away in the night time, out of his own head, but from Hampton-Court to Windso; and yet he was trusted with the Protection of his Person. Presidents failing us in this point, the Common Law will supply us. The Law judgeth a Deed done in the execution of an unlawful act, Man-slaughter, which otherwise would but have been Chance-medly; and that this act was unlawful, the House of Commons do believe, as belonging to the Duty and Vocation of a sworn and experimented Physician, and not the unskilfulness of a young Lord. And so precious are the lives of men in the eye of the Law, that though Mr. Stanford saith, If a Physician take one into his Cure, and he die under his hands; it is not Felony, because he did it not feloniously; yet it is Mr. Bracton's opinion, That if one that is no Physician or Chyrurgeon undertake a Cure, and the Party die under his hands, this is Felony. And the Law goeth further, making Physicians and Chirurgeons themselves accountable for the death of their Patients, if it appear they have transgressed the Rules of their own Art; that is, by undertaking a thing wherein they have no experience, or having yet failed in their care and diligence.

Lastly, he said, He was commanded by the House of Commons to desire their Lordships, that seeing the Duke hath made himself a President in committing that which former Ages knew not, their Lordships will, out of their Wisdom and Justice, make him an example for the time to come.

The several Articles being thus enlarged and aggravated by the said respective Members, Sir John Elliot was appointed to make the Epilogue to the Impeachment, who spake thus.

My Lords,

Y Our Lordships have heard, in the Labours of these two daies spent in this service, a representation from the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses of the Commons House of Parliament, of their apprehension of the present evils and dangers of this Kingdom, of the Causes of the same; and of the application of them to the Duke of Buckingham, so clearly and fully, as I presume your Lordships expect I should rather conclude, than add any thing to his charge.

Your Lordships have heard how his Ambition was expressed in procuring and getting into his hands the greatest Offices of Strength and Power of this Kingdom; by what means he had attained them, and how Money stood for Merit.

There needs no Argument to prove this, but the common sense of the miseries and misfortunes which we suffer; adding but one, the Regality of our Narrow Seas, the antient Inheritance of our Princes, lost or impeached.

This I need not further to press, but from hence my Observation must descend to his other Virtues, and that by way of Perspective: I shall give it so near and short, as rather to exercise your Lordships memory, than to oppress your patience.

First, I propose unto your Lordships, the inward Character of the Duke's mind, which is full of collusion and deceit; I can express it no better than by the Beast, called by the Antients Srellionatus; a Beast so blurr'd, so spotted, so full of foul lines, that they knew not what to make of it: so do we find in this man's practise, who first inveigled the Merchants, drawing them to Die to be intralled; then dealt deceitfully with the King to colour his offences, his design being against Rochel and the Religion: Next with the Parliament, to disguise his actions; a practise no less dangerous and disadvantageous to us, than prejudicial to our Friends and Allies.

Next, I present to your Lordships, the Duke's high oppression, and that of strange latitude and extent, not to men alone, but to Laws, and Statutes, to Acts of Council, to Pleas and Decrees of Court, to the pleasure of his Majesty, all must stoop to him, if they oppose or stand in his way. This hath been expressed unto you in the Ship called the St. Peter, and those of Die; nay, he calls on the colour of his Majesties great Name to shadow his design.

It had been his duty, nay, the rest of the place, not to have translated them into the hand of Strangers; that had his Majesty yielded in that point, the Duke should have opposed it by his con-

‘ continual Prayers and Intercessions, making ‘ known unto his Majesty the Inconveniences like‘ ly to ensue, and not to rest there, but to have re‘ ported it to your Lordships sitting in Council,
‘ to have desired and prayed your aid and assistance,
‘ in a matter of so great importance: And if this ‘ had failed, he should have entered into a Protestati‘ on against it. This hath been done by worthy ‘ Predecessors in that Office, and this hath been the ‘ worthy discharge of the great Trust reposed in ‘ his Place.

‘ I heard the Ships were returned, but I know
‘ it not; but if I knew so, this neither excuseth, ‘ nor qualifyeth the Duke’s offence. The French ‘ in this case are to be commended, not he excused;
‘ he left them in the hands of a Foreign Power, ‘ who when they once had them, for any thing he ‘ knew, might easily have kept them.

‘ The third Head is, The Duke’s Extortion, in ‘ exacting from the East-India Company, without ‘ Right or colour, Ten thousand pounds, exquisi‘ tely expressed, and Mathematically observed ‘ by the Gentleman (you know by whom em‘ ployed) who, by his Marine experience, learn‘ ed this Observation, That if the Fleet gained ‘ not the Wind by such time at the Cape, the Voy‘ age was lost.

Here one of the Lords interposing privately,
It was the King that employed him; Sir John Eliot, in the name of the Commons, makes this Protestation.

‘ Far be it from them to lay an Odium or Asper‘ sion on his Majesties Name; they hold his Ho‘ nour spotless, nor the least shadow of blemish ‘ can fix upon him in this business.

‘ Next to the foul Extortion, is Bribery and ‘ Corruption in the sale of Honour and Offices of ‘ Command. That which was wont to be the ‘ Crown of Virtue and Merit, is now become a ‘ Merchandise for the greatness of this man, and ‘ Justice it self made a prey unto him. All ‘ which particulars your Lordships have heard ‘ opened, and enforced with Reasons and Proofs,
‘ what in themselves they are; and therefore I spare
‘ further to press them.

‘ In the fifth place, I observe a wonder in Policy
‘ and in Nature, how this man, so notorious in ‘ evil, so dangerous to the State in his immense ‘ greatness, is able to subsist of himself, and keep ‘ a Being: To this I answer, That the Duke hath ‘ used the help of Art to drop him up: It was ‘ apparent, that by his skill he hath raised a Party ‘ in the Court, a Party in the Country, and a ‘ main Party in the chief Places of Government ‘ in the Kingdom: so that all the most deserving ‘ Offices that require Abilities to discharge them,
‘ are fixed upon the Duke, his Allies and Kin‘ dred. And thus he hath drawn to him and his,
‘ the power of Justice, the Power of Honour,
‘ and the Power of Command, and, in effect,
‘ the whole Power of the Kingdom, both for ‘ Peace and War, to strengthen his Allies; and ‘ in setting up himself, hath set upon the King‘ doms Revenues, the Fountain of Supply, and ‘ the Nerves of the Land.

‘ He intercepts, consumes, and exhausts the ‘ Revenues of the Crown, not only to satisfy his ‘ own lustful desires, but the luxury of others;
‘ and by emptying the Veins, the Blood should ‘ run in, he hath cast the Body of the Kingdom
‘ into an high Consumption.

‘ Infinite sums of Money, and Mass of Land, ‘ exceeding the value of Money, Contributions in ‘ Parliament have been heaped upon him, and ‘ how have they been employed? Upon costly ‘ Furniture, sumptuous Feasting, and magnificent ‘ Building, the visible evidences of the express ‘ exhausting of the State; and yet his Ambition, ‘ which is boundless, resteth not here, but, like ‘ a violent flame, bursteth forth, and getteth fur‘ ther scope: Not satisfied with injuries, and in‘ justice, and dishonouring of Religion, his at‘ tempts go higher, to the prejudice of his Sove‘ reign, which is plain in his practise. The ef‘ fects I fear to speak, and fear to think. I end
‘ this passage, as Cicero did in a like case, Ne gra-‘ vioribus uar verbis quam rei natura fert, aut levis-‘ ribus quam cause necessitas postulat.

‘ Your Lordships have an Idea of the Man,
‘ what he is in himself, what in his affections.
‘ You have seen his power, and some, I fear, have ‘ felt it; you have known his practice, and have ‘ heard the effects. It rests then to be considered, ‘ what (being such) he is in reference to the ‘ King and State; how compatible or incompati‘ ble with either. In reference to the King, he ‘ must be stiled the Canker in his Treasure; in re‘ ference to the State, the Moth of all Goodness.
‘ What future hopes are to be expected, your ‘ Lordships may draw out of his Actions and Af‘ fections; I will now see, by comparison with ‘ others, to what we may find him likened, I can ‘ hardly find him a Match or Parallel in all Presi‘ dents; none so like him as Sejanus, who is thus ‘ described by Tacitus, Audax, sui obsequens, in ali‘ os criminator, juxta adulator & superbus.

‘ To say nothing of his Veneries, if you please ‘ to compare them; you shall easily discern where‘ in they vary; such boldness of the one hath late‘ ly been presented before you, as very seldom or ‘ never hath been seen. For his secret intentions ‘ and Calumniation, I wish this Parliament had ‘ not felt them, nor the other before. For his ‘ Pride and Flattery, it is noted of Sejanus, that ‘ he did Cientes suos Provinciis adornare. Doth ‘ not this man the like? Ask England, Scotland,
‘ and Ireland, and they will tell you. Sejanus’s ‘ pride was so excessive, as Tacitus saith, He neg‘ lected all Council, mixed his business and service ‘ with the Prince, seeming to confound their acti‘ ons, and was often stiled Imperatoris laborum soci‘ us. How lately and how often hath this man ‘ commixed his Actions in Discourses with Acti‘ ons of the Kings?

‘ My Lords, I have done, you see the man; on‘ ly this which was conceived by the Knights, Ci‘ tizens, and Burgesses, should be boldly by me
‘ spoken, That by him came all these evils, in him
‘ we find the Cause, and on him we expect the Re‘ medies, and to this we met your Lordships in ‘ Conference; to which, as your Wisdom invites ‘ us, so we cannot doubt, but in your Lordships ‘ Wisdom, Greatness, and Power, we shall, in ‘ due time, find Judgment as he deserves.

‘ I conclude, by presenting to your Lordships
‘ the particular Censure of the Bishop of Ely, ‘ reported in the 11 Rich. 1. and to give you a ‘ short view of his faults. He was first of all ‘ noted to be luxurious; Secondly, He married ‘ his own Kindred to Personages of highest rank
‘ and place; Thirdly, no mans business was done ‘ without his help; Fourthly, he would not suf‘ fer the King’s Council to advise in matters
‘ of State; Fifthly, he grew to such a height
‘ of

of Pride, that no man was thought worthy to speak unto him; and lastly, His Castles and Forts of Trust, he did obscuris & ignotis hominibus tradere. His doom was this, Per totam insulam publice proclamatur, pereat qui perdere cuncta festinat, opprimatur ne omnes opprimat.

Sir John Elliot and Sir Dudley Digges committed to the Tower. Sir Dudley Digges who made the Prologue, and Sir John Elliot the Epilogue, in this Impeachment of the Duke, they were both by the King's command committed to the Tower. Upon the Impeachment of the Duke, a Paper was said to be privately conveyed to the King, to this effect.

Private Suggestions to the King, in behalf of the Duke. That this great opposition against the Duke, was stirred up and maintained by such as seek the destruction of this free Monarchy. Because they find it not yet ripe to attempt against the King himself, they endeavour it through the sides of the Duke. The persons agreeing in this one mischief, are of divers sorts and humours. First, Medling and busie persons, who love popular speeches: Secondly, Covetous Landlords, Inclosers, Depopulators, &c. who being of the Parliament, ease themselves in Subsidies, and lay it on the true Commons, and cry out, the Grievances are caused by the Duke. Thirdly, Recusants, who hate the Duke for the breach of the Spanish Match. Fourthly, Persons indebted, who, by Priviledge of Parliament, avoid payment. Fifthly, Puritans and Sectaries, though two of them scarcely agree in what they would have: Haters of Government, and would have the King's power extinguished in matters Ecclesiastical, and limited in Civil. Sixthly, Malecontents, who look upon the Duke with an evil eye, because themselves are not preferred. Seventhly, Lawyers, who are very fit in Parliaments to second any Complaint against both Church and King, and all his Servants, with their Customs, Antiquities, Records, Statutes, Presidents, and Stories. Eighthly, Merchants and Citizens, who deceive the King of Custom. Ninthly, Innovators, Plebicolæ.

That since the time of Henry the Sixth, these Parliamentary discouragements might never be suffered, as being but certain symptoms of subsequent Rebellions, Civil Wars, and the dethroning our King, and no one Patriot daring to oppose them, lest he incur the reputation of a Fool or Coward in his Countries Cause.

His Majesty therefore strengthened himself ever with some Favourite, as whom he might better trust, than many of the Nobility, tainted with this desire of Oligarchy.

It behoveth, without doubt, his Majesty to uphold the Duke against them, who, if he be decourted, it will be the Corner-stone, on which the demolishing of his Monarchy will be builded: For if they prevail with this, they have hatched a thousand other demands to pull the Feathers of Royalty.

They will appoint him Counsellors, Servants, Alliances, Limits of Expences, and Account of his Revenues; chiefly if they can, they will now dazzle him in the beginning of his Reign.

Lastly, King James and King Charles are the Dukes Accusers, in all the Aspersions that are laid upon him. King James, for the Money destined for the Wars in this time, spent in Treaties, &c. And his Majesty can testifie for the things done in his time. And all these, though actions of the King, are imputed to the Duke: Who if he suffer for obeying his Sovereign, the next attempt will be to call the King to account for any thing he undertakes, which doth not prosperously succeed, as all men would desire it.

If it please his Majesty to remove and set aside all these disadvantages, he shall find the Charge against the Duke very empty and of small moment: And if His Majesty and the Duke's Grace think it no impeachment to their Honours, all that the Parliament hath objected against the Duke, except two or three things that may receive an Answer, is pardoned at the King's Coronation, which benefit every poor Subject enjoyeth.

But whether any such Paper ever came to his Majesties hands may be much questioned, though the Historical Collector hath inserted it.

May 11. The King coming to the Parliament, spake to the House of Peers as followeth.

My Lords,

The cause, and only cause of my coming to you this day, is to express the sense I have of all your Honours; for he that toucheth any of you, toucheth me in a very great measure. I have thought fit to take order for the punishing some insolent Speeches lately spoken. I have been too remiss heretofore in punishing such speeches as concern my self; not that I was greedy of their Moneys, but that Buckingham, through his importunity would not suffer to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, and that he might come the forwarder to his Tryal. And to approve his innocency as touching the matters against him, I my self can be a Witnes to clear him in every one of them.

I speak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to shew the reason why I have not hitherto punished those insolent speeches against my self. And now I hope you will be as tender of my Honour, when time shall serve, as I have been sensible of yours.

After the delivery of that Speech His Majesty was pleased to depart.

At the same time the following Message was brought from the Commons to the Lords by Sir Nathaniel Rich.

The Commons taking into serious consideration the main mischiefs and inconveniences which this renowned Kingdom doth now suffer, threatening apparent danger to the King and Common-wealth, have by search and disquisition into the Causes thereof, found that they do principally flow from the exorbitant power and abusive carriage of the Duke of Buckingham, whereof he hath this Parliament been impeached before their Lordships by the Commons, besides an accusation of a Per in their own House, who hath charged him (as they are informed) of High Treason: They therefore with one voice make an entire Declaration. That they hold it a thing of dangerous Consequence both for the present and future times, that a man of so great eminence, power and authority, being impeached and accused of such high Crimes and Offences, should yet enjoy his Liberty, hold so great a part of the strength of the Kingdom in his hands, sit as a Per in Parliament, and be acquainted with the Councils thereof, whereby inevitable mischief may suddenly fall upon the Kingdom. Wherefore they have thought it their Duty to recommend this their unanimous desire to Anno 1626. to their Lordships, as agreeable to Law and reason, That they would be pleased forthwith to commit the person of the said Duke to safe Custody.

The Duke's defence in the Lords House.

My Lords,

The Duke's
Speech against the Commons.

' If I should hold my peace, it would argue guilt; If I should speak, it would argue boldness, being so foully accused. Your Lordships see what complaints are made against me by the House of Commons. How well I stood in their opinions not long since, your Lordships know it. What I have done since to lose their good opinions, I protest I know not. I cannot so distrust my own Innocency, and my heart which abhors guilt, as to decline any Course, or Court of Justice: And had they not brought My Cause to your Lordships, it should have been my own work; and they have done me a Favour to deliver me out of their hands into your Lordships.

' I will not speak any thing to cast dirt at those, who had taken pains to make me so foul; but to protest my innocency in that measure, which I shall ever hope to prove, it being before such just Judges, I desire my Tryal may be hastned, That I may no longer suffer than I most needs. And now that my Accuser hath not been content only to make my Process, but to prescribe to your Lordships the manner of your Judgment, and to Judge me before I am heard, I shall not give way to any of their unjust demands, &c.

The Commons discontented at the imprisonment of their Members.

The Commons upon the Imprisonment of their Members, and the offence taken by the King at the words spoken by those two Gentlemen in impeaching the Duke, resolved to proceed in no other business till they were righted in their pretended Libertie, and ordered that the House be turned into a grand Committee presently, to sit and consider of the best way and means to effect the same, and that no Member be suffered to go forth. At which time Sir Dudley Charlton observing that unusual, and as he then termed it, fullen silence of the House, spake as followeth.

Sir Dudley
Charlton's
Speech.

' I Find (by a great silence in this House) that it is a fit time to be heard, if you please to give me the patience. I may very fitly compare the heaviness of this House unto some of my misfortunes by Sea in my Travels: for as we were bound to Merseilles, by over-sight of the Mariners we mistook our course, and by ill fortune met with a Sand; That was no sooner over-past, but we fell on another; and having escaped this likewise, we met with a third, and in that we stuck fast. All the Passengers being much dismayed by this disaster, as now we are here in this House for the loss of those two Members: At last an old experienced Mariner upon consultation affirmed, That the speediest way to come out from the Sands, was to know how we came there; So, well looking and beholding the Compass, he found by going in upon such a point we were brought into that straight; wherefore we must take a new point to rectifie and bring us out of danger.

' This House of Parliament may be compared to the Ship; the Sands to our Messages; and the Commitment, to the Sands that the Ship did stick fast in; and lastly the Compass, to the Table where the Book of Orders doth lie. Then I beseech you let us look into the Book where the Orders are, whether the Gentlemen did go no further than the Order did warrant them. If they did not, it is fit that we should defend them whom we employed in our behests: But if they have exceeded their Commission, and delivered that which they had not warrant for, it is just that we let them suffer for this presumption; and this our Course will bring us from these Rocks.

' I beseech you Gentlemen, move not his Majesty with trenching upon his Prerogatives, lest you bring him out of love with Parliaments. You have heard his Majesties often Messages to you, to put you, forward in a Course that will be most convenient. In those Messages he told you, That if there were not Correspondency between him and you, he should be forced to use new Counsels. Now I pray you consider what these new Counsels are, and may be, I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all Christian Kingdoms you know that Parliaments were in use antiently, by which their Kingdoms were governed in a most flourishing manner until the Monarchs began to know their own strength, and seeing the turbulent spirit of their Parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to stand upon their Prerogatives, and at last overthrew the Parliaments throughout Christendom, except here only with us.

' And indeed you would count it a great misery, if you knew the Subject in Foreign Countries as well as my self; to see them look not like our Nation, with store of flesh on their backs, but like so many Ghosts, and not Men, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing only wooden Shoes on their feet; so that they cannot eat Meat, or wear good Clothes, but they must pay and be taxed unto the King for it. This is a misery beyond expression, and that which yet we are free from: Let us be careful then to preserve the King's good opinion of Parliaments, which bringeth this happiness to this Nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between His Majesty and His Commons; lest we lose the repute of a Free-born Nation, by turbulency in Parliament. For in my opinion, the greatest and wisest part of a Parliament are those that use the greatest silence, so as it be not opiniatory, or fullen, as now we are by the loss of these our Members that are committed.

' This good Correspondency being kept between the King and his people, will so joyn their love and favour to his Majesty with liking of Parliaments, that his Prerogative shall be preserved entire to Himself, without our trenching upon it; and also the Priviledge of the Subject (which is our happiness) inviolated, and both be maintained to the support of each other. And I told you, if you would hear me patiently, I would tell you what exception his Majesty doth take at those Gentlemen that are committed. You know that 8 Members were chosen to deliver the Charge against the Duke, but there were only six employed for that purpose; inasmuch that there was no exception.

' As for Sir Dudley Diggs his part, that was the Prologue, and in that his Majesty doth conceive that he went too far beyond his Commission, in pressing the death of his ever blessed Father in these words, That he was commanded by the House, concerning the Plaster apply'd to the King, That he did forbear to speak further in regard of the King's Honour, or words to that effect; this his Majesty conceiveth to be to his

Anno 1626. dishonour, as if there had been any underhand dealing by his Majesty, in applying of the Plaister, and this may make his Subjects jealous of his doings: In this point his Majesty is assured, that the House did not warrant him. Now for that which is excepted against Sir John Elliot, his over bitterness in the Aggravation upon the whole Charge, and specially upon some of the heads of it: For if you please to remember, when I moved for putting of the St. Peter of Newhaven out of the Charge against the Duke of Buckingham, and shewed my reasons for that purpose, you know how tender Sir John Elliot was of it, as if he had been a Child of his own, and so careful in the handling thereof by a Stranger, that he would not suffer it to be touched, though with never so tender a hand, for fear it may prove a Changeling: which did manifest, how specious soever his pretences were, that he had oculum in cauda: And I must confess, I was heartily sorry when he delivered his Aggravation to the Lords, to see his Tartness against the Duke; when as he had occasion to name him, he only gave him the Title of This man, and The man; whereas the other observed more respect and modesty in their Charges against so great a Person as the Duke is, considering that then he was not convicted, but stood reus in Curia. Lastly, For pressing the death of his late Majesty, you know that the Sense of the House concluded, That it is only an Act of presumption; nay, some of them expressly said, Nay God forbid that I should lay the death of the King to his Charge. If he without warrant from the house insisted upon the Composition of the Plaister, as if there were Aliquid latet quod non patet; This was beyond his Commission from our house and this is that which his Majesty doth except against; And this I say, drew his Majesty, with other insolent Invectives, to use his Regal authority in committing them to the Tower.

Sir Dudley Diggs being charged for saying in the matter of applying the Plaister to his late Majesty, That he did forbear to speak further of that in regard of the King's honour, or words to that effect; There passed a Protestation of every man in particular for himself; by Order of the Commons House, and it was Ordered in the House, That they that were sick in the Town, should have three of the House sent to them to take this Protestation likewise.

The Commons Protestation touching words imputed to Sir Dudley Diggs.

I Protest before Almighty God and this House of Parliament, That I never gave consent that Sir Dudley Diggs should speak these words that he is now charged withal, or any words to that effect; And I have not affirmed to any that he did speak such words, or any to that effect.

Sir D. Diggs released out of Prison, protests he never spake the words charged on him.

Sir Dudley Diggs was presently after released, and himself also made the same Protestation, and that it was so far from his words that it never came into his thoughts, thanking the Commons for the respect the House had shown him; and signifying that he had received from his Majesty a gracious Testimony of his satisfaction also, that the Duke was not satisfied though 36 Lords, present at that Conference, protest they heard not the words.

These Lords were,

The Earl of Mulgrave.
Earl of Cleveland.
Earl of Westmerland.
Earl of Bullingbrook.
Earl of Clare.
Earl of Denbigh.
Earl of Cambridge.
Earl of Devon.
Earl of Warwick.
Earl of Northampton.
Earl of Bridgewater.
Earl of Montgomery.
Earl of Nottingham.
Earl of Lincoln.
Earl of Essex.
Earl of Hereford.
Earl of Kent.
Earl of Oxon.
Lord Grey of Warke.
Lord Noell.
Lord Montague.
Lord Russell.
Lord North.
Lord Cromwell.
Lord Vaux.
Lord Dudley.
Lord Morley.
Lord Piercy.
Lord Bishop of Sarum.
Lord Bishop of Landaffe.
Lord Bishop of Chester.
Lord Bishop of Cov. and Lich.
Lord Bishop of Worcester.
Lord Bishop of Norwich.
Lord Vicount Say and S.
Lord Vicount Rocheford.

Sir John Elliot being released from the Tower the Vice Chamberlain spake as followeth,

'That he intended not to charge him, but to give him an occasion to discharge himself. First, That all the others had used respective words in the Conference; but for the manner of his Speech, he conceived it was too tart and harsh to the Person of the Duke, and that in representing a Character of his mind, by comparing him with a strange Beast, he had out-gone his Commission. Secondly, That contrary to the sense of the House, as if they were ignorant of the return of the Ships out of France, he said, They say they are come, but I know it not; when the House knew it full well. That speaking of the Duke, he said, That man, which phrase in all Languages is accounted a great indignity to persons of Honour: That he made scandalous comparisons between the Duke and Sejanus, and the Bishop of Ely, which was likewise besides his Charge; That he brake off ambiguously and abruptly with a Sentence of Cicero, as if something else might be which was not yet discovered.

Sir J. Elliot is released out of the Tower.

Is charged by Sir Dudley Diggs for his Speech against the Duke.

And Sir John Elliot made this return,

'First, Considering the Duke's plurality of great and different Offices together with his deceit and fraud, in perswading the Merchants to go to Diep, there to entrap them; in colouring the Designs to the King, which he had plotted to serve against those of his Religion; in abusing the

Anno 1626. the Parliament at Oxford; and disguising his purpose, as if the ships were to go to Rachel; these particulars being so various, and of such a nature, he called by the name of Srellionatus, from a beast discoloured, uncertain, and doubtful, that they knew not by what name to call it, or by what colour to describe it; and these he called a Character of the mind, because they lie in the heart, and were deceits to abuse the King and Parliament.

Secondly, As to his saying, He knew not the Ships were come; he answered he did not know it then, and as yet he knew it not, though it was true that he heard it.

Thirdly, He denied not, that speaking of the Duke, he sometimes used this word, that man, though at other times he was not wanting to give him his due Titles; and said, That the Latins, speaking of Cesar, called him Ille Cesar, and that the same is usual in all Languages; nor did he think the Duke to be a God.

Fourthly, He confessed, That he parallel'd him with the Bishop of Ely and Sejanus; and though there were many particular censures of that Bishop, yet he produced none but such as were within the compass of his Charge; nor did he apply the Veneries and Venefices of Sejanus to the Duke, but excluded them.

Lastly, Touching the Physick of the King, he said, he brake off so abruptly in aggravation of the Duke's offence, who not content with the injury of Justice, the wrong of Honour, the prejudice of the State, nor that of the Revenue, his attempts go higher, even to the person of the King, making on that his practice in such a manner, to such an effect, that he said, he feared to speak, nay, he doubted to think; in which regard he left it, as Cicero did another thing, Ne gravioribus, &c.

The Commons Vote hereupon, That Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir John Elliot, and the rest, who managed the Impeachment, had not exceeded their Commission.

The Lord's House Petition the King, That the Earl of Arundel, now Prisoner in the Tower, may be released; for that his Commitment was against the Liberties and Privileges of their House. The Petition followeth;

May it please your Majesty,

The Lords Petition to the King about the Earl of Arundel, imprisoned in the time of Parliament.
The cause that moves us now to attend your Majesty, (as at first we did) is because that we observe that the House of Commons have speedily received a Member of theirs who was committed: We the Peers, ambitious to deserve of your Majesty, and to appear to the eye of the world as much respected in our Rights and Privileges, as any Peers or Commons have ever been, acknowledging you a King of as much goodness as ever King was; do now humbly beseech that the Earl of Arundel, a Member of our House, may be restored to us; it so much concerning us in point of Privilege, that we all suffer in what he suffers in this restraint.

In March last, when the Earl of Arundel was committed, the House of Lords purposed to take the same into their considerations, and so to proceed therein, as to give no just cause of offence to his Majesty, and yet preserve the Privileges of Parliament.

The Lord Keeper of the Great Seal thereupon signified unto the House, that he was commanded to deliver this Message from his Majesty unto their Lordships; viz.

Cur. 2.

That the Earl of Arundel was restrained for a misdemeanor which was personal to his Majesty, and lay in the proper knowledge of his Majesty, and had no relation to Matters of Parliament.

Whereupon the House was put into a Committee; and being resumed,

The Lords Committees for Privileges, &c. were appointed to search for Presidents concerning the Commitment of a Peer of this Realm, during the time of Parliament; and the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Doderidge, and Mr. Justice Telverton, were appointed to attend their Lordships in that behalf.

The day following the Lord Treasurer delivered another Message from the King in hec verba.

Whereas upon a Motion made by one of your Lordships, the Lord Keeper did yesterday deliver a Message from his Majesty, that the Earl of Arundel was restrained for a misdemeanor which was personal to his Majesty, and lay in the proper knowledge of his Majesty, and had no relation to matters of Parliament: His Majesty hath now Comanded him to signify to your Lordships, that he doth avow the Message in sort as it was delivered, to have been done punctually according to his Majesties own direction, and he knoweth that he hath therein done justly, and not diminished the Privileges of that House.

The Kings Message to the Lords touching the Earl of Arundel.

And because the Committee appointed yesterday to search for Presidents, &c. had not yet made any Report to the House; therefore the directions for this business were suspended for that time.

Not long after the Earl of Hertford made report to the House, That the Lords Committees for Privileges met on Monday last; The first Question that arose amongst them was, whether those Proxies were of any validity which are deputed to any Peer, who sitteth not himself in Parliament? And it was conceived that those Votes were lost: Whereupon the Committee found this House to be deprived of five suffrages by the absence of the Earl of Arundel, unto whom they were intrusted: And the Committee finding by the Journal Book that the Sub-Committee which was appointed to search Presidents for Privileges concerning the Commitment of a Peer in the time of Parliament, had not yet made report to the House: and then considering together their Notes of Presidents whereof they had made search, found, That no one Peer had been committed, the Parliament sitting, without trial of Judgment of the Peers in Parliament; and that one only President of the Bishop of Winchester in the Book-Case, in the Third year of Edw. 3. which was here urged, cannot be proved to be in Parliament time; and this the Lords of the Grand Committee thought fit to offer to the consideration of the House.

Hereupon the House was moved to give power to the Lords Sub-Committees for Privileges, &c. to proceed in the search of Presidents of the Commitment of a Peer of this Realm during the time of Parliament; and that the King's Council might

The Lords resolved to maintain their privilege.

Anno might shew them such Presidents as they have of 1626. the said Commitment; and that the said Sub-Committee may make the Report unto the House at the next access.

All which was granted and agreed unto, and these Lords were called unto the said Sub-Committee; viz.

The Lord Treasurer.
Lord President.
Duke of Buckingham.
Earl of Dorset.
Earl of Devon.
Earl of Clare.
The Viscount Wallingford.
Viscount Mansfield.
Lord North.

And the King's Council were appointed to attend the Lords.

The Lord President reported the Proceedings of the said Sub-Committees for Priviledges, &c. upon Commitment of the Earl of Arundel, viz.

'That the King's Council had searched and acquainted the Lords Sub-Committees with all that they had found in Records, Chronicles and Stories, concerning this matter: Unto which the said Lords Sub-Committees had given full Answer, and also shewn such Presidents as did maintain their own Rights.

The Presidents being read, (which for the length we forbear to mention) it was resolved upon the Question by the whole House, Nemine dissensiente,

'That the Priviledge of this House is, That no Lord of Parliament, the Parliament sitting, or within the usual time of Priviledges of Parliament, is to be imprisoned or restrained without Sentence or Decree of the House, unless it be for Treason or Felony, or refusing to give surety of the Peace.

And it was thereupon ordered, That the said Lords Sub-Committees for Priviledges, &c. or any five of them, shall meet this Afternoon to consider of a Remonstrance and Petition of the Peers concerning the Claim of their Priviledges from Arrests and Imprisonments during the Parliament. Which was conceived by the Lords Sub-Committees for Priviledges, according to the order of the House, and was read openly, viz.

May it please your Majesty,

A Remonstrance and Petition of the Peers in behalf of the Earl of Arundel.

WE the Peers of this your Realm assembled in Parliament, finding the Earl of Arundel absent from his place, that sometimes in this Parliament late amongst us, his presence was therefore called for: But thereupon a Message was delivered unto us from your Majesty by the Lord Keeper, that the Earl of Arundel was restrained for a Misdemeanor which was personal to your Majesty, and had no relation to matters of Parliament. This Message occasioned us to enquire into the Acts of our Ancestors, and what in like cases they had done, that so we might not err in any dutiful respect to your Majesty, and yet preserve our right and priviledge of Parliament. And after diligent search both of all Stories, Statutes and Records that might inform us in this case, We find it to be an undoubted right and constant priviledge of Parliament, That no Lord of Parliament, the Parliament sitting, or within the usual times of Priviledge of Parliament, is to be imprisoned or restrained, without sentence or order of the House, unless it be for Treason or Felony, or for refusing to give surety for the Peace. And to satisfy our selves the better, we have heard all that could be alledged by your Majesties Counsel learned at Law, that might any way weaken or infringe this claim of the Peers; and to all that can be shewed or alledged, so full satisfaction hath been given, as that all the Peers of Parliament, upon the Question made of this Priviledge, have, una voce, consented, That this is the undoubted Right of the Peers, and hath inviolably been enjoyed by them.

Wherefore we, your Majesties Loyal Subjects and humble Servants, the whole body of the Peers now in Parliament assembled, most humbly beseech your Majesty, that the Earl of Arundel, a Member of this Body, may presently be admitted with your Gracious Favor to come, sit, and serve your Majesty and the Commonwealth in the great Affairs of this Parliament. And we shall pray, &c.

This Remonstrance and Petition to his Majesty was approved by the whole House, who agreed, that it should be presented by the whole House to his Majesty; and it was further agreed, that the Lord President, the Lord Steward, the Earl of Cambridge, and the Lord Great Chamberlain should presently go to the King to know his Majesties pleasure when they shall attend him.

These Lords returning, the Lord President reported, that his Majesty had appointed that day, between two and three of the Clock, for the whole House to attend him with the said Remonstrance and Petition in the Chamber of Presence at Whitehall.

And it was agreed, That the Lord Keeper should then read the same to the King, and present it to his Majesty.

The twentieth of April, the Lord President reported the King's Answer unto the Remonstrance, and Petition of the Lords, to this effect:

'That their Lordships having spent some time about this business, and it being of some consequence, his Majesty should be thought rash if he should give a sudden Answer thereto; and therefore will advise of it, and give them a full Answer in convenient time.

The King first Answer to the Remonstrance and Petition.

The 21 of April, 1626. it was ordered, That the House should be called on Monday next, being the 24th of April.

Which was done accordingly, and the Earl of Arundel being called, the Lord Keeper signified unto the House, that his Majesty had taken into consideration the Petition exhibited by their Lordships the 19th of April concerning the Earl of Arundel, and will return an answer thereunto with all expedition.

The Second of May it was Ordered, That the Lord Keeper should move his Majesty from the House for a speedy and gracious Answer unto the Petition on the Earl of Arundel's behalf.

The Fourth of May, 1626. The Lord Keeper signified unto their Lordships, that according to the Order of the Second of May, he had moved his Majesty from the House on the behalf of

The King promised to answer the said Remonstrance. The Lords are urgent for an Answer. The King returns no other Answer to the Lords touching the Remonstrance.

the Earl of Arundel; Who answered,

Aug 1626. 'It is a Cause wherein he hath had a great deal of care, and is willing to give their Lordships satisfaction, and hath it in his consideration how to do it, and hath been interrupted by other business, wherein Mr. Attorney hath had occasion of much conference with him (as their Lordships are acquainted:) But will with all conveniency give their Lordships satisfaction, and return them an Answer.

The Ninth of May, 1626. the House being moved to petition the King touching the Earl of Arundel, certain Lords were appointed to set down the form of the said Petition; who reported the same in writing as followeth, viz.

May it please your Majesty,

Another Petition to the King touching the Earl of Arundel.

Whereas the whole Body of the Peers now assembled in Parliament, did the Nineteenth day of April exhibit to your Majesty an humble Remonstrance and Petition concerning the privilege of Peers in Parliament, and in particular touching the Earl of Arundel, whereupon we received a gracious Answer, That in convenient time, we should receive a fuller Answer, which we have long and dutifully attended: And now at this time so great a business being in handling in the House, we are pressed by that business to be humble suitors to your Majesty, for a gracious and present Answer.

Which being read, was approved of by the House, and the said Committee appointed to present the same unto his Majesty from the House, at such time as the Lord Chamberlain shall signify unto them, that his Majesty is pleased to admit them to his Presence.

The Eleventh of May the Lord President reported the King's Answer to the said Petition.

The King takes exception at the Petition.

'That he did little look for such a Message from the House; That himself had been of the House, and did never know such a Message from the one House unto the other: Therefore when he received a Message fit to come from them to their Sovereign, they shall receive an Answer.

The Lords desire to know of his Majesty, to what part of the Petition he takes exception.

The Lord President further Reported, That the Lords Committees appointed to deliver the Petition to the King, did thereupon withdraw, and require him humbly to desire his Majesty to be pleased to let them know unto what point of the said Petition he takes this Exception; and that his Majesty willed him to say this of himself; viz.

'The Exception the King taketh, is at the peremptoriness of the Term, To have a present Answer; and the King wonders at their impatience, since he hath promised them an Answer in convenient time.

The Petition presented again, and the word (present) left out.

Hereupon the House altered their former Petition, leaving out the word Present, and appointed the former Committee humbly to deliver the same to his Majesty.

The Thirteenth of May, the Lord President reported the King's Answer to the Petition; viz.

'It is true, the word (Present) was somewhat strange to his Majesty, because they did not use it from one House to another; but now, that his Majesty knows their meaning, they shall know this from him, that they shall have his Answer so soon as conveniently he can; And this his Majesty will assure them, it shall be such an Answer as they shall see will not trench upon the Privileges of the House.

Car. 2.

The King's answer to the Petition so ordered.

The Lords having agreed on another Petition to the King, wherein they acknowledge him to be a Prince of as much goodness as ever King was:

The Nineteenth of May, the Lord Chamberlain signified to their Lordships, that his Majesty being acquainted therewith, is pleased that this House attend him at two of the Clock this day in the Afternoon at Whitehall.

On which day the Lords delivered the Petition to his Majesty; who upon the 20th of May returned this Answer;

My Lords,

'I See that in your Petition you acknowledge me a King of as much goodness as ever King was; for which I thank you, and I will endeavour, by the Grace of God, never to deserve otherwise: But in this I observe that you contradict your selves; for if you believe me to be such, as you say I am, you have no reason to mistrust the sincerity of my promises: For, whereas upon often Petitions made by you unto me concerning this business, I have promised to give you a full Answer with all convenient speed; by this again importuning of me you seem to mistrust my former promises: But it may be said there is an Emergent cause, for that I have delivered a Member of the lower House.

The King's Answer to the Petition.

'In this, my Lords, by your favour you are mistaken, for the Causes do no way agree; for that he that was committed of the House of Commons was committed for words spoken before both Houses, which being such as I had just cause to commit him; yet because I found they might be words only misplaced, and not ill meant, and were so conceived by many honest men, I was content upon his Interpretation to release him, without any suit from the lower House; whereas as my Lord of Arundel's fault was directly against my self, having no relation to the Parliament; yet because I see you are so impatient, I will make you a fuller Answer than yet I have done, not doubting but that you will rest contented therewith.

'It is true, I committed him for a cause which most of you know, and though it had been no more, I had reason to do it; yet my Lords, I assure you that I have things of far greater importance to lay to his Charge, which you must excuse me for, not to tell you at this time, because it is not yet ripe, and it would much prejudice my service to do it; and this, by the word of a King, I do not speak out of a desire to delay you, but as soon as it is possible, you shall know the cause, which is such as I know you will not judge to be any breach of your Privileges; for my Lords, by this I do not mean to shew the power of a King by diminishing your Privileges.

Another Petition of the Lord's touching the Earl of Arundel.

This Answer being read, it was ordered, That the Committee for Priviledges should meet, and consider how farther to proceed with dutiful respect to his Majesty; and yet so, as it may be for the preservation of the Priviledges of the Peers of this Land, and the Liberties of the House of Parliament.

The 24th of May the Lord President reported the Petition agreed on by the Lords Committees for Priviledges, &c. to be presented to the King, which was in hac verba,

May it please your most excellent Majesty,

Whatever our care and desire is to preserve our right of Peers, yet it is far from our thoughts either to distrust, or to expels any thing that stands not with the affection and duty of most dutiful and loyal Subjects; and therefore in all humility we cast our selves before your Majesty, assuring our selves in the word of a King, that with all condieney possible, your Majesty will please either to restore the Peer to his place in Parliament, or expels such a cause as may not infringe our priviledges.

The Petition was generally approved, and ordered to be presented to his Majesty by the whole House; and the Earl of Carlisle and the Lord Carlion to go presently to know the King's pleasure when they shall attend his Majesty. Who being returned, reported, That his Majesty hath appointed that Afternoon at two of the Clock for the same.

The 25th of May, the Lord Keeper delivered the King's Answer unto the said Petition, to be read in hac verba, viz.

My Lords,

The Kings
Answer to this Petition.

Your often coming to me, about this matter, made me somewhat doubt you did mistrust me; but now I see you rely wholly on me, I assure you it shall prevail more upon me than all importunities; And if you had done this at first, I should have given you content. And now I assure you, I will use all possible speed to give satisfaction, and at the furthest before the end of this Session of Parliament.

The Lords
adjourn in disgust till the morrow.

This being read, the House was moved the second time, That all business may be laid aside, and that Consideration might be had how their Priviledges may be preserved unto posterity. And the House was put into a Committee for the freer Debate thereof, and afterwards resumed: And it was ordered, That the House be Adjourned till to morrow, and all business to cease.

The 26th of May, the Lord Keeper delivered his Message from the King to the House of Lords, viz.

His Majesty's Message to the Lords.

That his Majesty hath willed him to signifie unto their Lordships, that he doth marvel his meaning in his last Answer should be mistaken: and for the better clearing of his intention, hath commanded him to signifie unto their Lordships his further Answer, which is, That their Lordships last Petition was so acceptable to his Majesty, that his intent was then, and is still, to satisfy their Lordships fully in what they then desired.

Whereupon it was ordered, That all business be Adjourned till that day seven-night.

At the same time the Duke of Buckingham signified unto their Lordships his desire to have the King's Counsel allowed him to plead his Cause: But the Lords would not hear him, because they would entertain no business: And so the House was Adjourned to the Second of June. At which time the House sitting again, the Lord Keeper delivered this Message from the King to the House of Lords, viz.

Car. 2.
Upon this Message
the Lords adjourn for a sevennight.

HIS Majesty hath Commanded me to deliver unto your Lordships a Message touching the Earl of Arundel; That his Majesty hath thought of that business, and hath advised of his great and pressing Affairs, which are such, as make him unwilling to enter into dispute of things doubtful: And therefore to give you clear satisfaction touching that Cause, whereby you may more cheerfully proceed in the business of the House, he hath endeavoured as much as may be to ripen it; but cannot yet effect it; but is resolved, that at the farthest by Wednesday seven-night, being the Fourteenth of June, he will either declare the Cause, or admit him to the House. And addeth further, upon the word of a King, That if it shall be sooner ripe, which he hath good cause to expect, he will declare it at the soonest. And further, That if the occasion doth enforce to stay to the time prefixed, yet he doth not purpose to set such a short end to the Parliament, but that there shall be an ample and good space between that, and the end of the Sessions, to dispatch Affairs.

The Lords
adjourn +
gain.

This Message being delivered, the House was Adjourned ad libitum, and put into a Committee; And being resumed, it was agreed, That all businesses should cease, but this of the Earl of Arundel's concerning the Priviledges of the House; and the House to meet thereon to morrow morning, and to be put into a Committee to consider thereof. And so the House was adjourned to the next day.

Then the Lord Keeper delivered this Message from the King, viz.

Another
Message from the King to
the Lords concerning the Earl of Arundel.

That in the matter concerning the Earl of Arundel, his Majesty hath been very careful and desirous to avoid all jealousy of violating the Priviledges of this House; that he continueth still of the same mind, and doth much desire to find out some Expedient, which may satisfy their Lordships in point of Privilege, and yet not hinder his Majesties service in that particular. But because this will require some time, his Majesty, though his great Affairs are urgent and pressing, is unwilling to urge their Lordships to go on therewith, till his Majesty hath thought on the other: And therefore hath commanded him to signifie his pleasure, That his Majesty is contented their Lordships adjourn the House till Thursday next; and in the mean time his Majesty will take this particular business into further consideration.

Hereupon the Lords agreed, That the Lord Keeper do render unto his Majesty from the House, their humble thanks for his gracious respect unto their Priviledges.

Then the Lord Keeper demanded of the Lords, whether their Lordships would Adjourn the House

Anno 1626. House till Thursday next? Whereupon it was agreed by the Lords, and the House was so Adjourned.

On Thursday, June the 8th, the Lord Keeper delivered this Message to the Lords from his Majesty, viz.

‘That on Saturday last his Majesty sent word to the House, That by this day he would send them such an Answer concerning the Earl of Arundel, as should satisfie them in point of Priviledge. And therefore to take away all dispute, and that their Priviledges may be in the same estate as they were when the Parliament began, his Majesty hath taken off the restraint of the said Earl, whereby he hath liberty to come to the House.

The Earl of Arundel being returned to the House, did render his humble thanks unto his Majesty for his gracious favour towards him; and gave their Lordships also most hearty thanks for their often intercessions for him unto the King, and protested his loyalty and faithful service unto his Majesty.

Much about this time, Mr. Moor, a Member of the House of Commons, having spoken some words which seemed to reflect upon his Majesty, they were reported to the House, viz. That he said, We were born free, and must continue free, if the King will keep his Kingdom: Adding these words. Thanks be to God, we have no occasion to fear, having a just and pious King. The House for these words committed Mr. Moor to the Tower of London; And his Majesty shortly after sent a Message, That he had passed by his offence. Whereupon he was released.

While the Duke stood charged in the Parliament, the Chancellorship of Cambridge became void by the death of the Lord Howard Earl of Suffolk, who died on Whitsunday the 28th of May, 1626, The University having understood by several hands, that it was the King's express will and pleasure that the Duke should be chosen in his stead, were ambitious and forward to express their obedience to his Majesty in that behalf; well knowing, that in regard of their multitude, and worthy judgment and wisdom, that is esteemed and ought to be in those Electors, this was one of the most honourable Testimonies of worth and integrity that the Nation can afford: And that whereas all other the Dukes Honours did but help the rather to sink him with their weight, this would seem to shore and prop him up.

Letters were pretended to be sent from his Majesty, to the intent to discourage all opposers: But though the Pretence of Letters served mainly to effect their ends, yet the producing of them would have prejudiced the chief intentment of the Election, namely the honour of the Testimony in it; which chiefly lying in the freedom of the Votes, had by Letters been cut off. Many Heads of Houses bestir'd themselves according to their several power and interest in their respective Societies; and Trinity Colledge alone (the Master whereof was Dr. Maw, one of the King's Chaplains) supplied the Duke with Forty three Votes, the third part of those which served the turn, for he had in all One hundred and eight.

He was chosen the Thursday following the death of his Predecessor, namely the fourth day after the vacancy, notwithstanding fourteen days are allowed by the University Statute. His chief strength consisted in the Doctors (whereof seventeen were for him, and only one against him) and in the Non-Regents, who are Masters of Art of five years standing and upward: Among the Regents (who are Masters under five years) thirty more were against him than for him, and four whole Colledges were entire against the Duke. For notwithstanding all the industry that could be employed on his behalf, there was a Party so diligent and resolute, that the same morning the choice was made, they jointly pitched upon the Lord Thomas Howard, second Son to the late deceased Chancellor, and Earl of Berkshire; though they had no Head appearing for him, nor one man in the University that was known to have any reference to him, excepting one Mr. Granado Chester, who was either his Chaplain, or otherwise interested in him: And notwithstanding all disadvantages, they lost it for the said Earl but by five Voices; for the Duke had but One hundred and eight, and the Earl had One hundred and three, besides that two of the Dukes were void by Statute, as being given to the Vice-Chancellor by compromise, to dispose of as he shall think fit.

The Earl of Berkshire being afterwards acquainted with the intentions of the University towards him, wrote this Letter to Mr. Chester, a Divine, related to his Lordship.

Mr. Chester,

THE infinite obligation which I owe to the University of Cambridge, for the late most ample Testimony of their great love and affection towards me, imboldens me to borrow your help to make known unto them my unfeigned thankfulness: wherein I confess that the love and favour which they have expressed unto me, joyned with the fashion of it, doth far exceed the weak expression of so feeble a Style as mine is. For they have been pleased, out of their abundant affection, to name me to one of the greatest Honours of this Kingdom, without any suit or means of mine, which was the Chancellorship of the University: The Voting whereof in this noble fashion, I account it as much as could befall me; and do receive it with as much thankfulness, as if I were in full possession of the place.

I must therefore intreat you to disperse this my thankful Acknowledgment to all my worthy Friends there, who have so freely bestowed their Voices, and unsought for Favours upon me. And this labour I do the rather lay upon you, because you know I put you to no making means for me; which I should undoubtedly have done, if I had preconceived any intention of standing for this Dignity, so often wedded by men of high Places and Noble Families of this Realm; whereof my honoured Father deceased, enjoyed the last Testimony, and my Uncle before him; and not ceasing there, it was expressed to me by an hereditary affection. Thus much I pray you make known for me, with this further assurance, That as I had my first Breeding, to my great Honour, in Cambridge, so I will live and die

Anno 1626. The Commons being informed of the afore-1626. said Proceedings in Cambridge, directed a Letter to be written to that University to signify the Houses dislike thereof. Whereupon the King signifieth to the House his pleasure by Sir Richard Weston, that they forbear to send any such Letter, for that the Election had been made by the power of the Charters according to the Rules and Liberties of the University; and that if there have been any Error in the form of the Election, it belongeth unto his Majesty to examin and reform it, and not unto the House. To which Message the Commons return this Answer.

The Commons Answer.

That they do acknowledge they were about to write to the University, because that the very Election it self, whereby the University is committed to the Government of one that is charged, and publickly complained of by the Commons in Parliament, whereof the Electors are a part, is, in it self, a very great Grievance, and prejudicial in example; whereof they have Reason to be the more sensible, because they are informed, that in the manner of the Election there were many passages likewise done in contempt of the House: And do humbly beseech his Majesty to believe, That neither in this, nor any other thing, this House did or shall intend to enlarge their own Power and Jurisdiction, to the Diminution of his Majesties Right or Prerogative.

Whereunto his Majesty replied by the said Sir Richard Weston.

His Majesties Reply.

His Majesty saith, That Cambridge, and all Corporations, derive their right and pri-viledge from him; and that he hath reason to esteem the Universities above any other, and is resolved to defend them against any, which either wilfully, or by chance, shall go about to infringe their Liberties. Concerning the Election it self, his Majesty is far from conceiving it a grievance; for he never heard that Crimes objected, were to be taken as proved; or, that a man should lose his Fame or good Opinion in the World, upon an Accusation only.

But whereas you say in the manner of carriage of the Election, there were many passages done in it to the contempt of the House. His Majesty is well pleased, that you enquire and punish the Offenders, if there be any that have mis-behaved themselves in that respect. But for the Election it self, or the form of it, his Majesty doth avow his first Message.

The Duke returned this Acknowledgment to the University.

Master Vice-Chancellor, and Gentlemen of the University of Cambridge, There is no one thing that concerneth me more near, than the good opinion of Good and Learned honest men: Amongst which number, as you have ever held the first rank in the estimation of the Commonwealth, and fame of the Christian World; so in conferring this honour of Chancellorship upon me, I must confess you have satisfied a great ambition of mine, which I hope will never forsake me; and that is, To be thought well of by Men that deserve well, and Men of your Profession. Yet I cannot attribute this Honour to any desert in me, but to the respect you bear to the Sacred memory of my Master deceased, the King of Scholars, who loved you, and honoured you often with his Presence, and to my Gracious Master now living; who inherits, with his blessed Fathers Vertues, the affection he bore to your University.

I beseech you, as you have now made your choice with so many kind and noble Circumstances, as the manner is to me as acceptable and grateful as the Matter;
 so to assure your selves, That you have cast your Votes upon your Servant, who is as apprehensive of the time you have shewed your affection in, as of the Honour you have given him.

And I earnestly request you all, that you would be pleased, not to judge me comparatively by the success and happiness you have had in your former choice of Chancellors; who as they knew better perhaps by advantage of education in your University, how to value the deserts of men of your qualities and degrees, so could they not be more willing to cherish you than my self, who will make amends for my want of Scholarship, in my love to the Professors of it, and to the source from whence it cometh; having now most just cause more chiefly to employ my utmost endeavours, with what favour I enjoy from a Royal Master, to the maintaining of the Charters, Priviledges, and Immunities of your University in general, and to the advancing of the particular merits of the Students therein.

And since I am so far engaged to you, I will presume upon a further courtesie, which is, That you will be pleased to supply me with your advice, and suggest a way unto me (as my self likewise shall not fail to think on some means) how we may make Posterity remember you had a thankful Chancellor, and that both really loved you and your University: Which is a resolution writ in an honest heart, by him that want-eth much to express his Affection to you, who will ever be

Your faithful Friend

and humble Servant,

George Buckingham.

Also the King was pleased to write to the University of Cambridge, in approbation of the said Election.

Trusty and Well-beloved, We greet you well.

Whereas upon our Pleasure, intimated unto The King you by the Bishop of Durham, for the choice of the said of your Chancellor, you have with much duty, as We expected, highly satisfied Us in your Election; We cannot in our Princely Nature (who are much possessed with this Testimony of your ready and loyal Affections) but for ever let you know, how much you are therein made partakers of our Royal Approbation. And as we shall ever conceive, that an Honour done to a Person we favour, is out of a Loyal respect had unto Our self: And as we shall ever justifie Buckingham worthy of this your Election, so shall you find the fruits of it. For we that have found him a faithful Servant to Our dear Father of blessed Memory, and Our self, cannot but undertake that he will prove such an one to you; and will assist him with a Gracious Willingness in anything that may concern the good of the University in general, or the particular Merits of any Students there.

June

Anno 1626.

June 8. Before the Duke gave in his Answer on that day unto the House of Peers, to the Impeachment of the House of Commons, he made this ensuing Speech;

My Lords,

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech to the Lords House before he gave in his Answer.

IN a case of pressure considered by it self, I have a fair beginning, it is a due debt to your Lordships for this Honourable Favour in leaving it to my choice, whether I would answer to the particulars in the Aggravation, or not. I may, without lessening my Obligation, say, The Favour is greater at first, it may be yours, or your Posterities hereafter. I have in a manner tied myself to my Charge, hoping I gave your Lordships satisfaction in that, the Aggravations will fall of themselves. I could not well have followed the Aggravations, being composed of words, which I hope my actions have not deserved; and I am sure my Ears have not been made acquainted with, without some distraction of spirit; yet I have left nothing of them unanswered that is material. I have used as much speed to come to an answer, as conveniently I could without prejudice of my cause, having my reputation too long upon the stage; and had your Lordships called for it sooner, I had been as ready as now I was desirous, to detain your Lordships as little as may be (with the expectation of my particular) from weightier business.

I was also grieved that my business should be a cause of the loss of this year from Foreign Attempts, and the hindrance of those resolutions that would have comforted our Friends abroad, and secur'd our selves at home: But in this, my Lords, I am sure, you will easily acquit me in your thoughts. When I look upon my Charge in general (as they did) without searching into the integrity of my own heart and actions which are yet unknown to most of them, I wonder not so much at their proceedings, the particulars not being voted against me, nor unanimously: but had they taken the means to have been better and truly informed of the particulars, or have given me cause to have informed them, I assure my self they had not troubled your Lordships with this Charge: But I confess there hath been that contestation in the House of Commons concerning my Justification, that I cannot but acknowledge much favour there from many. And if the actions of some others in that House, do not conclude me of a worse disposition than I shall hereafter be found, there is none but may say with me, I am at peace with all.

I shall only for the present, apply my self to the clearing of my Reputation, and for the future, of those actions and endeavours which may repossess me of that I have counted one of my greatest losses, their good opinions. I would not speak nor profess this before your Lordships, if reason and my own disposition did not warrant the performance of it.

For first, Who accused me? Common Fame. Who gave me up to your Lordships? The House of Commons.

The one is too subtle a Body, if a Body: the other too great for me to contest with; and I am confident, when my cause shall be tried, neither the one or the other, or part of either, will be found to be my enemy.

But as Fame is subtle, so it is often and especially in accusations false; therefore the House of Commons have not wronged me: Yet I am confident it will at length be found, that Common Fame hath abused both them and me.

I presume the House of Commons have proceeded against me out of an hearty and zealous affection, to do their King and Country service, I hope out of Christian Charity to punish and amend my faults (if Fame could have proved them) and not to envy my Reputation, or destroy my Fortune. I shall never call such proceedings wrong, if seeking to cure my errors, give me opportunity to clear and publish my innocence: For the State it self, I have little to say, it is but a little, I will not abuse your Lordships patience. I was born and bred in it, I owe it my self; I have been raised to Honours and Fortunes in it (I freely confess) beyond my Merits; what I wanted in sufficiency and experience for the service of it, I have endeavoured to supply by care and industry.

And could there be the least alienation hereafter in my heart from the service of the State, for any thing that hath past, I should be the ungratefulest man living; should but such a thought stain my heart, I should be content it were let blood. If my Posterity should not inherit the same fidelity, I should desire an inversion in the course of Nature, and be glad to see them earthed before me. My Answer to the several points in Charge, I shall crave leave to deliver in brief, and in form of Law, but as naked as truth loves to be; and so I leave my self and my cause to your Lordships Justice.

The humble Answer and Plea of George Duke of Buckingham, to the Declaration and Impeachment made against him, before your Lordships, by the Commons House of Parliament.

THE said Duke of Buckingham being accused, and sought to be impeached before your Lordships, of the many Misdemeanors, Misprisions, Offences, and Crimes wherewith he is charged by the Commons House of Parliament, and which are comprised in the Articles preferred against him, and were aggravated by those, whose service was used by that House in the delivery of them, doth find in himself an unexpressible pressure of deep and hearty sorrow, that so great and so worthy a Body should have him suspected of those things which are objected against him; whereas, had that Honourable House first known the very truth of those particulars, whereof they had not there the means to be rightly informed, he is well assured in their own true judgments, they would have forbore to have charged him therewith.

But the integrity of his own Heart and Conscience, being the most able and most impartial Witnesses, not accusing him of the least thought of disloyalty to his Sovereign, or to his Country, doth raise his spirits again to make his just defence before your Lordships, of whose Wisdom, Justice and Honour, he is so well assured, That he doth, with confidence, and yet with all humbleness, submit himself and his cause to your Examinations and Judgments, before whom he shall with all sincerity

rity and cleareness, unfold and lay open the secrets of his own actions, and of his heart; and in his Answer shall not affirm the least Substantial, and as near as he can, the least Circumstantial point, which he doth not believe he shall clearly prove before your Lordships.

The Charge consisteth of Thirteen several Articles, whereunto the Duke, saving to himself the benefit of not being prejudiced by any words or want of form in his Answer; but that he may be admitted to make further explanation and proof, as there shall be occasion, and saving to him all Priviledges and Rights belonging to him, as one of the Peers of the Realm, doth make these several and distinct Answers following, in the same order they are laid down unto him.

The Charge touching the Plurality of Offices.

His Charge touching Plurality of Offices.

To the first, which concerneth the Plurality of Offices which he holdeth, he answereth thus, That it is true that he holdeth those several Places and Offices, which are enumerated in the preamble of his Charge, whereof only three are worthy the name of Offices, viz. the Admiralty, the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, and Mastership of the Horse; the other are rather titular and additions of Honour. For these Offices he humbly and freely acknowledgeth the bounty and goodness of his most gracious Master, who is with God; who when he had cast an eye of Favour upon him, and had taken him into a more near place of service about his Royal Person, was more willing to multiply his Graces and Favours upon him, than the Duke was forward to ask them; and for the most part (as many honourable persons, and his now most excellent Majesty, above all others, can best testifie) did prevent the very desires of the Duke in asking: and all these particular places, he can and doth truly affirm, his late Majesty did bestow them of his own Royal Motion (except the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports only) and thereto also he gave his approbation and encouragement.

And the Duke denieth, that he obtained these places either to satisfie his exorbitant ambition, or his own profit or advantage, as is objected against him: And he hopeth he shall give good satisfaction to the contrary in his particular Answers ensuing, touching the manner of his obtaining the places of the Admiralty and the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, whereunto he humbly desireth to refer himself. And for the Mastership of the Horse to his Majesty, he saith it is a meer Domestick Office of attendance upon the King's person, whereby he receiveth some profit; yet but as a conveniency to render him more fit for his continual attendance; and in that place, the times compared, he hath retrenched the King's annual charge to a considerable value, as shall be made apparent.

And for the number of places he holdeth, he saith, That if the Commonwealth doth not suffer thereby, he hopeth he may without blame, receive and retain that, which the liberal and bountiful hand of his Majesty hath freely conferred upon him: And it is not without many Presidents, both in Ancient and Modern times, That one man eminent in the esteem of his Sovereign, hath at one time held as great and as many Offices: But when it shall be discerned, That he shall falsely or corruptly execute those places, or any of them, or that the Publick shall suffer thereby; he is so thankful for what he hath freely received, that whensoever his gracious Master shall require it, without disputing with his Sovereign, he will readily lay down at his Royal Feet, not only his Places and Offices, but his whole Fortunes and his Life, to do him service.

For the buying of the Admirals place, the said Duke maketh this clear and true Answer.

That it is true, that in January, in the Sixteenth year of his late Majesties Reign, his late Majesty did by his Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, grant unto the Duke the Office of Admiralty for his life; which Grant, as he well knoweth it, was made freely and without any Contract or Bargain with the late Lord Admiral, or any other; and upon the voluntary Surrender of that Noble and well-deserving Lord, so he is advised it will appear to be free from any defect in Law, by reason of the Statute of 5 Edw. 6. mentioned in the Article of his Charge, or for any other cause whatsoever: For he saith the true manner of his obtaining this Office, and of all the passages thereof, which he is ready to make good by proof, was thus; That honourable Lord, the late Earl of Nottingham, the Lord Admiral, being grown much in years, and finding that he was not then so able to perform that which appertained to his place, as in former times he had done to his great Honour; and fearing lest his Majesties service, and the Commonwealth might suffer by his defect, became an humble and earnest Petitioner to his late Majesty, to admit him to surrender his Office. His late Majesty was at first unwilling unto it, out of his Royal Affection to his Person, and true Judgment of his worth: But the Earl renewed his Petitions, and in some of them nominated the Duke to be his Successor, without the Duke's privity or forethought of it. And about that time, a Gentleman of good place about the Navy, and of long experience, of himself came to the Duke, & earnestly moved him to undertake the place. The Duke apprehending the weight of the place, and considering his young years, and want of experience to manage so great a charge, gave no ear unto it; but excused it, not for form, but really and ingeniously out of the apprehension of his then unfitness for it. The Gentleman not thus satisfied, without the Duke applied himself to the late King, and moved his Majesty therein, and offered Reasons for it, That the Duke was the fittest man at that time, and as the state of the Navy then stood, for that place; for he said, it was then a time of peace. That the best service that could be done for the present, was to repair the Navy and Ships Royal, which then were much in decay, and to retrench the King's charge, and to employ it effectually, and that before there was like to be personal use of service, otherwise the Duke being young and active, might gain experience, & make himself as fit as any other; and that in the mean time, none was so fit as himself, having the opportunity of his Majesties Favour and Means to his Person, to procure a constant assignment and payment of Money for the Navy; the want whereof, was the greatest cause of the former defects.

These Reasons perswaded his late Majesty, and upon his Majesties own motion, perswaded the Duke to take the Charge upon him: And thereupon the Earl voluntarily, freely, willingly, and upon his own earnest and often suit, surrendered the Place without any President, Contract, or Promise whatsoever, which might render the Duke in the least degree subject to the danger of the

Anno 1626. the Law (which was not then so much as once thought upon) and upon that Surrender, the grant was made to the Duke. But it is true, That his Majesty out of his Royal Bounty, for recompence of the long and faithful service of the said Earl, and for an honourable memory of his deserts to him, and the Crown of England, did grant him a Pension of one thousand pounds per annum, for his life; which in all Ages hath been the Royal way of Princes, wherewith to reward antient and well-deserving Servants in their elder years; when without their own faults they are become less serviceable to the State: And the Duke also voluntarily and freely, and as an argument of his noble respect towards so honourable a Predecessor, whom to his death he called Father; whose Estate as he then understood, with his late Majesties Privy and approbation, did send him three thousand pounds in Money, which he hopeth no person of worth and honour will esteem to be an act worthy of blame in him. And when the Duke had thus obtained this place of great trust, he was so careful of his duty, that he would not rely upon his judgment or ability, but of himself humbly besought his then Majesty to settle a Commission of fit and able persons for the Affairs of the Navy; by whose Council and assistance, he might manage that weighty business with the best advantage for his Majesties Service; which Commission was granted, and yet continueth, and without the advice of those Commissioners, he hath never done any thing of moment; and by their advice and industry he hath thus husbanded the King's Money, and furthered the service, that where before the ordinary charge of the Navy was fifty four thousand pounds per annum, and yet the Ships were very much decayed, and their Provisions neglected, the charge was returned to thirty thousand pounds per annum, and with that charge, the Ships all repaired and made serviceable, and two new Ships builded yearly; and for the two last years, when there were no new Ships built, the ordinary charge was reduced to twenty one thousand six hundred pounds per annum. And now he dare boldly affirm, that his Majesties Navy is in better state by much, than ever it was in any precedent time whatsoever.

For his buying of the Wardship of the Cinque-Ports, he maketh this plain, ingenious and true Answer.

The Charge touching the buying of the Wardship of the Cinque-Ports.

That in December, in the two and twentieth year of his late Majesties Reign, he obtained the Office of Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports and Constable of the Castle of Dover, (being one entire Office) upon the Surrender of the Lord Zouch, then Lord Warden;

The manner of obtaining whereof, was thus, The Lord Zouch being grown in years, and with his almost continual lameness being grown less fit for that place, he discovered a willingness to leave it, and made several offers thereof to the Duke of Richmond, and Richard Earl of Darby, deceased; but he was not willing to part with it, without recompence. Notice whereof coming to the Duke, by an offer made from the Lord Zouch, he finding by experience how much, & how many waies both the King's service might and many times did suffer; and how many inconveniences did arise to the King's Subjects in their Goods, Ships, and Lives, by the intermixture of the Jurisdictions of the Admiralty and Wardship of the Cinque-Ports, by the emulation, disaffection, and contention of their Officers, as clearly appear by these particulars, amongst many others which may be instanced.

Car. 2.

1. Where the Admiral-Jurisdiction extends generally to all the Narrow Seas; the Warden of the Cinque-Ports hath and exerciseth Admiral-Jurisdiction on all the Sea-Coasts, from Show-Beacon in Essex, to the Red Noor in Sussex; and with those Limits there have been continual differences between the Lord Admiral, and the Lord Warden, whether the Lord Wardens Jurisdiction extends into the main Sea, or only as far as the low Water-mark, and so much farther into the Sea, as a man on Horse-back can reach with a Lance, which occasioneth Questions between those chief Officers themselves.

2. There are many and continual differences in executing of Warrants against offenders: the Officers of the one, refusing to obey or assist the Authority of the other; whereby the offenders protected or countenanced by either, easily escape.

3. Merchants and Owners of Goods questioned in the Admiralty, are often enforced to sue in both Courts, and often enforced, for their peace, to compound with both Officers.

4. The King's Service is much hindred; for the most usual and Ordinary Rendezvous of the King's Ships, being at the Downs, and that being within the Jurisdiction of the Lord Warden, the Lord Admiral or Captains of the King's Ships, have no power or warrant to press men from the Shore, if the King's Ships be in distress.

5. When the King's Ships, or others, be in danger in the Goodwins, and other places within the view of the Portsmen, they have refused to help with their Boats, lest the King's Ships should command them on board, whereby many Ships have perished, and much Goods have been lost.

6. When Warrants come to press a Ship at Road for the King's service, the Officers take occasion to disobey the Warrants, and prejudice the King's service. For if the Warrant come from the Lord Warden, they will pretend the Ship to be out of their Jurisdiction; if the Warrant come from the Lord Admiral, they will pretend it to be within the Jurisdiction of the Cinque-Ports; and so whilst the Officers Dispute, the opportunity of the service is lost.

7. When the King's Ships lie near the Ports, and the men come on Shore, the Officers refuse to assist the Captains to reduce them to the Ships without the Lord Warden's Warrant.

8. If the King's Ships, on the sudden, have any need of Pilots for the Sands, Coasts of Flanders, or the like, wherein the Ports-men are best experienced, they will not serve without the Lord Warden's, or his Lieutenants Warrant, who perhaps are not near the place.

9. When for great occasions for the Service of the State, the Lord Admiral and Lord Warden must both joyn their Authority; if the Officers for want of true understanding of their several Limits and Jurisdictions, mistake their Warrants, the service which many times can endure no delay, is lost or not so effectually performed.

For these and many other Reasons of the like kind, the Duke not being led, either with ambition or hope of profit as hath been objected (for it could be no increase of Honour to him, having been honoured before with a greater place, nor of profit, for it hath not yielded him in any matter any profit at all, nor is like to yield him above three Anno 1626. three hundred pounds per annum at any time) but out of his desire to make himself the more able to do the King and Kingdoms service, and prevent all differences and difficulties which heretofore had, or hereafter might hinder the same. He did entertain that motion, and doth confess, that not knowing, or so much as thinking of the said Act of Parliament before mentioned, he did agree to give the said Lord one thousand pounds in Money, and five hundred pounds per annum, in respect of his Surrender, he not being willing to leave his Place without such consideration, nor the Duke willing to have it without his full satisfaction; and the occasion why the Duke of Buckingham gave that consideration to the Lord Zouch, was, because the Duke of Richmond in his life-time had first agreed to give the same consideration for it; and if he had lived, he had had that Place upon the same terms: And when the said Duke of Richmond was dead, his late Majesty directed the Duke of Buckingham to go through for that Place, and for the Reasons before-mentioned, to put both these Offices together, and to give the same consideration to the said Lord, which the Duke of Richmond should have given, and his late Majesty said, he would repay the Money. And how far this act of his, in acquiring this Office, accompanied with these Circumstances, may be within the danger of the Law, the King being Privy to all the passages of it, and encouraging and directing it, he humbly submitteth to your judgment; and he humbly leaves it to your Lordships judgments, in what third way an antient Servant to the Crown, by age or infirmity, disabled to perform his service, can in an honourable course relinquish his Place; for if the King himself give the Reward, it may be said it is a charge to the Crown; if the succeeding Officer gave the Recompence, it may thus be objected to be within the danger of the Law: And how soever it be, yet he hopeth it shall not be held in him a Crime, when his intentions were just and honourable, and for the furtherance of the King's service; neither is it without president, that in former times of great employment, both these Offices were put into one hand by several Grants.

The Charge touching the not guarding the Seas.

To this Article, whereby the not guarding of the Narrow Seas in these last two years by the Duke, according to the trust and duty of an Admiral, is laid to his charge; whereof the consequence, supposed to have been meerly through his default, are the ignominious infesting of the Coasts with Pirats and Enemies, are the endangering of the Dominion of these Seas, the extreme loss of the Merchants, and the decay of the Trade and Strength of the Kingdom.

The Duke maketh this Answer, That he doubteth not but he shall make it appear, to the good satisfaction of your Lordships, that albeit there hath happened much loss to the King's Subjects within the said time of two years, by Pirats and Enemies, yet that hath not happened by the neglect of the Duke, or want of care and diligence in his place: For whereas in former times, the ordinary Guard allowed for the Narrow Seas hath been but four Ships, the Duke hath, since Hostility begun, and before, procured their number to be much increased; for since June, 1624. there hath never been fewer than five of the King's Ships, and ordinarily six, besides Pinnaces, Merchants Ships, and Drumblers; and since open Hostility, eight of the King's Ships, besides Merchants of great number, and Pinnaces, and Drumblers; and all these well furnished and manned, sufficiently instructed and authorized for the service. He saith, He hath from time to time, upon all occasions, acquainted his Majesty, and the Council-Boord therewith, and craved their advice, and used the assistance of the Commissioners for the Navy in this service: And for the Dunkirkers, who have of late infested these Coasts more than in former years, he saith, There was that providence used for the repression of them, that his Majesties Ships and the Hollanders joyning together, the Port of Dunkirk was blocked up, and so should have continued, had not a sudden Storm dispersed them, which being the immediate hand of God, could not by any policy of man be prevented; at which time, they took the opportunity to rove abroad, but it hath been so far from endangering the Dominion of the Narrow Seas thereby, as is suggested, that his Majesties Ships or Men of War, were never yet mastered, nor encountred by them, nor will they endure the sight of any of our Ships; and when the Duke himself was in person, the Dunkirkers run into their Harbours. But here is a necessity, that according to the Fortune of Wars, interchangeable losses will happen; yet hitherto notwithstanding their more than wonted insolency, the loss of the Enemies part hath been as much, if not more, than what hath happened to us; and that loss that hath fallen, hath chiefly come by this means, that the Dunkirkers Ships being of late years exercised in continual Hostility with the Hollanders, are built of a Mold as fit for flight as for fight; and so they pilfer upon our Coasts, and creep to the Shore, and escape from the King's Ships: but to prevent that inconvenience for the time to come, there is already order taken for the building some Ships, which shall be of the like Mold, light and quick of Sail, to meet with the adverse party in their own way. And for the Pirates of Sallie, and those parts, he saith, it is but very lately that they found the way unto our Coasts, where, by surprise, they might easily do hurt; but there hath been that provision taken by his Majesty, not without the care of the Duke, both by force and treaty to repress them for the time to come, as will give good satisfaction. All which he is assured will clearly appear upon proof.

To this Article the Duke maketh this Answer, That about September last, this Ship called the St. Peter (amongst divers others) was seized on as a lawful Prize by his Majesties Ships and brought into Plimouth, as Ships laden by the Subjects of the King of Spain; in the end of October, or beginning of November, they were all brought to the Tower of London, all of them were there unladen; but the Peter, and the bulk of her Goods was not stirred, because they were challenged by the Subjects of the French King; and there did not then appear so much proof against her, and the Goods in her, as against the rest. About the middle of November, Allegations were generally put in against them all in the Admiralty Court, to justify the seizure; and all the Pretendants were called in upon these proceedings, divers of the Ships and Goods were condemned, and divers were released in a legal course; and others of them were in suspence till full proof made. The eight and twentieth day of December, complaint was made on the behalf of some French-men at the Council-board, concerning this Ship and others, when the King, by advice of his Council (his Majesty being present in Person) did order, That

That the Ship of Newhaven, called the Peter, and the Goods in her, and all such other Goods of the other Prizes, as should be found to appertain to his Majesties own Subjects, or to the Subjects of his good Brother the French King, or the States of the United Provinces, or any other Princes or States in Friendship or Alliance with his Majesty, should be delivered: But this was not absolute, as is supposed by the Charge, but was thus qualified, so as they were not fraudulently coloured; and it was referred to a judicial Proceeding.

According to this just and honourable Direction, the King's Advocate proceeded upon the general Allegations formerly put in the 26 of Jan. after there was a Sentence in the Admiralty, that the Peter should be discharged, and the King's Advocate not having then any knowledge of further proof, consented to it. But this was not a definitive Sentence, but a Sentence Interlocutory, as it is termed in that Court. Within few daies after, this Ship prepared her self to be gone, and was falling down the River: Then came new intelligence to the Lord Admiral, by the Lieutenant of the Tower, That all those Ships were laden by the Subjects of the King of Spain; that the Ambascador waisted them beyond the North Cape; that they were but coloured by Frenchmen; that there were Witnesses ready to make good this new Allegation: neither was it improbable to be so; for part of the Goods in that Ship have been confessed to be lawful Prize. This Ship being now fallen down the River, and being a Ship of the most value of all the rest, the Duke acquainted the King therewith, and by his Commandment made stay of the Ship, lest otherwise it would be too late; which the Duke, in the duty of his place of Admiral, as he believeth, ought to have done, without such command: And if he had not done so, he might worthily have been blamed for his negligence; and then instantly he sent for the Judge of the Admiralty, to be informed from him, how far the Sentence already past, did bind, and whether it might stand with Justice to make stay of her again, she being once discharged in such manner as before. The Judge answered, as he was advised, That it might justly be done, upon better proofs appearing: yet discreetly, in a matter of that moment, he took time to give a resolute Answer, that in the interim he might review the Acts which had passed. The next day, or very shortly after, the Judge came again to the Duke, and, upon advice, answered resolutely, That the Ship and Goods might justly be stayed, if the proofs fell out to be answerable to the Informations given; whereof, he said, he could not judge, till he had seen the Depositions. And according to this resolution of the Judge, did five other learned Advocates, besides the King's Advocate, concurr in opinion, being intreated by the Duke to advise thereof; so cautious was the Duke not to do any unjust Act. Then he acquainted the King again therewith, & his Majesty commanded him to re-seize this Ship, and to proceed judicially to the proofs; and the Duke often required the King's Advocate to hasten the Examination of the Witnesses; and many Witnesses were produced and examined, in pursuance of this new Information. But the French Merchants, impatient of any delay, complain'd again to the Council-board, where it was order'd, not barely, That the Ship and Goods should be presently, but should be delivered upon security; and upon security she had been then delivered, if it had been given; and security was once offered, but afterwards retracted: And when all the Witnesses produced were examined, and published, the King's Advocate having duly considered of them, forthwith acquainted the Duke, that the Proofs came too short for the Peter; and thereupon the Duke instantly gave order for her final discharge, and she was discharged by order of the Court accordingly.

By which true Narration of the Fact, and all the proceedings, the Duke hopeth it will sufficiently appear, that he hath not done any thing herein, on his part, which was not justifiable, and grounded upon deliberate and well-advised Councils and Warrant. But for the doing of this to his own lucre and advantage, he utterly denieth it: for he saith, that there was nothing removed out of the Ship, but some Moneys, and some small Boxes of Stones of very mean value, and other small portable things lying above the Deck, easily to be imbezelled: And whatsoever was taken out of the Ship, was first publicly shewed to his Majesty himself, and thence committed to the custody of Gabriel Marsh, in the Article mentioned, by Inventory, then and still Marshal of the Admiralty, by him to be safely kept; whereof the Money was employed for the King's immediate service, and by his direction, and the rest was left in safe keeping, and are all since delivered, and re-imbursed to the Owners, or pretended Owners thereof; and not a penny profit thereof, or thereby, hath come to the Duke himself, as shall be made good by proof: And whereas the suggestion hath been made, That this accident was the cause of the Imbargo of the Ships and Goods of our Merchants trading in France, he saith, That it is utterly mistaken; for divers of their Goods were embargued before this happened; and if, in truth, the French had therein received that, as either they pretend, or is pretended from them; yet the embarguing of the Goods of the English upon that occasion, was utterly illegal and unwarrantable; for by the mutual Articles between the two Kings, they ought not to have righted themselves before Legal complaint, and a denial on our part, and then by way of Reprisal, and not by Imbargo. So that the Duke doth humbly leave it to the consideration of your Lordships, whether the harm which hath happened to your Merchants, hath not been more occasioned by the unseasonable justifying of the actions of the French, which animated them to increase their injuries, than by an act, either of the Duke, or any other.

To this Article, which consisteth of two main Points, the one of the extorting of ten thousand pounds unjustly, and without Right, from the East-India Company; the other, admitting the Duke had a Right, as Lord Admiral, the compassing it by undue waies, and abusing the Parliament, to work his private ends; the Duke giveth this Answer, wherein a plain Narration of the Fact, he hopeth, will clear the matters objected; and in this he shall lay down no more, than will fully appear upon proof.

About the end of Michaelmas Term, 1623. the Duke had Information given him, by a principal Member of their own Company, that the Company had made a great advantage to themselves in the Seas of East-India, and other parts of Asia and Africa, by rich Prizes gotten there forcibly from the Portugals, and others; and a large part thereof was due to his Majesty, and to the Duke as Admiral, by the Law; for which, nei-

Whether of them had any satisfaction. Whereupon Anno directions were given for a legal prosecution in 1626. the Court of Admiralty, and to proceed in such matters as should be held fittest by the advice of Council.

In the Months of December and January, in that year, divers Witnesses were examined in the Admiralty, according to the ordinary course of that Court, to instruct and furnish Informative Processes in this behalf. After the Tenth of March, 1623. an Action was commenced in the Court in the joynt names of his Majesty and the Admiral, grounded upon the former proceeding; this was prosecuted by the King's Advocate, and the demand at first was fifteen thousand pounds. The Action being thus framed in both their names, by advice of Council, because it was doubted in the judgment of the Council, whether it did more properly belong to the one, or the other, or to both; and the form of Entering that Action being most usual in that Court, on the Eight and twentieth of April, 1624. the Judicial Agreement and Sentence passed thereupon in the Admiralty Court, wherein the Companies consent, and their own offer, plainly appeareth; so that for the second part of the Right, it were very hard to conclude, that the Duke had no right, contrary to the Companies own consent, and the Sentence of the Court, grounded on their Agreement; unless it shall fully appear, that the Company was by strong hand enforced thereto, and so the Money extorted.

Therefore to clear that scruple, That as the matter of the Suit was just, or at least so probable, as the Company willingly desired it for their peace, so the manner was as just and honourable; your Lordships are humbly entreated to observe these few true Circumstances. The Suit in the Admiralty began divers Months before the first mention of it in Parliament; and some Months before the beginning of it in that Parliament, it was prosecuted in a legal course, and upon such grounds as will yet be maintained to be just. The Composition made by the Company, was not moved by the Duke, but his late Majesty, on the behalf of himself, and of the Duke, treated with divers Members of the Company about it, and the Duke himself treated not at all with them. The Company, without any compulsion at all, agreed to the Composition; not that they were willing to give so much, if they might have escaped for nothing, but that they were willing to give so much, rather than to hazard the success of the Suit: and upon this Composition, concluded by his Majesty, the Company desired and obtained a Pardon for all that was objected against them. The Motion in Parliament about the stay of the Companies Ships then ready prepared and furnished, was not out of any respect, to draw them the rather to give the Composition, but really out of an apprehension, that there might be need of their strength for the defence of the Realm at home; and if so, then all private respects must give way to the publick Interest. These Ships, upon the importunity of the Merchants, and reasons given by them, were suffered nevertheless to fall down to Tilbury, by his late Majesty's direction, to speed their Voyage the better, whilst they might be accommodated for this Voyage, without prejudice to the publick safety, they were discharged when there was an Accommodation propounded and allowed, which was, That they should forthwith prepare other Ships for the home Service, whilst those went over with their Voyage; which they accordingly did. That the Motion made in the Commons House, was without the Duke's knowledge or privity. That when there was a rumour, that the Duke had drawn on the Composition by staying of the Ships which were then gone, the Duke was so much offended thereat, that he would have had the former communication to have broken off, and have proceeded in a legal course, and he sent to the Company to that purpose; but the Company gave him satisfaction, that they had raised no such rumour, nor would, nor could avow any such thing, and entreated him to rest satisfied with such publick acts to the contrary. That after this, their Ships being gone, themselves careful of their future security, solicited the dispatch of the Composition, consulted with Counsel about the Instruments which passed about it, and were at the charge thereof, and the Money was paid long after the Sentence, and the Sentence given after the Ships were gone, and no security given at all for the Money, but the Sentence; and when this Money was paid to the Duke, the whole sum (but two hundred pounds thereof only) was borrowed by the King, and employed by his own Officers, for the service of the Navy. If these things do, upon proof, appear to your Lordships, as is assured they will, he humbly submitteth it to your judgments, how far verbal Affirmations or Informations extrajudicial, shall move your judgments when judicial acts, and those things which were acted and executed, prove the contrary.

To this Article, which is so mixt with Actions of great Princes, as that he dareth not in his duty publish every passage thereof, he cannot for the present make so particular an Answer as he may, hath, and will do to the rest of his Charge.
 But he giveth this general Answer, the truth whereof he humbly prayeth may rather appear to your Lordships by the Proofs, than by any discourse of his; which, in Reason of State, will happily be conceived fit to be more privately handled.

That these Ships were lent to the French King at first, without the Duke's privity: That when he knew it, he did that which belonged to an Admiral of England, and a true English man: And he doth deny, that by menace, or Compulsion, or by any other indirect or undue practise or means, he, by himself, or by any others, did deliver those Ships, or any of them, into the hands of the French, as is objected against him: That the Error which did happen, by what direction soever it were, was not in the intention any waies injurious, or dishonourable, or dangerous to this State, or prejudicial to any private man, interesed in any of those Ships; nor could have given any such offence at all, if those Promises had been observed by others, which were professed and really performed by his Majesty and his Subjects on their parts.

which is objected against him by this Seventh Article, he hath been an earnest and humble Suitor to his Majesty, to give him leave in his Proof, to unfold the whole Truth and Secret of that great Action, and hath obtained his Majesty's gracious leave therein, and accordingly doth intend to make such open and clear Proof thereof, that he nothing doubeth, but the same, when it shall appear, will not only clear him from blame, but be a Testimony of his care and faithfulness in serving the State.

To this Article wherewith he is taxed, to have practised for the employment of the Ships against Rochel, he answereth,

That

Car. 2.

The Charge touching his putting the Ships into the hands of the French.

Since the Duke's Answer delivered into the House, he hath himself openly declared to their Lordships, That for the better clearing of his Honor and Fidelity to the State, in that part of his Charge

Anno 1626. The Charge touching his practice of the employment of them against Ro-
 That he was so far from practising or consenting, that the said Ships should so be employed, that he shall make it clearly to appear, that when it was discovered, that they would be employed against those of the Religion, the Protestation of the French King being otherwise, and their pretence being, That there was a Peace concluded with those of the Religion, and that the French King would use those Ships against Genoa; which had been an action of no ill consequence to the affairs of Christendom: The Duke did by all fit and honourable means endeavour to divert that course of their employment against Rochel. And he doth truly and boldly affirm, That his endeavours under the Royal care of his most Excellent Majesty, have been a great part of the means to preserve the Town of Rochel, as the Proofs, when they shall be produced, will make appear. And when his Majesty did find, that, beyond his intention, and contrary to the faithful promises of the French, they were so mis-employed, he found himself bound in honour to intercede with the most Christian King, his good Brother, for the Peace of that Town, and of the Religion, lest his Majesties Honour might otherwise suffer: Which intercession his Majesty did so sedulously, and so successfully pursue, that the Town, and the Religion there, do and will acknowledge the fruits thereof.

And whereas it is further objected against him, That when in so unfaithful a manner he had delivered those Ships into the power of a Foreign State, to the danger of the Religion, and scandal and dishonour of our Nation, which he utterly denieth to be so: That to mask his ill intentions, in cunning and cautelous manner, he abused the Parliament at Oxford, in affirming before the Committees of both Houses, That the said Ships were not, nor should be so used or employed; he saith, (under the favour of those who so understood his words) That he did not then use those words, which are expressed in the Charge to have been spoken by him; but there being then a jealousy of the mis-employing of those Ships, the Duke having no knowledge thereof, and knowing well what the promises of the French King were, but was not then seasonable to be published; he hoping they would not have varied from what was promised, did say, That the event would show it was no undertaking for them, but a Declaration of that in general terms which should really have been performed, and which his Majesty had just cause to expect from them.

The Charge touching the compelling the Lord R. to buy Ho-
 That the Duke did compel the Lord R. to buy his Title of Honour, he utterly denieth; and he is very confident, that the Lord R. himself will not affirm it, or any thing tending that way: Neither can he, nor any man else, truly say so. But the said Duke is able to prove, that the Lord R. was before willing to have given a much greater sum, but could not then obtain it; and he did now obtain it by sollicitation of his own Agents.

The Charge touching his selling of Places of Judica-
 For the selling of Places of Judicature by the Duke, which are specially instanced in the Charge, he answereth; That he received not, or had a penny of either of those sums to his own use; but the truth is, the Lord M. was made Lord Treasurer by his late Majesty, without contracting for any thing for it; and after that he had the Office conferred upon him, his late Majesty moved him to lend him Twenty thousand pounds;

upon promise of repayment at the end of a year; the Lord M. yielded it, so as he might have the Duke's word, that it should be repayed unto him accordingly: The Duke gave his word for it; the Lord M. relied upon it, and delivered the said sum to the hands of Mr. Porter, then attending upon the Duke, by the late King's appointment, to be disposed as his Majesty should direct. And according to the King's direction, that very money was fully paid out to others, and the Duke neither had, nor disposed of a penny thereof to his own use, as is suggested against him.

And afterwards when the Lord M. left that place; and his money was not repayed unto him, he urged the Duke upon his promise; whereupon the Duke being jealous of his Honour, and to keep his word, not having money to pay him, he assured Lands of his own to the Lord M. for his security. But when the Duke was in Spain, the Lord M. obtained a promise from his late Majesty of some Lands in Fee-farm, to such a value, as he accepted of the same in satisfaction of the said money, which were afterwards passed unto him; and at the Duke's return, the Lord M. delivered back unto him the security of the Duke's Lands, which had been given unto him as aforesaid.

As for the Six thousand pounds supposed to have been received by the Duke, for procuring to the Earl of M. the Mastership of the Wards, he utterly denieth it; but afterwards he heard, that the Earl of M. did disburse Six thousand pounds about that time; and his late Majesty bestowed the same upon Sir Henry Mildway his Servant, without the Duke's privity, and he had it, and enjoyed it, and no penny thereof came to the said Duke, or to his use.

To this Article the Duke answereth, That it is true, that his late Majesty, out of his Royal favour unto him, having honoured the Duke himself with many Titles and Dignities of his bounty; and as a greater argument of his Princely Grace, did also think fit to honour those, who were in equal degree of Blood with him, and also to enoble their Mother, who was the Stock that bare them.

The Title of Countess of Buckingham, bestowed upon the Mother, was not without president; and she hath nothing from the Crown but a Title of Honour, which dieth with her.

The Titles bestowed on the Viscount P. the Duke's elder Brother, were conferred upon him who was a Servant of the Bed-chamber to his now Majesty, then Prince, by his Highness's means; the Earl of A. was of his late Majesties Bed-chamber, and the Honours and Lands conferred on him, was done when the Duke was in Spain.

The Earl of D. hath the Honours mentioned in the Charge, but he hath not a foot of Land which came from the Crown, or the King's Grant.

But if it were true, that the Duke had procured Honours for those who are so near and dear unto him, the Law of Nature, and the King's Royal favour, he hopeth, will plead for his excuse; and he rather believeth he were worthy to be condemned in the opinion of all generous minds, if being in such favour with his Master, he had minded only his own advancement, and had neglected those who were nearest unto him.

Anno 1626. To this Article his Answer is, That he doth humbly, and with all thankfulness, acknowledge the bountiful hand of his late Majesty unto him; for which he oweth so much to the memory of that deceased King, his most excellent Majesty that now is, and their Posterity, that he shall willingly render back whatsoever he hath received, together with his life, to do them service. But for the immense Sums and Values which are suggested to have been given unto him, he saith, There are very great mistakings in the calculations which are in the Schedules in this Article mentioned; unto which the Duke will apply particular Answers in another Schedule, which shall express the truth of every particular, as near as he can collect the same, to which he referreth himself; whereby it shall appear, what a great disproportion there is between Conjectures and Certainities: And those gifts which he hath received, though he confesseth that they exceed his Merit, yet they exceed not Presidents of former times. But whatsoever it is he hath, or hath had, he utterly denieth that he obtained the same, or any part thereof, by any undue sollicitation or practise, or did unduly obtain any release of any sums of money he received; but he having, at several times, and upon several occasions, disposed of divers sums of the moneys of his late Majesty, and of his Majesty that now is, by their private directions, he hath Releases thereof for his discharge, which was honourable and gracious in their Majesties, who granted the same for their Servants indemnity; and he hopeth was not unfit for him to accept of, lest, in future times, he or his might be charged therewith, when he could not be able to give so clear an account thereof, as he hopeth he shall now well be able to do.

The Charge touching his transcendent presumption in giving Physick to the King.

To this Charge, which is set forth in such an expression of words as might argue an extraordinary guiltiness in the Duke, who by such infinite bounds of duty and thankfulness was obliged to be tender of the life and health of his most dread and dear Sovereign and Master, he maketh this clear and true Answer; That he did neither apply nor procure the Plaister or Posset-drink, in the Charge termed to be a Potion unto his late Majesty, nor was present when the same was first taken or applied: But the truth is this; That his Majesty being sick of an Ague, took notice of the Duke's recovery of an Ague not long before, and asked him how he had recovered, and what he found did him most good? The Duke gave him a particular Answer thereto, and that one who was the Earl of Warwick's Physician had ministred a plaister and posset-drink to him; and the chief thing that did him good was a Vomit, which he wished the King had taken in the beginning of his sickness. The King was very desirous to have that plaister and posset-drink sent for, but the Duke delayed it, whereupon the King impatiently asked, Whether it were sent for or not? and finding by the Duke's speeches he had not sent for it, his late Majesty sent for John Baker the Duke's servant, and with his own Mouth commanded him to go for it: Whereupon the Duke besought his Majesty not to make use of it but by the advice of his own Physicians, nor until it shall be tried of James Palmer of his Bed-chamber, who was then sick of an Ague, and upon two Children in the Town. Which the King said he would do: And in this resolution the Duke left his Majesty, and went to London, and in the mean time in his absence the plaister and posset drink was brought and applied by his late Majesties own command. At the Duke's return, his Majesty was in taking of the posset-drink, and the King then commanded the Duke to give it him, which he did in the Presence of some of the King's Physicians, they then no ways seeming to dislike it, the same Drink being first tasted of by some of them, and divers others in the King's Bed-chamber. And he thinketh this was the second time the King took it. Afterwards when the King grew somewhat worse than before, the Duke heard a rumor as if his Physick had done the King hurt, and that the Duke had ministred that Physick to him without advice. The Duke acquainted the King therewith, to whom the King with much discontent answered thus, They are worse than Devils that say it. So far from the truth it was, which now notwithstanding (as it seemeth) is taken up again by some, and with much confidence affirmed. And here the Duke humbly prayeth all your Lordships, not only to consider the truth of this Answer, but also to commiserate the sad thought which this Article had revived in him.

This being the plain, clear and evident truth of all those things which are contained and particularly expressed in his Charge, (the rest being in general requiring no Answer) He being well assured that he hath herein affirmed nothing which he shall not make good by proof in such way as your Lordships shall direct;

He humbly referreth it to the judgment of your Lordships, how full of danger and prejudice it is to give too ready an ear and too easie a belief unto reports or testimony without Oath, which are not of weight enough, to condemn any. He humbly acknowledgeth how easie it was for him in his younger years and unexperienced, to fall into thousands of errors in those ten years wherein he had the honour to serve so great and open-hearted a Sovereign and Master: But the fear of Almighty God, his sincerity in the true Religion established in the Church of England, (though accompanied with many weaknesses and imperfections, which he is not ashamed humbly and heartily to confess) his awfulness not willing to offend so good and gracious a Master, and his love and duty to his Countrey hath restrained him and preserved him (he hopeth) from running into heinous and high misdemeanors and crimes. But whatsoever upon examination and mature deliberation they shall appear to be, least in any thing unwittingly within the compass of so many years he shall have offended, he humbly prayeth your Lordships not only in those, but as to all the said misdemeanors, misprisions, offences and crimes wherewith he standeth charged before your Lordships to allow unto him the benefit of the free and general Pardon granted by his late Majesty in Parliament in the 21 year of his reign, out of which he is not excepted; and of the gracious pardon of his now Majesty granted to the said Duke, and vouchsafed in like manner to all his Subjects at the time of his most happy Inauguration and Coronation: Which said pardon under the Great Seal of England granted the said Duke, beareth date the tenth day of February now last past, and here is shewn forth unto your Lordships, on which he doth most humbly rely: And yet he hopeth your Lordships in your Justice and Honour, upon which with confidence he puts himself, will acquit him of and from those misdemeanors, offences, misprisions and crimes wherewith he hath been charged; And he hopeth, and will daily pray, that for the future he shall by God's grace so watch over his actions, both publick and private, that he shall not give any just offence to any.

The

Anno 1626. The Duke, after he had put in this Answer, moved the Lords that the Commons might expedite their Reply; and the Commons desire a Copy of his Answer.

The day after his Majesty wrote this Letter to the Speaker of the Commons.

The King's Letter to the Speaker touching speedy supply to his Majesty.

TRusty and Welbeloved, We greet you well. Our House of Commons cannot forget how often and how earnestly We have called upon them for the speeding of that Aid which they intended Us for our great and weighty Affairs, concerning the safety and honour of Us and our Kingdoms: And now the time being so far spent, that unless it be presently concluded, it can neither bring us Money nor Credit by the time which themselves have fixed, which is the last of this Month, and being further deferred, would be of little use, we being daily advertised from all Parts of the great preparations of the Enemy ready to assail Us; We hold it necessary by these Our Letters to give them Our last and final admonition, and to let them know that We shall account all further delays and excuses to be express denials. And therefore We will and require you to signify unto them, that we do expect that they forthwith bring in their Bill of Subsidy to be passed without delay or condition, so as it may fully pass the House by the end of the next week at the furthest: Which if they do not, it will force Us to take other resolutions. But let them know, if they finish this according to our desire, that we are resolved to let them sit together for the dispatch of their other affairs so long as the season will permit, and after their recess to bring them together again the next Winter. And if by their denial or delay, any thing of ill consequence shall fall out either at home or abroad, We call God and Man to witness that we have done our part to prevent it, by calling our People together to advise with Us, by opening the weight of our occasions unto them, and by requiring their timely help and assistance in these Actions whereupon we stand engaged by their own Councils. And we will and command you that this Letter be read publicly in the House.

A great Storm hapned in and about London, about this time St. Andrew's Church-yard Wall fell down into the Street, and many Coffins were expos'd to open view, the lids whereof being opened by some of the Rabble, the Corps of persons dead of the Plague the last year before, were exposed to view. And there was an odd and strange appearance on the Thames; you may take it in the Collector's own words, which yet signify but little more than what that Author might fancy: But 'tis usual with that sort of men to say and fancy what they please.

At the same instant of time there was a terrible Storm and strange Spectacle upon Thames by the turbulency of the Waters, and a Mist that arose out of the same, which appeared in a round Circle of a good bigness above the waters. The fierceness of the Storm bent it self towards York-house, (the then habitation of the Duke of Buckingham) beating against the stairs and wall thereof: And at last this round Circle (thus elevated all this while above the water) dispersed it self by degrees like the smook issuing out of a Furnace, and ascended higher and higher, till it quite vanished away, to the great Admiration of the beholders. This occasioned the more discourse among the Vulgar, in that Dr. Lamb appeared then upon Thames, to whose Art of Conjuring they attributed that which had hapned. The Parliament was then sitting, and this Spectacle was seen by many of the Members out of the Windows of the House. — Risum teneatur?

The Commons Petition to the King concerning Recusants.

To the King's most excellent Majesty,

YOUR Majesty's most obedient and loyal Subjects, the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, do with great comfort remember the many Testimonies which your Majesty hath given of your sincerity and zeal of the true Religion, established in this Kingdom, and in particular your gracious Answer to both Houses of Parliament at Oxford, upon their Petition concerning the Causes and Remedies of the Increase of Popery; That your Majesty thought fit, & would give order to remove from all places of Authority and Government, all such persons as are either Popish Recusants, or according to direction of former Acts of State justly to be suspected; which was then presented as a great and principal cause of that mischief. But not having received so full redress herein as may conduce to the peace of this Church and safety of this Regal State, They hold it their duty once more to resort to your Sacred Majesty, humbly to inform you, that upon examination they find the persons under-written to be either Recusants, Papists, or justly suspected according to the former Acts of State, who now do, or since the sitting of the Parliament did remain in places of Government and Authority and Trust in your several Counties of this your Realm of England and Dominion of Wales.

The Persons named were, and their Circumstances by some thus aggravated.

The Right Honourable, Francis Earl of Rutland, Lieutenant of the County of Lincoln, Rutland, Northampton, Nottingham, and a Commissioner of the Peace, and of Oyer and Terminer in the County of York, and Justice of Oyer from Trent Northwards. His Lordship is presented to be a Popish Recusant, and to have affronted all the Commissioners of the Peace within the North-Riding of Yorkshire, by sending a Licence under his Hand and Seal unto his Tenant Thomas Fisher, dwelling in his Lordship's Mannor of Helmsley, in the said North-Riding of the said County of York, to keep an Alehouse; soon after he was, by an Order made at the Quarter-Sessions, discharged from keeping an Alehouse, because he was a Popish convict Recusant, and to have procured a Popish School-master, namely, Roger Conyers, to teach Scholars within the said Mannor of Helmsley, that formerly had his Licence to teach Scholars taken from him, for teaching Scholars that were the Children of Popish Recusants, and because he suffered these Children to be absent themselves from the Church whilst they were his Scholars; for which the said Conyers was formerly complained of in Parliament.

The Right Honourable Vicount Dunbar, Deputy-Justice in Oyer to the Earl of Rutland, from Trent Northward, and a Commissioner of Sewers, and a Deputy Lieutenant within the East-Riding of Yorkshire; his Lordship is presented to be a Popish Recusant, and his Indictment removed into the Kings Bench, and his Wife, Mother, and the greater part of his Family are Popish Recusants, and some of them convicted.

Em. Lord Scroop, Lord President of his Majesties Council in the North, Lord Lieutenant of the County and City of York, & Com. Eborac. & Ville Kingston upon Hull, presented the last time, and continuing still to give suspicion of his ill-affection in Religion.

1. By never coming to the Cathedral Church upon those days, wherein former Presidents have been accustomed.

2. By never receiving the Sacrament upon Common days, as other Presidents were accustomed, but publickly departing out of the Church, with his Servants, upon those days, when the rest of the Council, Lord Mayor and Aldermen do receive.

3. By never, or very seldom, repairing to the Fasts, but often publickly riding abroad with his Hawks on those days.

4. By causing such as are known to be firm on those days in the Religion established, to be left out of Commission, which is instanced in Henry Alured Esq. by his Lordships procurement put out of the Commission of Sewers, or else from keeping them from executing their Places, whis is instanced in Dr. Hudson, Doctor in Divinity, to whom his Lordship hath refused to give the Oath, being appointed.

5. By putting divers other ill-affected persons in Commission of the Council of Oyer and Terminer, and of the Sewers, and in other places of Trust, contrary to his Majesties gracious Answer to the late Parliament.

6. In October last 1625. being certified of divers Spanish ships of War upon the Coasts of Scharborough, his Lordship went thither, and took with him the Lord Dunbar, Sir Thomas Metham, and William Alford, and lay at the house of the Lord Enry, whom he knew to be a Convict Recusant, and did notwithstanding refuse to disarm him, although he had received Letters from the Lords of the Council to that effect: and did likewise refuse to shew the Commissioners, who were to be employ'd for disarming of Popish Recusants, the original Letters of the Privy Council, or to deliver them any Copies as they desired, and as his Predecessors in that place were wont to do.

7. By giving Order to the Lord Dunbar, Sir William Weibham, and Sir William Alford, to view the Forts and Store of Munition in the Town of Kingsion upon Hull, who made one Kerton, a convict Recusant, and suspected to be a Priest, their Clerk in that service.

8. By denying to accept a Plea tendered according to the Law by Sir William Hilliard Defendant, against Isabel Simson Plaintiff, in an Action of Trover, that she was a convict Popish Recusant, and forcing him to pay Costs.

9. By the great increase of Recusants since his Lordships coming to that Government in January 1619. It appearing by the Records of the Sessions, that there are in the East-Riding only, One thousand six hundred and seventy more convicted than were before, which is conceived to be an effect of his favour and continuance towards them.

There being Letters directed to four Knights of that County to call the Ministers and other Officers before them, and to cause them to present all such such as absented themselves from the Church, and were Popishly affected, he was desired to present those within his Parish Church of Welford, which he accordingly did, but left out at the left one half, and being asked, Why he did so? he answered, That he was no Informer: And being asked of some particulars, Whether they came to the Church or not? his Answer was, They did not: and, Why then did he not present them? he said, They might be Anabaptists or Brownists, and would not present them, and this certified by three Members of the House.

4. He having a brother dwelling in Sudbury that was presented for not coming to the Church, he came to one of the Ministers, and told him, That he took it ill they presented his Brother; who answered, He did it not: but, if he had known of it, he would, whereupon he replied, He was glad he had a Brother of any Religion.

5. One of his Parish, named Fage, having intelligence, that there was one of the said Parish, that could inform of a private place, where Arms were in the Recusants House in the Parish, came to some of the Deputy Lieutenants in Commission for a Warrant to bring the same in form before them, to be examined concerning the same, and the said Fage delivered the Warrant to the Constable, he carried him before the said *M. John Warren, Captain of the Trained-band, one of his Sons suspected to be Popishly affected.

Wherefore they humbly beseech your Majesty not to suffer your loving Subjects to continue any longer discouraged by the apparent sense of that increase both in number and power, which by the favour and countenance of such like ill-affected Governours accreth to the Popish party; but that according to your own wisdom, goodness, and piety (whereof they rest assured) you will be graciously pleased to command that Answer of your Majesties to be effectually observed, and the parties above named, and all such others to be put out of such Commissions and Places of Authority wherein they now are in your Majesties Realm of England, contrary to the Acts and Laws of States in that behalf.

The Commons Answer to the Kings Letter by Mr. Speaker, Sir Heneage Finch, as followeth;

Most gracious and dread Sovereign,

According to that liberty of access, and liberty of speech which your Majesty and your Royal Progenitors have ever vouchsafed to your House of Commons, your Majesties most humble and loyal Subjects, the Commons now assembled in Parliament, have been suitors for this access to your Royal Throne.

And out of their consideration of the nature, and of the weight and importance of the business, they have thought the attendance of the whole House, with their Speaker, not too solemn; and yet they have not thought fit barely to commit those words, which express their thoughts, to the trust of any man's speech, but are bold to present them in writing to your gracious hands, that they may not vanish, but be more lasting than the most powerful words of a more able Speaker like to be.

I have much to read, and shall therefore, as little as I can, weary your Majesty with Speeches.

This Parchment contains two things, the one by way of Declaration, to give your Majesty an account and humble satisfaction of their clear and sincere endeavours and intentions in your Majesties service; and the other, an humble Petition to your Majesty, for the removal of that great Person, the Duke of Buckingham, from access to your Royal presence.

For the first, They beseech your most excellent Majesty to believe, that no earthly thing is so dear and precious to them, as that your Majesty should retain them in your grace and good opinion; and it is grief to them, beyond my expression, that any misinformation, or misinterpretation, should at any time render their words or proceedings offensive to your Majesty.

It is not proper for any one to hear the Echo of a Voice, that hears not the Voice; and if Echo's be sometimes heard to double and redouble, the Echo of the Echo is still fainter, and sounds not louder.

I need not make the application; words misreported, though by an Echo, or but an Echo of an Echo, at a third or fourth hand, have oft a louder sound than the Voice it self, and may sound disloyalty, though the Voice had nothing undutiful or illoyal in it.

Such misinformations, they fear, have begot those interruptions and diversions, which have delayed the ripening and expediting of those great Counsels, which concern your Majesties important service, and have enforced this Declaration.

I pass from that to the Petition, in which my purpose is not to urge those Reasons, which your Majesty may hear expressed in their own words in the language of the people.

I am only directed to offer to your great wisdom and deep judgment, that this Petition of theirs is such, as may stand with your Majesties honour and justice to grant.

Your Majesty hath been pleased to give many Royal Testimonies and Arguments to the world, how good and gracious a Master you are; and that which the Queen of Sheba once said to the wisest King, may without flattery be said to your Majesty, Happy are those Servants which stand continually before you.

But the Relations by which your Majesty stands in a gracious aspect towards your People, do far transcend, and are more prevalent and binding, than any relation of a Master towards a Servant; and to hear and satisfy the just and necessary desires of your People, is more honourable, than any expression of grace to a Servant.

To be a Master of a Servant, is communicable to many of your Subjects; to be a King of People, is Regal, and incommunicable to Subjects.

Your Majesty is truly styled with that name, which the greatest Emperors, though they borrowed Names and Titles from those Countries, which they gained by Conquest, most delighted in, Pater Patrie. And desires of Children are preferred before those of Servants, and the Servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the Son abideth ever.

The Government of a King was truly termed by your Royal Father, A politick Marriage between him and his People; and I may safely say, There was never a better Union between a married Pair, than is between your Majesty and your People.

The Commons finding the King's intent to dissolve the Parliament, draw up a Remonstrance against against the Duke, and against the King's Right to Tonnage and Poundage, and ordered every Member to take a Copy of it.

The Lords petition the King not to dissolve the Parliament.

May it please your Excellent Majesty,

WE your faithful and loyal Subjects, the Peers of this Kingdom, having received this morning a Message from your Majesty, intimating an intention to dissolve this Parliament; remembering that we are your Majesty's Hereditary great Council of the Kingdom, do conceive, that we cannot deserve your Majesty's gracious opinion expressed in this Message unto us, nor discharge our duty to God, your Majesty, and our Country, if after expression of our great and universal sorrow, we did not humbly offer our loyal and faithful advice to continue this Parliament, by which those great and apparent dangers at home and abroad, signified unto us by your Majesty's command, may be prevented, and your Majesty made happy in the duty and love of your people, which we hold the greatest safety and treasure of a King; for the effecting whereof, our humble and faithful endeavour shall never be wanting.

The Lords sent to present their Petition, were the Vicount Mandeville, Earl of Manchester, Lord President of his Majesty's Council, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Carlisle, and the Earl of Holland. The King returned Answer, That his Resolution was to hear no motion for that purpose: And immediately caused a Commission to pass under the Great Seal to that purpose, ut sequitur.

EDMONDS.

And the Parliament was dissolved accordingly.

The intended Remonstrance of the Commons was as followeth.

Most gracious Sovereign,

WE your loyal and faithful Subjects, the Commons assembled by your Majesty's most Royal Authority in this present Parliament, having with all dutiful affection, from the time of our first meeting, earnestly endeavoured to proceed speedily in those Affairs, that might best and soonest conduce to our dispatch of the intended supply of your Majesty's great designs, to the enlargement of your support, and to the enabling of our selves, and them whom we represent, to the full and timely performance of the same; have notwithstanding, by reason of divers informations, interruptions, and other preventions, been hitherto so retarded in the prosecution of these Affairs, that we now thought it a necessary part of our most humble duties thus to declare, both those interruptions and preventions, with the true original and continual cause of them; as also our most earnest devotion of the Parliamentary service of your most excellent Majesty, and of the

Anno the careful safety and defence of your Dom-1626. nions, Crown and Dignity: And we most humbly therefore beseech your most excellent Majesty, to be graciously pleased here to cast your eye on some particulars, that have relation, as well to your first Parliament, as to this; out of which we cannot doubt, but that your great goodness may receive an ample satisfaction touching our most loyal and faithful intentions.

In the first Parliament of the first year of your Majesties most happy Reign over us, the Commons then assembled, after they had cheerfully presented to your Majesty, as the first-fruits of their affections, two entire Subsidies, were exceedingly pressed by the means of the Duke of Buckingham, and for his own ends, as we conceive, to enlarge that Supply: which when he conceived would not be there effected, he procured, for the same ends, from your Majesty, an Adjournment of the Parliament to the City of Oxford; where the Commons then taking into just consideration the great mischiefs which this Kingdom variously hath suffered, and that chiefly by reason of the exorbitant power, and frequent misdoings of the said Duke, were entering into a Parliamentary course of examinations of those mischiefs, power, and misdoings: But no sooner was there any mention made of his name to this purpose, but that he, fearing lest his actions might so have been too much laid open to the view of your most excellent Majesty, and to the just Censure that might then have followed, presently, through his misinformations to your Majesty, of the intentions of your said Commons (as we have just cause to believe) procured a dissolution of the said Parliament:
 And afterwards also in the same year, through divers misreports made to your Majesty in his behalf, touching some Members of the said Commons, who had more particularly drawn his name into just question, and justly professed themselves averse to his ends there, procured (as we cannot but conceive) the said Members to be made the Sheriffs of several Counties for this year that followed, to the end that they might have all been precluded from being chosen Members of the present Parliament, lest they should again have there questioned him; and by the like practice also (as we are persuaded) he procured, soon after the said dissolution, another Member of the said House, because he had justly professed himself against his ends, to be sent as a Secretary of your Majesties last Fleet, hereby indeed to punish him, by such drawing him from his practice of the Law, which was his profession, under colour of an honourable Employment.

It pleased your Majesty afterwards, in February last, to call this present Parliament, wherein though none of those whom the said Duke had so procured to be made high Sheriffs, have late as Members; yet we finding in our selves the like affection, first to the Service of your Majesty, and next to the good of the Commonwealth, we took into serious consideration several Propositions, how for the safety and happiness of your Majesties Kingdoms and Allies, we might enlarge your Supports, and add to the military Strength without charge to the poorer sort of your Subjects, and give a larger Supply to your Majesty for your instant and present occasions, than hath ever yet but once been given in Parliament: Whereupon for the enabling of our selves, and those whom we represent, we conceive it first necessary to search into the Causes of those mischiefs, which this your Kingdom suffereth, and divers of the Grievances that over-burden your Subjects; without doing of which, we could neither be faithful to your Majesty, nor to the Countrey that doth trust and employ us, as your Royal Father also, of blessed memory, admonished the House of Commons in the fourth Session of his first Parliament. In this consideration we found, that the most pressing and comprehensive mischief and Grievance that he suffered, was fundamentally settled in the vast power and enormous actions of the said Duke, being such, that by reason of his plurality of Offices, all gotten by ambition, and some for money, expressly against the Laws of your Realm; his breach of Trust, in not guarding the Seas; his high injustice in the Admiralty; his Extortion; his delibering over the Ships of this Kingdom into the hands of a Foreign Prince; his procuring of the compulsory buying of Honour for his own gain; his unexampled exhausting of the Treasures and Revenues of the Kingdom; his transcendent presumption of that unhappy applying of Physick to your Royal Father of blessed memory, few days before his death, and some other his Offences carefully and maturely examined by us, we made a Parliamentary Charge of the same matters and offences against him, to the Lords, by your Majesty assembled in Parliament, there expecting some Remedy by a speedy proceeding against him: But, may it please your most excellent Majesty, not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the same Charge, we were diversly interrupted and diverted by Messages procured through misinformation from your Majesty, which with most humble duty & reverence we did ever receive; whence it first fell out, that so not only much time was spent amongst us, before the same Charge was perfected, but also within two days next after the same Charge was transmitted by us to the Lords: Upon untrue and malicious misinformations, privately and against the privilege of Parliaments, given to your Majesty of certain words supposed to have been spoken by Sir Dudley Diggs and Sir John Elliot Knights, two of the Members of our House, in their service of transmitting of the said Charge, both of them having been specially employed in the Chairs of Committees with us, about the examination of the said matters and offences, they were both by your Majesties command committed to close imprisonment in the Tower of London, and their Lodgings presently searched, and their Papers there found, presently taken away; by reason whereof not only our known privileges of Parliament were infringed, but we our selves, that upon full hope of speedy course of Justice against the said Duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to the dispatch of the Supply, and other Services to your Majesty, were wholly, as the course and privilege of Parliament binds us,

us, diverted for divers days, to the taking only into consideration some courses for the ratifying and preservation of the Priviledges so infringed; and we think it our duties, most gracious Sovereign, most rightly to inform hereby your most excellent Majesty, of the course held in the Commitment of the Members: For whereas by your Majesties Warrant to your Messengers for the arresting of them, you were pleased to command, that they should repair to their Lodgings, and there take them; your Majesties principal Secretary, the Lord Conway, gave the said Messengers (as they affirmed) an express command, contrary to the said Warrant, that they should not go to their Lodgings, but to the House of Commons, and there take them; and if they found them not there, they should stay until they were come into the House, and apprehend them wheresoever else they should find them. Which, besides that it is contrary to your Majesties command, as an apparent Testimony of some mischievous intention there had against the whole House of Commons, and against the service intended to your Majesty. All which, with the several interruptions that preceded it, and the misinformation that hath caused all of them, we cannot doubt but that they were wrought and procured by the Duke, to his own behoof, and for his advantage, especially because the said interruptions have, through misinformation, come amongst us, only at such times wherein we have had the matters and offences charged against him in agitation; but your Majesty, out of your great goodness and justice, being afterwards informed truly of our Priviledge; and the demerit of the Cause that concerned our said two Members, graciously commanded the delivery of them out of the Tower, for which we render unto your Majesty most humble thanks; and were then again, by reason of our hopes of the dispatch of proceedings with the Lords, upon our Charge against him the said Duke, in a cheerful purpose to go on with the matter of Supply, and other Services to your Majesty, when again these hopes failed in us, by reason of some new exorbitances now lately shewed in the exercise of his so great power and ambition; for by such his power and ambition, notwithstanding our Declaration against him for his so great plurality of Offices, he also procured to himself, by the solicitation of his Agents, and of such as depended upon him, the Office of Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; whereas the same University having two Burgesses in Parliament, did, by the same Burgesses, a few weeks before, consent with us in the Charge against him for his ambition for procuring such a plurality of Offices; such was his ambition to live for it, such was his power to make them give it him, contrary to what themselves had agreed in Parliament with all the Commons of England. And he procured also the same Office, by the special labours and endeavours (as we are informed) of a Factionary party, who adhereth to that dangerous Innovation of Religion, published in the seditious Writings of one Richard Mountague Clerk; of whom it is thence also, and heretofore, upon other reasons, it hath been conceived, that the said Duke is, and long hath been, an Abettor and Protector.

Car. 2.

These actions of the said Duke have thus amongst us hindered the service of your Majesty, by reason both of the interruptions that have so necessarily accompanied them, and of the prevention of our cheerfulness, which otherwise had long since been most effectually shewed in us, that having nothing else in our cares, next to our duty to God, but the loyal service of your Majesty, the safety of your Kingdom, and the subsistence of our selves and those whom we represent, for the continuance of that service and safety, which we cannot hope for: and we beseech your most excellent Majesty, graciously to receive this our humble and free protestation, That we cannot hope for it, so long as we thus suffer under the pressures of the power and ambition of the said Duke, and the divers and false Informations so given to your Majesty on his behalf, and for his advantage; especially when we observe also, that in such his greatness, he preventeth the giving of true Information to your Majesty, in all things that may any ways reflect to his own misdoings, to shew unto your Majesty the true state of your Subjects and Kingdoms, otherwise than as it may be represented for his own ends. And to that purpose also hath he procured so many persons depending on him, either by alliance or advancement, to places of eminency near your Sacred Person. Through his misinformations of that kind also, and power, we have seen, to our great grief, both in the time of your Majesties Royal Father of blessed memory, and of your Majesty, divers Officers of the Kingdom, so often by him displaced and altered, that within these few years past, since the beginning of his greatness, more such displacings and alterations have, by his means, happened, than in many years before them: Neither was there in the time of your Royal Father of blessed memory, any such course held, before it was by the practice of the said Duke thus induced. And since that time, divers Officers of the Crown, not only in this your Kingdom of England, but also in Ireland, as they have been made friends or adverse to the said Duke, have been either so commended; or misrepresented by him to his Sovereign; and by his procurement so placed, or displaced, that he hath always herein, as much as in him lay, made his own ends and advantage the measure of the good or ill of your Majesties Kingdoms.

But now at length, may it please your most excellent Majesty, we have received from the Lords a Copy of the said Duke's Answer to our Charge transmitted against him; whereunto we shall presently in such sort reply, according to the Laws of Parliament; that unless his power and practice again undermine our proceedings, we do not doubt but we shall upon the same have Judgment against him.

In the times also (most gracious Sovereign) of these interruptions which came amongst us; by reason of the procurement of two of our Members committed, a gracious Message was formerly received from your Majesty; wherein you had been pleased to let us know, That if you had not a timely Supply, your Majesty would betake your self to new Counsels; which we cannot doubt were intended by your most excellent Majesty to be such as stood with Justice and the Laws of this Realm. But these words, New Counsels, were remembred in a Speech made amongst us by one of your Majesties Privy Council, and lately a Member of us, who in the same Speech told us, He had often thought of those words, New Counsels; That in his consideration of them, he remembred that there were such kinds of Parliaments anciently among other Nations, as are now in England; That in England he saw the Countrey people live in happyness and plenty, but in those other Nations he saw them poor both in persons and habit, or to that effect: which state and condition happened (as he said) to them, where such New Counsels were taken, as that the use of their Parliaments ended.

This intimation, may it please your Majesty, was such, as also gave us just cause to fear there were some ill Ministers near your Majesty, that in behalf of the said Duke, and together with him, who is so strangely powerful, were so much against the Parliamentary course of this Kingdom, as they might perhaps advise your most excellent Majesty such New Counsels as these, that fell under the memory and consideration of that Privy Counsellor. And one especial reason among others hath increased that fear among us, for that whereas the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, which determined upon the death of your most Royal Father, our late Sovereign, and were never payable to any of your Majesties Ancestors, but only by a special Act of Parliament, and ought not to be levied without such an Act; yet ever since the beginning of your Majesties happy Reign over us, the said Subsidies have been levied by some of your Majesties Ministers, as if they were still due; although also one Parliament hath been since then begun, and dissolved by procurement of the said Duke, as is before shewed, wherein no Act passed for the same Subsidies. Which example is so much against the constant use of former times, and the known Right and Liberty of your Subjects, that it is an apparent effect of some new Counsels given against the ancient settled course of Government of this your Majesties Kingdom, and chiefly against the Right of your Commons, as if there might be any Subsidy, Tax, or Aid levied upon them, without their consent in Parliament, or contrary to the settled Laws of this Kingdom. But if any such do so ill an office, as by the misrepresentation of the state and right of your Majesties loyal Subjects, advise any such new Counsels as the levying any Aid, Tax, or Subsidy among your People, contrary to the settled Laws of your Kingdom, we cannot, most gracious Sovereign, but esteem them that shall so advise, not only as Dividers, but Pests to their King and Commonwealth, (as all such were to both Houses of Parliament expressly styled by your most Royal Father) but also Capital Enemies, as well to your Crown and Dignity, as to the Commonwealth. And we shall for our parts in Parliament shew as occasion shall require, and be ready to declare their offences of this kind, such as that may be rewarded with the highest punishment, as your Laws inflict on any offenders.

These, and some of these things, amongst many other, (most gracious Sovereign) are those which have so much prevented a right understanding between your Majesty and us, and which have possessed the hearts of your People and Loyal Commons with unspeakable sorrow and grief, finding apparently all humble and hearty endeavours misinterpreted, hindered, and now at last almost frustrated utterly, by the interposition of the excessive and abusive power of one man; against whom we have just cause to protest, not only in regard of the particulars wherewith he hath been charged, which Parliamentary way we are enforced to insist upon, as matters which lie in our notice and proof, but also because we apprehend him of so unbridled Ambition, and so averse to the good and tranquillity of the Church and State, that we verily believe him to be an Enemy to both: And therefore, unless we would betray our own duties to your Majesty, and those from whom we are trusted, we cannot but express our infinite grief, that he should have so great power and interest in your Princely affections, and under your Majesty wholly, in a manner, to engross to himself the Administration of your Affairs of the Kingdom, which by that means is drawn into a condition most miserable and hazardous.

Give us then leave, most dear Sovereign, in the name of all the Commons of this your Kingdom, prostrate at the feet of your Sacred Majesty, most humbly to beseech you, even for the Honour of Almighty God, whose Religion is directly undermined by the practice of that Party whom this Duke supports; for your Honour, which will be much advanced in relieving of your People in this their great and general grievance; for the honour, safety, and welfare of your Kingdom, which by this means is threatened with almost unavoidable dangers; And for the love which your Majesty, as a good and loving Father, bears unto your good people, to whom we profess, in the presence of Almighty God (the searcher of all hearts) you are as highly esteemed and beloved, as ever any of your Predecessors were, that you would be graciously pleased to remove this Person from access to your Sacred Presence, and that you would not ballance this one man with all these things, and with the Affairs of the Christian World, which do all suffer so far, as they have relation to this Kingdom, chiefly by his means. For we protest to your Majesty, and to the whole World, That until this great person be removed from intermeddling with the great Affairs of State, we are out of hope of any good success; and do fear, that any money we shall or can give, will, through his mis-employment, be turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of this your Kingdom, than otherwise, as by lamentable experience we have found, in those large Supplies we have formerly and lately given.

But no sooner shall we receive redress and relief in this, (which, of all others, is our most insupportable grievance) but we shall forthwith proceed to accomplish your Majesties own desire, for Supply, and likewise with all cheerfulness apply our selves to the perfecting of divers other great things, such as we think no one Parliament in one Age

1626. Age can parallel, tending to the stability, wealth, and strength; and honour of this your Kingdom, and the support of your friends and Allies abroad: And we doubt not but, through God's blessing, as you are the best, so shall you ever be the best beloved, and greatest Monarch that ever sat on the Royal Throne of this famous Kingdom.

The King's Declaration of the causes of assembling and dissolving the two last Parliaments.

The King's most excellent Majesty, since his happy access to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, having by his Royal Authority summoned and assembled two several Parliaments; the first whereof was in August last, by Adjournment held at Oxford, and there dissolved; and the other begun in February last, and continued until the fifteenth day of this present Month of June, and then, to the unspeakable grief of himself, and (as he believeth) of all his good and well-affecting Subjects, dissolved also: Although he well knoweth, that the Calling, Adjourning, Proroguing, and Dissolving of Parliaments, being his great Council of the Kingdom, do peculiarly belong unto himself by an undoubted Prerogative inseparably united to his Imperial Crown; of which, as of his other Royal Actions, he is not bound to give an account to any but to God only, whose immediate Lieutenant and Vicegerent he is in these Realms and Dominions, by the Divine Providence committed to his charge and government: Yet forasmuch as by the assistance of the Almighty, his purpose is so to order himself, and all his actions, especially in the great and publick Actions of State, concerning the weal of his Kingdoms, as may justifie themselves, not only to his own Conscience, and to his own People, but to the whole World; his Majesty hath thought it fit and necessary, as the affairs now stand both at home and abroad, to make a true, plain, and clear Declaration of the Causes which moved his Majesty to assemble, and after enforced him to dissolve these Parliaments; that so the mouth of malice it self may be stopped, and the doubts and fears of his own good Subjects at home, and of his friends and Allies abroad, may be satisfied, and the deserved blame of so unhappy accidents may justly light upon the Authors thereof.

When his Majesty, by the death of his dear and Royal Father of ever blessed memory, first came to the Crown, he found himself engaged in a War with a potent Enemy; not undertaken rashly, nor without just and honourable grounds, but enforced for the necessary defence of himself and his Dominions, for the support of his friends and Allies, for the redeeming of the ancient Honour of this Nation, for the recovering of the Patrimony of his dear Sister, her Consort, and their Children, injuriously, and under colour of Treaties and Friendship, taken from them, and for the maintenance of the true Religion, and invited thereunto, and encouraged therein by the humble advice of both the Houses of Parliament, and by their large promises and protestations to his late Majesty, to give him full and real assistance in those Enterprises, which were of so great importance to this Realm, and to the general peace and safety of all his friends and Allies: But when his Majesty entered into a view of his Treasure, he found how ill provided he was to proceed effectually with so great an Action, unless he might be assured to receive such Supplies from his loving Subjects, as might enable him to manage the same.

Hereupon his Majesty, being willing to tread in the steps of his Royal Progenitors, for the making of good and wholesome Laws for the better government of his People, for the right understanding of their true Grievances, and for the supply of moneys to be employed for those publick services, he did resolve to summon a Parliament with all convenient speed he might; and finding a former Parliament already called in the life of his Father, he was desirous, for the speedier dispatch of his weighty affairs, and gaining of time, to have continued the same, without any alteration of the Members thereof, had he not been advised to the contrary by his Judges and Council at Law; for that it had been subject to question in Law, which he desired to avoid. But as soon as possible he could, he summoned a new Parliament, which he did with much confidence and assurance of the love of his People, that those (who had, not long before, with some importunity, won his Father to break off his former Treaties with Spain, and to effect it, had used the mediation of his now Majesty, being then Prince, and a Member of the Parliament, and had promised in Parliament their utmost assistance, for the enabling of his late Majesty to undergo the War, which they then foresaw might follow) would assuredly have performed it to his now Majesty, and would not have suffered him, in his first Enterprise of so great an expectation, to have run the least hazard through their defaults.

This Parliament (after some Adjournment, by reason of his Majesty's unavoidable occasions interposing) being assembled on the eighteenth day of June, it is true, that his Commons in Parliament taking into their due and serious consideration the manifold occasions, which, at his first entry, did press his Majesty, and his most important affairs, which, both at home and abroad, were then in action, did, with great readiness and alacrity, as a pledge of their most bounden duty and thankfulness, and as the first fruits of the most dutiful affections of his loving and loyal Subjects, devoted to his service, present his Majesty with the free and cheerful gift of two entire Subsidies: which their gift, and much more the freeness and heartiness expressed in the giving thereof, his Majesty did thankfully and lovingly accept: But when he had more narrowly entered into the consideration of his great affairs, wherein he was embarked, and from which he could not, without much dishonour and disadvantage withdraw his hand, he found that this sum of money was much short of that, which of necessity must be presently expended, for the setting forward of those great Actions, which, by advice of his Council, he had undertaken, and were that Summer to be pursued. This his Majesty imparted to his Commons House of Parliament; but before the same could receive that debate and due consideration which was fit, the fearful Visitation of the Plague in and about the Cities of London and Westminster, where the Lords and the principal Gentlemen of his whole Kingdom were, for the time of this their service, lodged and abiding, did so much increase, that his Majesty, without extream peril to the lives of his good Subjects, which were dear unto him, could not continue the Parliament any longer in that place.

His Majesty therefore, on the eleventh day of July then following, Adjourned the Parliament from Westminster, until the first day of August then following, at the City of Oxford. And his Highness was so careful to accommodate his Lords and Commons there, that as he made choice of that place, being then the least of all others from the danger of that grievous Sickness, so he there fitted the Parliament men with all things convenient for their entertainment: And his Majesty himself, being in his own heart sincere and free from all ends upon his people, which the Searcher of hearts best knoweth, he little expected, that any misconstruction of his actions would have been made, as he there found. But when the Parliament had been a while assembled, and his Majesties affairs opened unto them, and a further Supply desired, as necessity required, he found them so slow, and so full of delays and diversions in their Resolutions, that before any thing could be determined, the fearful Contagion daily increased, and was dispersed into all parts of this Kingdom, and came home even to their doors where they assembled. His Majesty therefore rather preferred the safety of his people from that present and visible danger, than the providing for that which was more remote, but no less dangerous to the State of this Kingdom, and of the affairs of that part of Christendom which then were, and yet are in friendship and alliance with his Majesty. And thereupon his Majesty, not being then able to discern when it might please God to stay his hand of Visitation, nor what place might be more secure than other, at a time convenient for their re-assembling, his Majesty dissolved that Parliament.

That Parliament being now ended, his Majesty did not therewith cast off his Royal care of his great and important affairs; but by the advice of his Privy Council, and of his Council of War, he continued his preparations, and former resolutions; and therein not only expended those moneys, which by the two Subsidies aforesaid were given unto him for his own private use, whereof he had too much occasion, as he found the state of his Exchequer at his first entrance, but added much more of his own, as by his credit, and the credit of some of his Servants, he was able to compass the same. At last, by much disadvantage, by the retarding of provisions and uncertainty of the means, his Navy was prepared and set to Sea, and the Designs unto which they were sent and specially directed, were so probable, and so well advised, that had they not miscarried in the execution, his Majesty is well assured they would have given good satisfaction, not only to his own people, but to all the world, that they were not lightly or unadvisedly undertaken and pursued. But it pleased God, who is the Lord of Hosts, and unto whose providence and good pleasure his Majesty doth, and shall submit himself, and all his endeavours, not to give that success which was desired: And yet were those attempts not altogether so fruitless as the envy of the times hath apprehended, the Enemy receiving thereby no small loss, nor our party no little advantage. And 'twould much avail to further his Majesties great affairs, and the peace of Christendom, which ought to be the true end of all hostility, were these first beginnings, which are most subject to miscarry, well seconded and pursued, as his Majesty intended, and as, in the judgment of all men, conseruant in his actions of this nature, were fit not to have been neglected.

These things being thus acted, and God of his infinite goodness, beyond expectation, asswaging the rage of the Pestilence, and, in a manner, of a sudden restoring health and safety to the Cities of London and Westminster, which are the fittest places for the resort of his Majesty, his Lords and Commons to meet in Parliament; his Majesty in the depth of Winter, no sooner desisted the probability of a safe assembling of his people, and in his Princely wisdom and providence foresaw, that if the opportunity of Seasons should be omitted, preparations both defensive and offensive could not be made in such sort as was requisite for their common safety, but he advised and resolved of the summoning of a new Parliament, where he might freely communicate the necessities of the State, and the counsel and advice of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, who were the representative Body of the whole Kingdom, and the great Counsel of the Realm, might proceed in these enterprises, and be enabled thereunto, which concern the common good, safety and honour both of Prince and People; and accordingly the sixth of February last, a new Parliament was begun. At the first meeting, his Majesty did forbear to press them with any thing which might have the least appearance of his own interest, but recommended unto them the care of making good Laws, which are the ordinary subject for a Parliament.

His Majesty believing that they could not have suffered many days, much less many weeks, to have passed by, before the apprehension and care of the common safety of this Kingdom, and the true Religion, professed and maintained therein, and of our Friends and Allies, who must prosper, or suffer with us, would have led them to a due and timely consideration of all the means which might best conduce to those ends; which the Lords of the Higher House, by a Committee of that House, did timely and seasonably consider of, and invited the Commons to a Conference concerning that great business. At which Conference there were opened unto them, the great occasions which pressed his Majesty; which making no impression with them, his Majesty did, first, by Message, and after by Letters, put the House of Commons in mind of that which was most necessary, the defence of the Kingdom, and due and timely preparations for the same.

The

Anno 1626. The Commons House after this, upon the 27th of March last, with one unanimous consent at first, agreed to give unto his Majesty the entire Subsidies, and the Fifteens, for a present Supply unto him; and upon the 26 of April after, upon second cogitations, they added a fourth Subsidy, and ordered the days of payment for them all, whereof the first should have been on the last day of this present June. Upon this, the King of Denmark, and other Princes and States, being engaged with his Majesty in this common Cause, his Majesty fitted his occasions according to the times which were appointed for the payment of those Subsidies and Fifteens, and halted on the Lords Committee, and his Council of War, to perfect their resolutions for the ordering and settling of his designs; which they accordingly did, and brought them to that maturity, that they found no impediment to a final conclusion of their Counsels, but want of money to put things into action. His Majesty hereupon, who had with much patience expected the real performance of that which the Commons had promised, finding the time of the year passing away, and having intelligence not only from his own Ministers and Subjects in foreign parts, but from all parts of Christendom, and of the great and powerful preparations of the King of Spain, and that his design was upon this Kingdom, or the Kingdom of Ireland, or both, (and it is hard to determine which of them would be of worst consequence) he acquainted the House of Commons therewith, and laid open unto them truly and clearly, how the state of things then stood, and yet stand, and at several times, and upon several occasions reiterated the same: But that House being abused by the violent and ill advised passions of a few Members of the House, for private and personal ends, ill beseming publick persons, trusted by their Countrey, as then they were, not only neglected, but wilfully refused to hearken to all the gentle admonitions which his Majesty could give them, and neither did nor would intend any thing, but the prosecution of one of the Peers of this Realm, and that in such a disordered manner, as being set at their own instance into a legal way, wherein the proofs on either part would have ruled the cause, which his Majesty allowed, they were not therewith contented, but in their intemperate passions, and desires to seek for Errors in another, fell into a greater Error themselves, and not only neglected to give satisfaction to his Majesty in several cases which happened concerning his Regality, but wholly forgot their engagements to his Majesty for the publick defence of the Realm: Whereupon his Majesty wrote the forementioned Letter to the Speaker, dated the Ninth day of June, 1626.

Notwithstanding which Letter read in the House, being a clear and gracious Manifest of his Majesties Resolutions, they never so much as admitted one Reading to the Bill of Subsidies, but instead thereof, they prepared and voted a Remonstrance or Declaration, which they intended to present to his Majesty, containing (though palliated with glossing terms) as well many dishonourable aspersions upon his Majesty, and upon the sacred memory of his deceased Father, as also dilatory excuses for their not proceeding with the Subsidies, adding thereto also coloured conditions, crossing thereby his Majesties direction; which his Majesty understanding and esteeming (as he had cause) to be a denial of the promised Supply, and finding that no admonitions could move, no reasons or persuasions could prevail, when the time was so far spent, that they had put an impossibility upon themselves to perform their promises, which they esteemed all gracious Messages unto them to be but interruptions: His Majesty, upon mature advisement, discerning that all further patience would prove fruitless, on the fifteenth day of this present Month he hath dissolved this unhappy Parliament: the acting whereof, as it was to his Majesty an unexpressible grief, so the memory thereof doth renew the hearty sorrow, which all his good and well-affected Subjects will compassionate with him.

These passages his Majesty hath at the more length, and with the true circumstances thereof, expressed and published to the world, lest that which hath been unfortunate in it self, through the malice of the Author of so great a mischief, and the malevolent report of such as are ill-affected to this State, or the true Religion here professed, or the fears or jealousies of friends and dutiful Subjects, might be made more unfortunate in the consequences of it, which may be of worse effect than at the first can be well apprehended; and his Majesty, being best privy to the integrity of his own heart, for the constant maintaining of the sincerity and unity of the true Religion professed in the Church of England, and to free it from the open Contagion of Popery, and secret infection of Schism, of both which, by his publick Acts and Actions, he hath given good testimony; and with a single heart, as in the presence of God, who can best judge thereof, purposeth resolutely and constantly to proceed in the due execution of either; and observing the subtilty of the adverse party, he cannot but believe that the hand of Joab hath been in this disaster, that the common Incendiaries of Christendom have subtilly and secretly insinuated those things, which unhappily (and, as his Majesty hopeth, beyond the intentions of the Actors) have caused these diversions and distractions: and notwithstanding, his most excellent Majesty, for the comfort of his good and well-affected Subjects, in whose loves he doth repose himself with confidence, and esteemeth it as his greatest riches; for the assuring of his friends and Allies, with whom, by Gods assistance, he will not break in the substance of what he hath undertaken; for the discouraging of his Adversaries, and the Adversaries of his Cause, and of his Dominions, and Religion, hath put on this resolution, which he doth hereby publish to all the World, That as God hath made him King of this great People, and large Dominions, famous in former Ages both by Land and Sea, and trusted him to be a Father and Protector both of their Persons and Fortunes, and a Defender of the Faith, and true Religion; so he will go on cheerfully and constantly in the defence thereof (and notwithstanding so many difficulties and discouragements) will take his expose the Persons of the People committed to his charge to the unsatiable desires of the King of Spain, who hath long thirsted after the Universal Monarchy, nor their Consciences to the poke of the Pope of Rome: And that at home he will take that care to redress the just grievances of his good Subjects, as shall be every way fit for a good King.

And in the mean time his Majesty doth publish this to all his loving Subjects, that they may know what to think with truth, and speak with duty, of his Majesties actions and proceedings in these two last dissolved Parliaments.

Given at his Majesties Palace at Whitehall this Thirteenth day of June, in the second year of his Majesties Reign of Great Bri- tain, France and Ireland.

Presently after the King takes notice of the Commons intended Remonstrance by Proclamation; in which Remonstrance are many passages and unhandsome reflections on their Prince's Honour, and of the Honour of his Father King James; but the main end of it was to inodiate the Duke of Buckingham with the People, if not to detract from their Prince, who commands all Copies and Notes thereof to be burnt upon pain of his Majesties indignation, &c. Together with this there was put out another Proclamation, forbidding the preaching or disputing of any the Arminian Controversies Pro or Con; for both Parties made the Pulpit the Campus Martius wherein these Prizes were played, each upbraiding and stigmatizing the other with odious names of Heresies long since extinct, though the Collector is pleased to infer,
 That the Effects of this Proclamation, how equally soever intended, became only the stopping of the Puritans mouths, and an uncontrolled liberty to the Tongues and Pens of the Arminian Party; which yet is not so, for that several of that Party were censured in the University of Oxon therefore.

Afterwards an Information was preferr'd in the Star-chamber against the Duke for applying the Plaister to King James, as is mentioned in the last Article of his Charge, but it came not to a hearing; and his Majesty having a regard to his Revenue, prohibits all Suits to be made to him for any thing prohibited in the Book of Bounty, and causeth by order of the Privy Council, all Customs as formerly to be paid, they being in all times a principal branch of the Revenue of the Crown:
 Moreover that all Forfeitures arising from Recu-sancy, be also taken to support the growing Charge of the King, and a Commission was hereupon granted to the most Reverend Father in God, Toby Archbishop of York, Sir John Savile Knight, Sir
George Manners, Sir Henry Slingsby, Sir William
Ellis Knights, and to divers other Knights and Gentlemen, and therein recites,

That his Majesty hath received credible Information of the great loss and dam-mages which the King's Subjects, living in Maritime Towns, especially in the Northern parts, do suffer by depredations, attempts and assaults at Sea from foreign Enemies, whereby Trade from those parts is interrupted, and the City of London much en-damaged for want of Coals and other Commodities, unusually transported thither from Newcastle upon Tyne: For redress of which evil, his Majesty doth think fit to appropriate and convert all such Debts, sums of Money, Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures of all Recusants inhabiting in the Counties of York, Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, Lancaster, Nottingham, Derby, Stafford, and Chester, which at any time have grown due since the Tenth year of King James, and are not yet satisfied, or which hereafter shall grow due by reason of any Law or Statute against Recusants, to be employed for the maintenance, provision, arming, manning, victualling, and furnishing of six able Ships of War for guarding and defending the Coast of this Realm, from the furthest North-East point of the Sea, unto the mouth of the River of Thames. His Majesty further expressing in the said Commission, That his Subjects who are Owners of Coal-pits, the Oast-men of Newcastle upon Tyne, owners of Ships, and Merchants, Burers and Sellers of Newcastle Coals, have been and are willing to contribute and pay for every Chaldron for the uses aforesaid. Wherefore his Majesty upon the considerations beforementioned, doth by his said Commission give power unto the said Commissioners, or any four or more of them, to treat and make Composition and Agreement with the said Recusants, inhabiting within the said Counties, for Leases of all their Mannors, Lands, Tenements, &c.

 within those Counties for any term of years, not exceeding One and forty years; and for all Forfeitures due since the Tenth year of King James for their Recusancy, in not going to Church to hear Divine Service, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, under such Condition and Immunities, as they or any four of them shall see meet and convenient, according to such Instructions as his Majesty hath or shall give to that purpose; his Majesty rather desiring their Conversion than Destruction. And such Leases his Majesty doth declare, made to the said Recu-sants themselves, or to any persons for their use, shall be good and effectual, any Law or Statute to the contrary notwithstanding.

By the said Commission Sir John Savile was appointed Receiver of all such sums of Money as shall be paid upon these Leases; and Mr. Alex- ander Davison of the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne, Merchant-Adventurer, was appointed to receive out of the voluntary and freewill Contribution of the Owners, Buyers, and Sellers of Coals, the Six pence per Chaldron of Coals. In pursuance of this Commission, the Recusants are thought to have made their Composition upon very easie terms, which was afterwards complained of in Parliament.

A Proclamation also was issued forth for the Fee-farming of his Majesties Tenants; and the Nobility wrote to lend his Majesty liberally and cheerfully for the Defence of the Realm and conservation of the Peace thereof. And of the City of London was demanded 100000*l.* by way of Loan: they excuse themselves as being not able to do it, though the Times and Trading was then very good. And further, for the preservation of the Seas and Trading, according to former Precedents, a certain number of Ships were imposed upon the Port Towns, as Twenty upon London,
 and

Anno 1626. and upon other places accordingly, which they endeavour but in vain (for former Precedents were produced) to excuse. And likewise a Benevolence was proposed, by way of Privy Seal, for his Majesties supply: And that Gods blessing might attend him, a Fast was likewise commanded to be observed through the Kingdom for the diverting of Gods Judgments threatening the Kingdom and Government. And for prevention of any Invasion, there were granted Commissions of Array to the Lieutenants of the several Counties, for the disciplining and arraying the Subjects, that they might be able and fit to serve their Prince and Countrey upon occasion, as well as to repress all Insurrections at home, if any happened. And a Command was issued to all Inhabitants of the Sea-Port Towns, who had withdrawn themselves with their Families into the Inland places, to return. And divers of the King's Men of War were sent into the Elbe to prevent the furnishing of Spain or Flanders from thence with any Naval preparations; and afterwards the Sound also was blocked up.

The King of Denmark's Declaration why he takes up Arms against the Emperor.

At this time the King of Denmark declares against the Emperour for the Palsgrave, as followeth;

INASMUCH as the Elector Palatine, by the procurement of the King of Great Britain, and him the King of Denmark, had offered the Submission to his Imperial Majesty, and to crave pardon; and thereupon was in hopes to have his Patrimony, with the Dignities of his Ancestors, restored: Yet notwithstanding, the Emperour did still commit great spoils and acts of Hostility in his Countrey, giving no regard to the said Submission, and had much damnified the Lower Saxony, by the forces which he had brought thither under Tilly.

Whereupon (he says) the Princes of the Lower Saxony have desired the aid and assistance of him the King of Denmark, to settle the Peace and Liberty of Germany, who was resolved to take up Arms, and with whom he was resolved to join, having the like assurance from the King of Great Britain, who had deeply engaged to assist in this War, for the restitution of the Elector Palatine.

Therefore the King of Denmark declares, That seeing all Prayers, Mediations, and Accessions cannot prevail with his Imperial Majesty, he will endeavour to procure a Peace and Settlement by force, which he should have been glad would have been obtained unto him upon fair terms of Treaty.

Divers Towns were taken in the beginning by that King; but the fatal 27th of August at Lutzen determines the Controversie, where Tilly gains the Victory, having pursued the Dane in his Retreat, takes his Train of Artillery, 22 pieces of Canon, most of his great Commanders being slain or taken.

The overthrow of his Uncle of Denmark puts our King upon consultation (for that he had engaged mostly on the account of the Palsgrave) how to assist him with men and money: at last a Commission for Loan was pitch'd upon, being the most speedy, easie, and convenient means for raising the moneys according to the Rates fixed by the last Parliament, his promising in the word of a

Prince, the repayment of every penny without any charge; and that all the moneys should be expended upon the Publick Service, that Posterity might reap the benefit of it. The Instructions given to the Commissioners were,

First, That they should themselves, for a good example to others, lend unto his Majesty the several sums of money required of them, testifying it by their names, with their own hands, That when they shall in his Majesties name require others to lend, they may discern the said Commissioners forwardness.

Secondly, To take for their guide those Rates, at which men were assessed in the Book of the last Subsidy, and to require the Loan of so much money, as the entire rate and value comes to, at which they are rated and set; as (namely) he that is set an hundred pounds in Goods, to lend a hundred Marks; and he that is set an hundred pounds in Land, to lend a hundred pounds in money; and so per rata for a greater or lesser sum.

Thirdly, To use all possible endeavours to cause every man willingly and chearfully to lend, opening unto them the necessity and unavoidableness of this course, the Honour and Reputation of the Nation, the true Religion and common safety of Prince and People, of our Friends and Allies engaged in the common Cause; that there is no time now of disputing, but of acting.

Fourthly, That they appoint the days of payment to be within fourteen days, and perswade such as shall be able, to pay it at one entire payment, the better to accommodate his Majesties occasion; otherwise to accept of the one half at fourteen days, and the other to be paid before the Twentieth of December now next coming.

Fifthly, That they treat apart with every one of those that are to lend, and not in the presence or hearing of any other, unless they see cause to the contrary. And if any shall refuse to lend, and shall make delays or excuses, and persist in their obstinacy, that they examine such persons upon Oath, whether they have been dealt withal to deny or refuse to lend, or make an excuse for not lending? Who hath dealt so with him, and what speeches or perswasions he or they have used to him, tending to that purpose? And that they shall also charge every such person in his Majesties name, upon his Allegiance, not to disclose to any other what his Answer was.

Sixthly, That they shew their discretion and affections, by making choice of such to begin with, who are likely to give the best examples; and when they have a competent number of Hands to the Roll or List of the Leaders, that they shew the same to others to lead them in like manner.

Seventhly, That they endeavour to discover, whether any publickly, or underhand, be workers or perswaders of others to dissent from, or dislike of this course, or hinder the good disposition of others. And that, as much as they may, they hinder all discourse about it, and certify to the Privy Council in writing the names, qualities, and dwelling places of all such refractory persons with all speed, and especially if they shall discover any Combination or Confederacy against these proceedings.

Eighthly, That they let all men know whom it may concern, that his Majesty is well pleased, upon lending these Sums required, to remit all that which by Letters, in his name, was desired upon the late Benevolence for Free-grant; and whatever hath been already paid upon that account, shall be accepted for part of this Loan; and and if it exceed the Sum desired, that the overplus shall be repaid without Fee or Charge; so likewise for Privy Seals, if any have been already paid: But if not, that the agreeing of the Loan of the Sum requiring, be excused of the payment of the Privy Seal,

Ninthly, That they admit of no Suit to be made, or Reasons to be given for the abating of any Sum, the time and instant occasion not admitting any such dispute, which would but disturb and protract the Sheriff.

Lastly, The Commissioners were required and commanded, upon their Faith and Allegiance to his Majesty, to keep secret to themselves, and not impart or disclose these Instructions to others.

And in regard that some Soldiers were returned from Cadiz, and their pay not ready, they were quartered in the Countreys till money were raised to discharge them; and they committing (as is usual) some outrages in the Countreys, they were tried by Martial Law. Of these disorders great complaints are made by some persons, reputed Patriots in subsequent Parliaments.

The Lords to advance the Loan are commanded to repair into the Countrey, with a List of the Names of the Nobility, Judges, &c. who had subscribed; but Sir Randolph Crew, Lord Chief Justice, shewing no good disposition thereto, lost his place, and into it was put Nicholas Hide. About this time a Complaint was made against the Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, for favouring the Nonconformists. The Informations were as followeth:

That Dr. Sibthorp being desired to stay at Leicester this year, as Commissary for the High Commission there, the Countrey being much overspread with Puritanism, (so Nonconformity was then called) Sir John Lamb and the said Doctor did inform the Bishop of Lincoln, then at Bugden, what factious Puritans or Nonconformists there were in the County, who would not come up to the Table to receive the Communion kneeling; and that there were unlawful Fasts and Meetings kept in the County; and one Fast that held from Nine in the Forenoon till Eight at Night; and that Collections for Moneys were made without Authority, upon pretence for the Palatinate: And therefore they desired leave from the Bishop to proceed against those Puritans, ex officio. The said Bishop replied, He would not meddle against the Puritans, for his part he expected not another Bishoprick; they might complain of them, if they would, to the Council Table; for he was under a Cloud already, and he had the Duke of Buckingham for his Enemy; and he would not draw the Puritans upon him, for he was sure they would carry all things at last: Besides, he said, the King in the first year of his Reign had given Answer to a Petition of the Lower House, in favour of the Puritans.

Meaning the Petition against Recusants at Oxford.

Puritans described by Sir John Lamb.

It appeared also, by the Information of others who were present at the Conference at Bugden, That Sir John Lamb and Dr. Sibthorp did, notwithstanding the Bishops averiness, again press the Bishop to proceed against the Puritans in Leicestershire: the Bishop asked them then what manner of people they were, and of what condition? For his part, he knew of none. To which Sir John Lamb replied (Dr. Sibthorp being present) That they seem to the World to be such as would not swear, Whore, nor Drink; but yet would Lie, Cozen, and Deceive: That they would frequently hear two Sermons a day, and repeat the same again too; and afterwards pray, and sometimes fast all day long. Then the Bishop asked, Whether those places, where those Puritans were, did lend money freely upon the Collection of the Loan? To which Sir John Lamb and Dr. Sibthorp replied, That they did generally resolve to lend freely: Then said the Bishop, No man of discretion can say, that that place is a place of Puritans: For my part (said the Bishop) I am not satisfied to give way to proceedings against them. At which Dr. Sibthorp was much discontented, and said, He was troubled to see that the Church is no better regarded.

These Informations being transmitted to the Council Table, were ordered to be sealed up, and committed to the Custody of Mr. Trumbal, one of the Clerks of the Council; nevertheless, the Bishop of Lincoln used such means, as he got a Copy of them.

The King had now 6000 Foot in the Service of the United Netherlands (under the Command of Sir Charles Morgan an experienced Soldier) against the growing power of Spinola: These Forces, together with 1300 Foot to be embarked from Hull, are ordered for the King of Denmark's assistance, and to be landed at Stode in Germany: But Money, the Sinews of War, came slowly in, and the Loan found the People generally very hidebound, some refusing to subscribe, though others offered to lay down the Money for them; others pleaded poverty; some whereof of the better Rank were called to appear before the Council; others of meaner Abilities were enrolled for Soldiers to serve the King in his Wars. About this time there was great offence taken at Dr. Sibthorp's Sermon about the Loan, Licensed by the Bishop of London.

His Text was, Rom. 13. 7. Render therefore to all their dues. Among other passages he had this, And seriously consider, how as Jeroboam took the opportunity and breach betwixt Rehoboam and his Subjects, to bring Idolatry into Israel; so the Papists lie at wait, if they could find a Rent between our Sovereign and his Subjects (which the Lord forbid) to reduce Superstition in England. I speak no more than what I have heard from themselves, whilst I have observed their forwardness to offer double, according to an Act of Parliament so providing; yea, to profess that they would depart with the half of their Goods. And how, or why can this forwardness be in them, but in hope to cast the imputation of backwardness upon us? And so to them (that which the Jesuite will not suffer them to be) loving and loyal Subjects.

In the said Sermon he saith, That the Prince, who is the Head, and makes his Court and Council, it is his duty to direct and make Laws. Ecclef. 8. 3 and 4. He doth whatsoever pleases him. Where the word of the King is, there is power, and who may say unto him, What doest thou?

And in another place, If Princes command any thing which Subjects may not perform, because it is against the Laws of God, or of Nature, or impossible: Yet Subjects are bound to undergo the punishment, without either resisting, or railing, or reviling, and so to yield a Passive Obedience where they cannot exhibit an Active one.

I know no other case, saith he, but one of those three, wherein a Subject may excuse himself with Passive Obedience; but in all other he is bound to Active Obedience.

But Dr. Manwaring was very extravagant in his Sermon, wherein he delivered,

‘That the King is not bound to observe the Laws of the Realm concerning the Subjects Rights

Rights and Liberties, but that his Royal Will and Command in imposing Loans and Taxes, without common consent in Parliament, doth oblige the Subjects Conscience upon pain of eternal damnation. That those who refused to pay this Loan, offended against the Law of God, and the King's Supream Authority, and became guilty of Impiety, Disloyalty, and Rebellion. And that the Authority of Parliament is not necessary for the raising of Aids and Subsidies; and that the slow proceedings of such great Assemblies, were not fitted for the Supply of the States urgent necessities, but would rather produce sundry impediments to the just designs of Princes.

The Papists, to gain themselves favour, were forward in the Loan, and the Nonconformists every whit as backward and as peevish. At last there hapned some distasts at Court in relation to the Queens family; for 'twas pretended that all her Servants, as well Ecclesiastick as others, were solely to be ordered by her self; and hereupon the Bishop and Ecclesiasticks order her Majesty for Penance, to go to Tiburn in devotion to pray there where some Romish Priests had been lately executed, which his Majesty (as he had good reason) very ill resented, and hereof certified his Brother of France, concerning some abuses of his patience, as well as abuses to his person, offered by Madam Sr. George, which he plainly told him he would no longer endure: Hereupon the French are dismissed, but all their wages payed them off, which the Ambassadour Carlston at that Court acquaints the King; but they took it in evil part, and the matter came to a breach, and the King was engaged against two mighty Princes at one time, and his Subjects complaining of imagined grievances, deny him their necessary assistance for the honour and safety of the Kingdom and its Allies.

The Duke of Orleanse being disoblged by the Cardinal Richlieu, who now had the administration of Affairs in France, was said to influence this breach, and that the Duke of Rhoan was to have joyned our King's Forces upon their landing, with 4000 Foot and 200 Horse. Sobiez and Monsieur St. Blanchard also do here implore the King's aid for the Protestants in France, &c.

The King of Great Britains Declaration concerning a War with France.

The King declares the Reasons of the War, That the House of Austria (conspiring the ruin of all those of the Reformed Religion throughout Christendom, as (he said) plainly appeared in the affairs of Germany) had such an influence upon the Council of France, as to prevail with them to obstruct the landing of Count Mansfield's Army, contrary to promise, with whom the French should have joyned Forces, for the relief of the Palatinate and the German Princes; which failure of performance in them, proved the ruin of that Army, the greatest part whereof perished, and was, by consequence, the loss of the whole Protestant Party in Germany.

His Majesty further declared, That having by his Mediation prevailed for a Peace between the French King and his Protestant Subjects, and engaged his word, That the Protestants should observe the Articles of Agreement: Nevertheless, the King of France, contrary to the said Articles blocked up their Towns, Garrisons, and Forts, and had committed many spoils upon them, when they had done nothing in violation of the Edict of Peace. And that the King of France had committed an example of great injustice in full Peace, to seize upon One hundred and twenty English Ships, with all their Merchandise and Artillery: For which Reasons, the King was resolved to send a powerful Army and Navy, to require satisfaction.

The Duke of Buckingham was made Admiral of this Fleet, and Commander in Chief of the Land Forces, and had a Commission, the purport whereof was;

That his Majesty hath taken into his Princely consideration, the distressed estate of his dear Brother in law, and only Sister, the Prince and Princess Elector Palatine, and their Children, and finding himself in Nature and Honour nearly bound unto them, at their request, and for their just relief, in recovering their rightful Patrimony taken from them, by the advice of his Privy Council, did, the last year, prepare and set out to Sea a Royal Fleet for Sea-service, for performance of such Services, as on his Brother in Law's and Sister's Behalf, his Majesty had designed. And for the doing of those designs, and for the honour and safety of his people, his Majesty hath now prepared a new Fleet, which he intends with all convenient expedition to set out, to be employed, as well by way of offence as defence, as shall be most behoveful for his said Brother in law, his Service; and therefore doth, by the said Commission, appoint the Duke of Buckingham to be Admiral, Captain General, and Governour of his said Royal Fleet, with such Soldiers and Land-forces as shall be conveyed therein, for the accomplishment of such execution and employment as they shall be design'd unto, according to such private Instructions as his Majesty shall give unto the said Duke. His Majesty, by the said Commission, giving to the Duke power to lead and conduct the said Navy and Army, and with them to fight against his said Brother in law and Sister's Enemies, or the Enemies of the Crown of England; and to advance to the Order of Knighthood such Persons employed in the Fleet, Forces, and Supplies, as by their valour, desert, and good service in this Expedition, shall be thought fit in his the said Duke's discretion to merit the same, and as to the Office of Captain General doth appertain.

On the Seven and twentieth of June, the Duke set sail from Portsmouth (in order to the relief of the Palatinate) with the Fleet, consisting of One hundred Sail of Ships, whereof Ten were of the King's Royal Navy, having aboard about Six or Seven thousand Land-soldiers; and towards the latter end of July he appeared with his Fleet before Rochel, who once much longed for their coming, but now shut their Gates at their appearance for their relief and succour upon their own intreaty.

Sobiez and Sir William Beecher landing, go to Rochel, and are at last admitted into the Town, and an Assembly was called, were they were acquainted from our King, That he had in compassion to their sufferings, and at their desire, sent them succours under his Admiral the Duke of Buckingham, and expected their conjunction with his Forces, else protested his Master, the King of Great Britain, was acquit of all Engagements to them. This prevails but little, they only thanking the King of Great Britain for his care of them; alledging they could do nothing without the consent of the rest of the Protestants with whom they were in Union, but indeed fearing the King of France his Army, then upon their March towards them; and he had a party in Town, who opposed the other of the Duke of Sobiez, who tarrying in Rochel, the Duke of Buckingham lands the Army, not as at the first they two agreed, on the life Anno 1627. of Oleron, where the Forts and Forces were but few and weak, but on the Isle of Rhee, which had a good Governour, Toras, and good strength in it, which at first endeavoured to hinder the Duke's landing, but in vain; for Sir John Burroughs with 1200 lands, and had the rest followed, and not stayed, but taken in the Fort La Prit, which they neglected, giving time thereby to Toras to victual the Cittadel of St. Martins, and to hearten his men, who, as well as the Court of France on the main Land, were astonished at the landing of the English; and therefore the King being at that time sick, they send to the Protestants, proffering them honourable terms, and to the Duke of Roban Offers of money, &c. The Duke of Buckingham marches up to the Cittadel, and publisheth his Manifesto, justifying his Master and Quarrel, declaring the main cause to be the Employing of the English Ships against the King of France his promise against Rochel; he approacheth to the Town of St. Martins, and takes it, but neglects to take in all Wells of fresh water, which Toras fortifies, and wherewith he subsisteth during the Siege. The Cittadel blocked up, the Duke being Master at Sea, hoped by Famine to win the place, which he had easily done, if upon landing he had immediately marched up to the Fort, and not suffered the Governor Toras in the interval to have got in Provisions.

Whilst these things were transacted in the Isle of Rhee, several Gentlemen were imprisoned in England for refusing the Loan out of the Countreys, of which such were,

Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Stratford, and George Ratcliff Esq; afterwards Sir George, Yorkshire Gentlemen, were sent for by Messengers, and removed out of the County of York into the County of Kent, and there secured by Confinement.

Sir Walter Earl, and Sir John Strangeways, who were Dorsetshire men, were secured in the County of Bedford.

Sir Thomas Grantham, and some others in the County of Lincoln, were removed and secured in the County of Dorset.

Sir John Hevingham, and others, of the County of Suffolk, were secured in the County of Somerset.

Richard Knightly Esq; and others, of the County of Northampton, were secured in the County of Southampton and Wiltshire.

Sir Nathaniel Barnardiston, of the County of Suffolk, and William Corston Esq; of the County of Cornwall, were secured in the County of Sussex.

Sir Harbottle Brimstone, in the County of Essex, and Sir Robert Points, were secured in Northamptonshire.

John Hampden Esq; and others, of the County of Bucks, were secured in Hampshire; and the like course was taken with the Gentry of other Counties, who refused the Loan.

And those who refused to submit to their Commitments, were to be made close Prisoners in other places; as the Fleet, Marshalsea, Gate-house, from the last whereof Sir John Elliot sends the following Petition to his Majesty.

To the King's most Excellent Majesty.

The humble Petition of Sir John Elliot Knight, Prisoner in the Gate-house, concerning the Loan, Sheweth,

That your poor Suppliant, affected with sorrow and unhappiness, through the long sense of your Majesty's displeasure, willing in every act of Duty and Obedience to satisfy your Majesty of the loyalty of his heart, than which, he hath nothing more desired, that there may not remain a jealousy in your Royal Breast, that stubbornness and will have been the motives of his forbearing to condescend to the said Loan, low at your Highnesses foot, with a sad, yet a faithful heart, for an Apology to your Clemency and Grace, he now presumes to offer up the Reasons that induced him, which he conceiveth necessity of his Duty to Religion, Justice, and your Majesty, did enforce.

The Rule of Justice he takes to be the Law, impartial Arbitrator of Government and Obedience, the support and strength of Majesty, the observation of that Justice by which Subjection is commanded. This and Religion (added to this Power not to be resisted) binds up the Conscience in an Obligation to that Rule, which (without open prejudice, and violence of these Duties) may not be impeached.

In this particular therefore of the Loan, being desirous to be satisfied how far the Obligation might extend, and resolving where he was left Master of his own, to become Servant to your Will, he had recourse unto the Laws, to be informed by them; which, in all humility, he submitteth to your most Sacred view, in the Collections following;

In the time of Edward the First, he finding that the Commons of that Age were so tender of their Liberties, as they feared even their own free Aids and Gifts might turn them to a Bondage and their Heirs. Wherefore it was desired and granted,

That for no business, such manner of Aids, Taxes, nor Prizes, should be taken, but by common assent of the Realm, and for the common profit thereof.

The like was in force by the same King, and by two other Laws again Enacted,

That no Tallage or Aid should be taken or levied, without the good will and assent of the Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons, Knights, Burgesses, and other Freemen of the Land.

And that prudent and magnanimous Prince, Edward the Third, led by the same wisdom, having granted,

That the greatest gift given in Parliament, for the Aid and Speed of his matchless undertaking against France, should not be had in example, nor fall to the prejudice of the Subject in time to come; did likewise add, in confirmation of that Right, That they should not from thenceforth be grieved to sustain any Charge or Aid, but by the common Assent, and that in Parliament.

And more particular upon this point, upon a Petition of the Commons afterwards wards in Parliament; it was established,

That the Loans which were granted to the King by divers persons be released; and that none henceforth be compelled to make such Loans against their Wills, because it is against Reason, and the Franchises of the Land, and Restitution be made to such as made such Loans.

And by another Act upon a new occasion, in the time of Richard the Third, it was ordained,

That the Subject in no wise be charged with any such Charge, Exaction, or Imposition called a Benevolence, nor such like Charge; and that such like Exactions be damned and annulled for ever.

Such were the opinions of these times, for all these Aids, Benevolences, Loans, and such like Charges, exacted from the Subject not in Parliament, which they held to be Grievances contrary to their Liberties, and illegal; and so pious were their Princes in Confirmation of their Liberties, as having secured them for the present by such frequent Laws and Statutes, they did likewise by them provide for their Posterity; and in some so strictly, that they bound the Observation with a Curse, as in that of 33 Edw. 1. As also under pain of Excommunication; as by the other of the five and twentieth of the same King, which was to be denounced against all those that violate or break them: which Act extends to us.

And these Reasons he presents to your Majesty, as the first Motive taken from the Law.

There are others also, which in his humble apprehension he conceived from the Action it self, which he likewise tenders to your most excellent Wisdom.

First, That the Carriage and Instructions, accompanied with the Authority of the Great Seal, imported a Constraint, such Requests to Subjects being tacite and implied Commands, and so preventing that readiness and love, which, in a free way, would have far exceeded those demands; whereas the wonted Aids given to your happy Ancestors were Ex spontanea voluntate, & charitate populi, whereby they made that conjunction of their Hearts at home, which wrought such power and reputation to their Acts abroad.

Whereas the firmest Obligation of that readiness and love, is the benignity of Princes, giving and preserving to their People just and decent Liberties, which, to this Kingdom, are derived from the Clemency and Wisdom of your Progenitors, to whom there is owing a Sacred Memory for them: he could not, as he feared, without pressure to these immunities, become an Actor in this Loan, which by imprisonment and restraint was urged, contrary to the Grants of the Great Charter, by so many glorious and victorious Kings so many times confirmed, being therein most confident of your Majesty, that never King that reigned over us, had, of his own benignity and goodness, a more pious disposition to preserve the just Liberties of his Subjects, than your Sacred Self.

Though we were well assured by your Majesties Royal Promise, whose words he holds as Oracles of Truth, that it should not become a President, during the happiness of your Reign (the long continuance whereof, is the daily subject of his Prayers) yet he conceived from thence a fear, that succeeding Ages might thereby take occasion for Posterity to strike at the propriety of their Goods, contrary to the piety and intention of your Majesty so graciously express.

And these being the true grounds and motives of his forbearance to the said Loan, shewing such inconveniences in Reason, and representing it an Act contradicting so many of your Laws, and most of them by the most prudent and happiest of our Princes granted, which could not, without presumption beyond pardon in your Suppliant, in taking to himself the Dispensation of those Laws, so piously Enacted by him, be violated or impeached.

In the fulness of all Submission and Obedience, as the Apology of his Loyalty and Duty, he lowly offers to your most Sacred Wisdom, for the satisfaction of your Majesty, most humbly praying your Majesty will be graciously pleased to take them into your Princely consideration, where when it shall appear (as he doubts not, but from hence it will to your day judgment) that no factious humour, nor disaffection led on by stubbornness & will, hath herein stirred or moved him, but the just Obligation of his Conscience, which binds him to the service of your Majesty, in the observance of your Laws; he is hopeful (presuming upon the piety and justice of your Majesty) that your Majesty, according to your innate Clemency and Goodness, will be pleased to bestow him to your favour, and his Liberty, and to afford him the benefit of those Laws, which, in all humility, he craves.

Notwithstanding he is still detained in that Prison, and Sir Peter Hayman is commanded into his Majesties Service in the Palatinate, which he performed, and afterwards returned safe into England.

Archbishop Abbot was in disfavour at Court for his refusal to license Dr. Sibthorp's Sermon; and a Commission was granted to the Bishops of London, Durham, Oxford, Rochester, and Bath and Wells, to execute Archiepiscopal Jurisdiction, as followeth;

CHARLES, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To the Right Reverend Father in God, George, Bishop of London; and to the Right Reverend Father in God, Our Trusty and Welbeloved Counsellor, Richard, Lord Bishop of Durham; and to the Right Reverend Father in God, John, Lord Bishop of Rochester; and John, Lord Bishop of Oxford; to the Right Reverend Father in God, Our Right Trusty and Welbeloved Counsellor, William Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, Greeting.

Whereas George, now Archbishop of Canterbury, in the right of the Archbishoprick, hath several and distinct Archiepiscopal, Episcopal, and other Spiritual and Ecclesiastical Powers and Jurisdictions, to be exercised in the Government and Discipline of the Church within the Province of Canterbury, and in the Administration of Justice in Causes Ecclesiastical within that Province, which are partly executed by himself in his own Person, and partly, and more generally, by several persons nominated and authorised by him, being learned in the Ecclesiastical Lawes of this Realm, in those several Places whereunto they are deputed and appointed by the said Archbishop: Which several Places, as we are informed, they severally hold by several Grants for their several Lives; as namely, Sir Henry Martin Knight, hath and holdeth by the Grants of the said Archbishop, the Offices and Places of the Dean of the Arches, and Judge or Master of the Prerogative Court, for the natural Life of the said Sir Henry Martin.

Sir Charles Caesar Knight, hath and holdeth by Grants of the said Archbishop, the Places or Offices of the Judge of the Audience, and Master of the Faculties, for the term of the natural Life of the said Sir Charles Caesar.

Sir Thomas Ridley Knight, hath and holdeth by the Grant of the said Archbishop, the Place or Office of Vicar-General to the said Archbishop.

And Nathaniel Brent, Doctor of the Lawes, hath and holdeth by Grant of the said Archbishop, the Office or Place of Commissary to the said Archbishop, as of his proper and peculiar Diocess of Canterbury.

And likewise the several Registers of the Arches, Prerogative, Audience, Faculties, and of the Vicar-General, and Commissary of Canterbury, hold their Places by Grants from the said Archbishop respectively.

Whereas the said Archbishop, in some or all of these several Places and Jurisdictions, doth or may sometimes assume unto his personal and proper Judicature, Order, or Direction, some particular Causes, Actions, or Cases at his pleasure. And so much as the said Archbishop cannot at this present, in his own person, attend the Services which are otherwise proper for his Cognisance and Jurisdiction, and which, as Archbishop of Canterbury, he might and ought in his own person to have performed and executed in Causes and Matters Ecclesiastical, in the proper Function of Archbishop of that Province: We therefore, of our Regal Power, and of our Princely Care and Providence, that nothing shall be defective in the Order, Discipline, Government, or Right of the Church, have thought fit by the Service of some other Learned and Reverend Bishops, to be named by Us, to supply those things which the said Archbishop ought or might in the Cases aforesaid to have done, but for this present cannot perform the same.

Know ye therefore, That we reposing special trust and confidence in your approved Wisdoms, Learning, and Integrity, have nominated, authorised, and appointed, and do, by these presents, nominate, authorise, and appoint you the said George, Lord Bishop of London, Richard Lord Bishop of Durham, John Lord Bishop of Rochester, John Lord Bishop of Oxford, and William Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, or any four, three, or two of you, to do, execute, and perform all and every those Acts, Matters, and Things, any way touching or concerning the Power, Jurisdiction, or Authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in Causes or Matters Ecclesiastical, as amply, fully, effectually, to all intents and purposes, as the said Archbishop himself might have done.

And we do hereby command you and every of you, to attend, perform, and execute this our Royal Pleasure, in, and touching the premises, until we shall declare our Will and Pleasure to the contrary.

And we do further hereby will and command the said Archbishop of Canterbury, quietly, and without interruption, to permit and suffer you the said George, Bishop of London, Richard Bishop of Durham, John Bishop of Rochester, John Bishop of Oxford, and William Bishop of Bath and Wells, any four, three, or two of you, to execute and perform this our Commission, according to our Royal Pleasure thereby signified.

And we do further will and command all and every other person and persons, whom it may any way concern, in their several Places or Offices, to be attendant, obedient, and obedient to you, and every of you, in the execution and performance of this our Royal Will and Command, as they and every of them will answer the contrary at their utmost perils.

Nevertheless, we do hereby declare our Royal Pleasure to be, That they the said Sir Henry Martin, Sir Charles Caesar, Sir Thomas Ridley, and Nathaniel Brent, in their several Offices and Places aforesaid, and all other Registers, Officers, and Ministers, in the several Courts, Offices, and Jurisdictions, appertaining to the said Archbishop, shall quietly, and without interruption, hold, use, occupy, and enjoy their said Offices and Places, which they now hold by the Grant of the said Archbishop, or of any other former Archbishop of Canterbury, in such manner and form, and with those Benefits, Privileges, Powers, and Authorities, which they now have, hold, and enjoy therein, or thereout, severally and respectively, they, and every of them, in their several Places, being attendant and obedient unto you the said George Bishop of London, Richard Bishop of Durham, John Bishop of Rochester, John Bishop of Oxford, and William Bishop of Bath and Wells, or to any four, three, or two of you, in all things according to the Tenor of this our Commission, as they should or ought to have been to the said Archbishop himself, if this Commission had not been had or made.

In witness whereof, We have caused these our Letters to be made Patent. Witness our self at Westminster, the ninth day of October, in the third year of our Reign.

The Archbishop for his own justification, penned his own Narrative, of which there are many Copies extant, the most correct is this which is here subjoined; by which the Reader will easily perceive the Archbishop a little exasperated, too much espousing the interest of a party at that time in disfavour, to the advantage of another at Court too hard for him.

Archbishop Abbot his Narrative.

Pars Prima.

The Archbishop's Narrative concerning his disgrace at Court.

IT is an Example, so without Example, that in the Sunshine of the Gospel, in the midst of profession of the true Religion, under a gracious King, whom all the World must acknowledge to be blemished with no Vice; a man of my Place and Years, who have done some service in the Church and Commonwealth, so deeply laden with some furious infirmities of Body, should be removed from his ordinary Habitation, and by a kind of deportation should be thrust into one end of the Island (although, I must confess, into his own Diocese) that I hold it fit, that the reason of it should be truly understood, lest it may someways turn to the scandal of my Person and Calling.

Which Declaration notwithstanding, I intend not to communicate to any, but to let it lie by me privately, that it being set down impartially, whilst all things are fresh in memory, I may have recourse to it hereafter, if questions shall be made of any thing contained in this Relation.

His Age when this befell him.

And this I hold necessary to be done, by reason of the strangeness of that, which by way of Censure was inflicted upon me, being then of the Age of Sixty five years, incumber'd with the Gout, and afflicted with the Stone, having lived so many years in a place of great Service, and, for ought I know, untainted in any of my Actions, although my Master King James, who resteth with God, had both a searching Wit of his own, to discover his Servants whom he put in trust, whether they took any sinister courses, or no; and wanted not some suggesters about him to make the worst of all mens actions whom they could misreport: Yet this Innocency and good Fame to be over-turned in a month, and a Christian Bishop suddenly to be made Fabula Vulgi, to be tossed upon the Tongues of Friends and Foes, of Protestants and Papists, of Court and Countrey, of English and Forreigners, must needs, in common opinion, presuppose some Crime, open or secret: Which being discovered by the King, albeit not fully appearing to the World, must draw on indignation in so high a measure.

His indisposition kept him from Court.

I cannot deny, that the indisposition of my Body kept me from Court, and thereby gave occasion to Maligners to traduce me, as withdrawing my self from publick Services, and therefore milking some courses that were taken; which abstaining perhaps neither pleased the King, nor the Great Man that set them on foot.

It is true, that in the turbulancy of some things; I had no great invitations to draw me abroad, but to possess my Soul in patience, till God sent fairer weather: But the true ground of my abstaining from solemn and publick places, was the weakness of my Feet, proceeding from the Gout; which Disease being hereditary unto me, and having possessed me now Nine years, had debilitated me more and more: So that I could not stand at all, neither could I go up or down a pair of Stairs, but besides my Staff, I must have the service of one, at least, of my Men, which was not fit to be admitted in every place where I was to come.

And although I was oft remembered by the wisest of my Friends, that I might be carried as the old Lord Treasurer Burleigh was, yet I did not think my service so necessary for the Commonwealth, as his Lordships, by long experience, was found to be. I did not value my self at so high a rate, but remembred, that it was not the least cause of overthrow to Robert Earl of Essex, that he prized himself so, as if Queen Elizabeth and the Kingdom could not well have stood, if he had not supported both the one and the other.

Car. 3.

Now for me, thus enfeebled, not with the Gout only, but with the Stone also and Gravel, to wait on the King, or the Council-Table, was by me held a matter most inconvenient. In the Courts of Princes, there is little feeling of the infirmities belonging to old age, they like them that be young and gallant in their actions, and in their cloaths, they love not that men should stick too long in any room of Greatness, Change and Alteration bringing somewhat with it. What have they to do with Kerchieves and Staves, with lame or sick men? It is certainly true, there is little compassion upon the bodily defects of any. The Scripture speaketh of men standing before Kings, it were an uncouth sight to see the Subject sit the day before the Coronation, when on the morrow I had work enough for the strongest man in England, being weak in my feet, and coming into Whitehall to see things in a readiness against the next day; yet notwithstanding the Stone and Gout, I was not altogether an inutile Servant in the King's Affairs; but did all things in my House that were to be done, as in keeping the High-Commission Court, doing all inferiour actions conducing thereunto, and dispatching References from his Majesty that came thick upon me.

These Relations which are made concerning me, be of certain truth, but reach not to the reason whereof I was discarded.

To understand therefore the verity, so it is, That the Duke of Buckingham being still great in the favour of the King, could endure no man that would not depend upon him; among other men, had me in his eye, for not stooping unto him so as to become his Vassal. I that had learned a Lesson, which I constantly hold, to be no man's servant but the King's (for mine own Royal Master, which is with God, and mine own Reason, did teach me so) went on mine own ways, although I could not but observe, That so many as walked in that path, did suffer for it upon all occasions, and so did I, nothing wherein I moved my Master taking place: Which finding so clearly, as if the Duke had set some ill character upon me, I had no way but to rest in patience, leaving all to God, and looking to my self as warily as I might. But this did not serve the turn, his undertaking was so extraordinary, that every one that was not with him, was presently against him; and if a hard opinion were once entertained, there was no place left for satisfaction or reconciliation.

The Duke
offended with the Archbishop for not stooping to him.

What befell the Earl of Arundel, and Sir Randal Crew, and divers others, I need not to report; and no man can make doubt but he blew the Coals.

For my self, there is a Gentleman called Sir H. S. who gave the first light what should befall me: This Knight being of more livelyhood than wisdom, had married the Lady D. Sister to the now Earl of E. and had so treated her, that both for safeguard of her Honour, blemished by him scandalously, and for her Alimony or Maintenance (being glad to get from him) she was enforced to endure a Suit in the High-Commission Court: So to strengthen his party, he was made known to the Duke, and by means of a dependant on his Grace, he got a Letter from the King. That the

The Solicitor for the Lady, finding that the course of Justice was stopped, did so earnestly, by Petition, move the King, that by another Letter, there was a relaxation of the former restraint, and the Commissioners Ecclesiastical went on: But now, in the new proceeding, finding himself by Justice, like enough to be pinched, he did publickly in the Court refuse to speak by any Counsel, but would plead his Cause himself; wherein he did bear the whole business so disorderly, tumultuously, and unrespectfully, that after divers reproofs, I was enforced for the Honour of the Court, and Reputation of the High Commission, to tell him openly, That if he did not carry himself in a better fashion, I would commit him to Prison.

This so troubled the young Gallant, that within few days after, being at Dinner or Supper, where some wished me well, he bolted it out, That as for the Archbishop, the Duke had a purpose to turn him out of his place, and that he did but wait the occasion to effect it. Which being brought unto me constantly by more ways than one, I was now in expectation what must be the issue of this great man's indignation, which fell out to be as followeth.

Sibthorpe's
Sermon for Loan money.

There was one Sibthorpe, who not being so much as a Batchelor of Arts, as it hath been credibly reported unto me, by means of Doctor Pierce, Dean of Peterborough, being Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, did get to be conferred upon him the Title of Doctor.

This man is Vicar of Brackley in Northamptonshire, and hath another Benefice not far from it in Buckinghamshire. But the lustre of his Honour did arise from the being the Son in Law of Sir John Lamb, Chancellor of Peterborough, whose Daughter he married, and was put into the Commission of Peace.

When the Lent Assizes were in February last at Northampton, the man that preached before the Judges there, was this worthy Doctor; where magnifying the Authority of Kings, (which is so strong in the Scripture, that it needs no flattery any ways to extol it) he let fall divers Speeches which were distasteful to the Auditors; and namely, That they had power to put Poll-money upon their Subjects heads, when against those Challenges men did frequently mourn.

The Duke's
design in having this Sermon sent to the Archbishop to license it.

He being a man of a low Fortune, conceived, that putting his Sermon in print, might gain favour at Court, and raise his Fortune higher, on he goeth with the Transcribing of his Sermon, and got a Bishop or two to prefer this great Service to the Duke; and it being brought unto the Duke, it cometh in his head, or was suggested unto him by some malicious Body, that thereby the Archbishop might be put to some remarkable strait. For if the King should send the Sermon unto him, and command him to allow it to the Press, one of these two things would follow, that either he should authorize it, and so all men that were indifferent, should discover him for a base and unworthy Beast; or he should refuse it, and so should fall into the King's indignation, who might pursue it at his pleasure, as against a man that was contrary to his service.

Out of this Fountain flowed all the Water that afterwards so wet: in rehearsing whereof, I must set down divers particulars, which some men may wonder how they should be discovered unto me. But let it suffice once for all, that in the word of an honest man, and of a Bishop, I recount nothing, but whereof I had good warrant, God himself working means.

The matters were revealed unto me, although it be not convenient that in this Paper I name the manner how they came unto me, lest such as did by well doing further me, should receive blame for their labour. Well! resolved it is, that I must be put to it, and that with speed; and therefore Mr. William Murrey, Nephew (as I think) unto Mr. Thomas Murrey, sometimes Tutor unto Prince Charles, and the young man now of the King's Bed-chamber, is sent unto me with the written Sermon; of whom I must say, That albeit he did the King his Master's business, yet he did use himself civilly and temperately unto me. For avoiding of inquit and inquam (as Tully saith) I said this, and he said that, I will make it by way of Dialogue, not setting down every days conference exactly by it self, but mentioning all things of importance in the whole, yet distinguishing of times, where, for the truth of the Relation, it cannot be avoided.

sent from the King
with the Sermon to the Archbishop to have it licensed by himself.

Murrey. My Lord, I am sent unto you by the King, to let you know, that his pleasure is, That whereas there is brought unto him a Sermon to be printed, you should allow this Sermon to the Press.

Archb. I was never he that authorized Books to be printed; for it is the work of my Chaplains to read over other men's Writings; and what is fit, to let it go, and what is unfit, to expunge it.

The discourse by alogue, be-occasion.

Murrey. But the King will have you yourself to do this, because he is minded, that no Books shall be allowed, but by you and the Bishop of London: And my Lord of London authorized one the other day (Consens his Book) and he will have you do this.

Archb. This is an occupation that my old Master King James did never put me to, and yet I was then young, and had more abilities of body than now I have; so that I see I must now learn a new lesson: but leave it with me, and when I have read it, I shall know what to say unto it; a day or two hence you shall understand my mind. When I had once or twice perused it, I found some words which seemed unto me to cross that which the King intended, and in a sort to destroy it; and therefore upon his return, a day or two after, I expressed myself thus.

Mr. Murrey, I conceive, that the King intendeth, that this Sermon shall promote the service now in hand about the Loan of Money, but in my opinion it much crosseth it; for he layeth it down for a rule, and because it shall not be forgotten, he repeateth it again,

That Christians are bound in duty one to another, especially all Subjects to their Princes, according to the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom, wherein they live.

The Arch-
bishop's Reasons why he could not license it.

Out of this will men except this Loan, because that there is neither Law nor Custom for it in the Kingdom of England.

Secondly, In my judgment, there followeth a dangerous Speech, Habemus necessitatem vindicande libertatis. For this was all that was then quoted out of Calvin, no mention being made of any the other words which are now in the printed Copy: for when by the former Rule he hath set men at liberty, whether they will pay or no, he imposeth upon Anno 1627. upon them a necessity to vindicate this liberty, and Vindicare may be extended to challenge with violence cum vi. But for my part, I would be most unwilling to give occasion to Sedition and Mutiny in the Kingdom.

Again, here is mention made of Poll-money, which, as I have heard, hath already caused much distaste where the Sermon was preached.

Moreover, what a speech is this, That he observes the forwardness of the Papists to offer double, according to an Act of Parliament so providing, yea, to profess, that they would part with the half of their Goods, where he quoteth in the Margent, Anno 1. Caroli; the Act for the Subsidy of the Laity, whereby Popish Recusants were to pay double; when indeed there is no such Act.

And in the fifth place, it is said in this Sermon, That the Princes of Bohemia have power to depose their Kings, as not being Hereditary, which is a great question. Such a one as hath cost much blood, and must not in a word be absolutely defined here, as if it were without controversy. I pray you make his Majesty acquainted with these things, and take the Book with you, (where it is to be noted, that all this time we had but one single Copy, which was sometime at the Court, and sometime left with me.)

Murrey. I will faithfully deliver these things to the King, and then you shall hear further from me.

His Majesty returns answer by Mr. Murrey to those reasons of the Archbishop.

Some two or three days after he returned again unto me, and telleth me, That he had particularly acquainted the King with my Objections; and his Majesty made this Answer: First, for the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom, he did not stand upon that, he had a President for that which he did, and thereon he would insist.

Archb. I think that to be a mistaking, for I fear there will be found no such President. King Henry the Eighth, as the Chronicle sheweth, desired but the Sixth part of mens Estates, Ten groats in the pound; our King desireth the whole six parts full out, so much as men are set at in the Subsidy Book: And in the time of King Henry, although he were a powerful King, yet, for that Taxation, there began against him little less than a Rebellion; so that he held it wisdom to desist, and laying the blame upon Cardinal Wolsey, professed, that he knew nothing of the matter.

Murrey. Secondly, the King saith, for the words Habemus necessitatem vindicanda libertatis, he taketh them to be for him; and he will stand on his Liberty.

Thirdly, For Poll-money, he thinketh it lawful.

Fourthly, It is true, there was no such Act passed, and therefore it must be amended (and yet in the printed Book it is suffered still to stand. Such slight, and, I may say, slovenly care was had by them that published this Sermon.)

And fifthly, for that of Bohemia, he hath crossed it out of the Book.

Some other matters there were, against which I took exception, but Mr. Murrey being a young Gentleman, although witty, and full of good behaviour, I doubted, that being not deeply seen in Divinity, he could not so well conceive me, nor make report of my words to his Majesty: And therefore I being lame, and so disabled to wait on the King, did move him, That he would, in my name, humbly beseech his Majesty to send the Bishop of Bath and Wells unto me, and I would, by his means, make known my Scruples: And so I dismissed Mr. Murrey, observing with my self, that the Answer to my Five Objections, especially to two or three, were somewhat strange: As if the King were resolved, were it to his good or to his harm, to have the Book go forth.

After one or two days more, the young Gentleman cometh to me again, and telleth me, That the King did not think it fit to send the Bishop of Bath unto me; but he expected I should pass the Book. In the mean time, had gone over one High-Commission day, and this Bishop, who used (otherwise) very few days to fail, was not there; which being joyned to his Majesties Message, made me in some measure to smell, that this whole business might have that Bishop's hand in it, especially I knowing in general the disposition of the man.

The minds of those that were Actors for the publishing of the Book, were not quiet at the Court, that the thing was not dispatched; and therefore one day the Duke said to the King, Do you see how this business is deferred? If more expedition be not used, it will not be printed before the end of the Term; at which time it is fit that it be sent down into the Countreys.

So eager he was, that either by my credit his undertakings might be strengthened, or, at least, I might be contemned and derided as an unworthy fellow.

This so quickned the King, that the next Message which was sent by Mr. Murrey was, in some degree, minatory, That if I did not dispatch it, the King would take some other course with me.

When I found how far the Duke had prevailed, I thought it my best way to set down in writing many Objections, wherefore the Book was not fit to be published: which I did modestly, and sent them to the King. The words were these, which I culled out of the written Sermon.

The Archbishop sends his Objections to the Court in writing against the Sermon.

1. Page 2. Those words deserve to be well weighed, And whereas the Prince pleads not the power of Prerogative.

2. Page 8. The King's duty is first to direct and make Laws. There is no Law made till the King assent unto it; but if it be put simply to make Laws, it will make much startling at it.

3. Page 10. If nothing may excuse from active obedience, but what is against the Law of God, or of Nature, or impossible. How doth this agree with the first fundamental Position? page 5. That all Subjects are bound to all their Princes according to the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom wherein they live.

This is a Fourth Case of Exception.

4. Page 11. The Poll-money, mentioned by him in St. Matthew, was imposed by the Emperor as a Conqueror over the Jews, and the execution of it in England, although it was by a Law, produced a terrible effect in King Richard the Second's time, when only it was used, for ought that appeareth.

5. Page 12. It is in the bottom, view the Reign of Henry the Third, and whether it be fit to give such allowance to the Book, being surreptitiously put out?

6. In the same Page, let the largeness of those words be well considered, Yea all Antiquity to be absolutely for absolute Obedience to Princes in all Civil and Temporal things. For such Cases as Naboth's Vineyard may fall within this.

The Archbishop desires Bishop Laud may be sent to him to treat of that Sermon.

7. Page 14. Sextus Quintus was dead before the year One thousand five hundred and eighty.

8. In the same Page, weigh it well, How this Loan may be called a Tribute; and when it is said, We are promised, it shall not be immoderately imposed: How that agreeth with his Majesties Commission and Proclamation, which are quoted in the Margent?

Bishop
Land is employed ed to answer these Objections.

It should seem, that this Paper did prick to the quick, and no satisfaction being thereby accepted, Bishop Land is called, and he must go to answer to it in writing: This man is the only inward Counsellor with Buckingham, sitting with him sometimes privately whole hours, and feeding his humour with malice and spight.

His life in Oxford was to pick quarrels in the Lectures of the Publick Readers, and to advertise them to the then Bishop of Durham, that he might fill the ears of King James with discontents against the honest men that took pains in their Places, and settled the truth (which he called Puritanism) in their Auditors.

He made it his work to see what Books were in the Press, and to look over Epistles Dedicatory, and Prefaces to the Reader, to see what faults might be found.

K. James was a long time offended with Bishop Land.

It was an observation what a sweet man this was like to be, that the first observable act that he did, was the marrying of the Earl of D. to the Lady R. when it was notorious to the World, that she had another Husband, and the same a Nobleman, who had divers Children then living by her. King James did for many years take this so ill, that he would never hear of any great preferment of him; insomuch that the Bishop of Lincoln, Doctor Williams, who taketh upon him to be the first promoter of him, hath many times said, That when he made mention of Land to the King, his Majesty was so averse from it, that he was constrained oftentimes to say, That he would never desire to serve that Master, which could not remit one fault unto his Servant. Well, in the end he did conquer it, to get him to the Bishoprick of St. Davids; which he had not long enjoyed, but he began to undermine his Benefactor, as at this day it appeareth. The Countess of Buckingham told Lincoln, that St. David's was the man that undermined him with her Son: And verily, such is his aspiring nature, that he will underwork any man in the World, so that he may gain by it.

He was advanced by Bishop
Williams.

This man, who believeth so well of himself, framed an Answer to my Exceptions. But to give some countenance to it, he must call in three other Bishops, that is to say, Durham, Rocheſter, and Oxford, tried men for such a purpose; and the whole style of the Speech runneth, We and We.

Bishops of Durham & Bath sworn of the Privy Council.

This seemed so strong a confutation, that for reward of their Service, as well as for hope that they would do more, Doctor Neal, Bishop of Durham, and the Bishop of Bath, were sworn of the Privy Council.

The very day, being Sunday, Mr. Murrey was sent unto me with a Writing; but finding me all in a sweat by a fit of the Stone, which was then upon me, he forbore for that time to trouble me, and said, That on the morrow he would repair to me again. I got me to Bed, and lying all that night in pain, I held it not convenient to rise the next day: And on the Munday, Mr. Murrey came unto me, which was the Eighth time that he had been with me, so uncessantly was I plyed with this noble Work.

Mr. Murrey
brings the Answer to the Archbishop's Objections

I had shewed it before to a friend or two, whereof the one was a learned Doctor of Divinity, and the other had served many times in Parliament with great commendation. We all agreed, That it was an idle work of a man that understood not Logick, that evidently crossed himself, that sometimes spake plausibly, and in the end of his Sermon fell so poor and flat, that it was not worth the reading.

Mr. Murrey coming to my Bed-side, said, That he was sent again by the King, and had a Paper to be shewed unto me.

Archb. You see in what case I am, having slept little as this last night, but nevertheless since you come from the King, I will take my Spectacles and read it.

Murrey. No, my Lord, you may not read it, neither handle it; for I have charge not to suffer it to go out of my hands.

Archb. How then shall I know what it is?

Murrey. Yes, I have order to read it unto you, but I may not part with it.

Archb. I must conceive, that if I do not assent to it, his Majesty will give me leave to reply upon it; which I cannot do, but in my Study, for there are my Books.

Murrey. I must go with you into your Study, and sit by you till you have done.

Archb. It is not so hasty a work, it will require time, and I have not been used to study, one sitting by me: but first read it, I pray you.

The young Gentleman read it from one end to the other, being two or three sheets of Paper.

Archb. This Answer is very bitter, but giveth me no satisfaction. I pray you leave the Writing with me, and I shall batter it to pieces.

Murrey. No my Lord, I am forbidden to leave it with you, or to suffer you to touch it.

Archb. How cometh this about? are the Authors of it affraid of it, or ashamed of it? I pray you tell his Majesty, that I am dealt with neither Manly nor Scholar-like. Not Manly, because I must fight with Adversaries that I know not; nor Scholar-like, because I must not see what it is that must confute me. It is now Eight and forty years ago that I came to the University, and since that time I have ever loved a Learned man; I have disputed and written divers Books, and know very well what appertaineth to the Schools. This is a new kind of Learning unto me. I have formerly found fault, that the Author of this Sermon quoteth not the places whereupon he grounds his Doctrine; and when I have oft called for them, it is replied unto me, That I must take them upon the credit of the Writer, which I dare not do; for I have searched but one place, which he quoted in general, but sets down neither the Words nor the Treatise, nor the Chapter, and I find nothing to the purpose for which it is quoted; and therefore I have reason to suspect all the rest. I pray you therefore, in the humblest manner, to commend my Service to the King my Master, and let him know, that unless I may have all the Quotations set down, that I may examine them, and may have that Writing, wherein I am so ill used, I cannot allow the Book.

The Archbishop is not suffered to see the Writings, but
Mr. Murrey
reads it.

Before I go further, it shall not be amiss to touch some Particulars of that which I sent in writing to the King.

The first was Page 2. Those words deserve to be well weighed, And whereas the Prince pleads not the power of Prerogative.

To this Mr. Murrey said, The King doth not plead

Anno 1627. plead it: But my reply was, By what then doth he coerce those Refractories? for I have not heard of any Law whereby they are imprisoned, and therefore I must take it to be by the King's Prerogative.

To the second, Page 8. The King's duty is first to direct and make Laws. There is no Law made till the King assent unto it; but if it be but simply to make Laws, it will cause much startling at it.

To this I remember not any material thing answered, neither to the third.

Page 10. If nothing may excuse from active obedience, but what is against the Law of God, or of Nature, or impossible: How doth this agree with the first fundamental Position, Page 5. That all Subjects are bound to all their Princes, according to the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom wherein they live?

This is a fourth Case of Exception.

And here before I go to the rest, the Doctor did truly hit upon a good point, in looking to the Laws and Customs, if he could have kept him to it; for in my memory, and in the remembrance of many Lords, and others that now live, Doctor Harsenet, the then Bishop of Chichester, and now of Norwich, in Parliament time preached a Sermon at Whitehall, (which was afterwards burned) upon the Text, Give unto Cæsar the things that be Cæsar's. Wherein he insisted, That Goods and Money were Cæsar's, and therefore they were not to be denied unto him.

At this time, when the whole Parliament took main offence thereat, King James was constrain'd to call the Lords and Commons into the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, and there his Majesty calmed all, by saying, The Bishop only failed in this, when he said, The Goods were Cæsar's; he did not add, They were his according to the Laws and Customs of the Countrey wherein they did live.

So moderate was our Cæsar then, as I my self saw, and heard, being then an eye and ear witness; for I was then Bishop of London.

To the Fourth, the Poll-money, in St. Matthew, was imposed by the Emperor, as a Conqueror of the Jews; and the execution of it in England, although it was by a Law, produced a terrible effect in King Richard the Second's time, when only it was used, for ought that appeareth.

Here the Bishop in the Paper excepted divers things, as, That sometimes among us by Act of Parliament, Strangers are appointed to pay by the Poll, which agreeth not with the case; and that it was not well to bring Examples out of weak times, whereas we live in better; but that it was a marvellous fault, the blame was not laid upon the Rebels of that Age.

Those are such poor things, that they are not worth the answering.

But my Objection in truth prevailed so far, that in the Printed Book it was qualified thus [Poll-money, other persons, and upon some occasions] where obiter I may observe, That my refusing to sign the Sermon, is not to be judged by the Printed Book, for many things are altered in one, which were in the other.

To the Fifth, Page 12. it is in the bottom, view the Reign of Henry the Third, whether it be fit to give such allowance to the Book, being surreptitiously put out.

To this it was said, That being a good passage out of a blame-worthy Book, there was no harm in it.

But before the Question of Sibthorp's Treatise, the Bishop of Bath himself being with me, found much fault with that Treatise, as being put out for a scandalous Parallel of those times.

To the sixth in the same Page, Let the largeness of those words be well considered, Yea, all Antiquity to be absolutely for absolute Obedience to Princes, in all Civil or Temporal things: For such Cases (as Naboth's Vineyard) may fall within this.

Here the Bishop was a man in a rage, and said, That it was an odious comparison; for it must suppose, that there must be an Ahab, and there must be a Jezebel, and I cannot tell what: but I am sure my Exception standeth true; and reviling and railing doth not satisfy my Argument, All Antiquity taketh the Scripture into it; and if I had allowed that proportion for good, I had been justly beaten with my own Rod.

If the King, the next day, had commanded me to send him all the Money and Goods I had, I must, by my own Rule, have obeyed him; and if he had commanded the like to all the Clergy-men in England, by Doctor Sibthorp's proportion, and my Lord of Canterbury's allowing of the same, they must have sent in all, and left their Wives and Children in a miserable case. Yea, the words extend so far, and are so absolutely delivered, that by this Divinity, if the King should send to the City of London, and the Inhabitants thereof, commanding them to give unto him all the wealth which they have, they were bound to do it: I know our King is so gracious, that he will attempt no such matter; but if he do it not, the defect is not in their flattering Divines, who, if they were called to question for such Doctrine, they would scarce be able to abide it. There is a Meum and Tuum in Christian Commonwealths, and according to Laws and Customs, Princes may dispose of it, that saying being true, Ad Reges Potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos Inoprietas.

To the seventh, Page 14. Pius Quintus was dead before the year One thousand five hundred and eighty,

They make no Reply, but mend it in the printed Book, changing it into Gregory the Thirteenth.

To the last, in the same Page, weigh it well, How this Loan may be called a Tribute; and when it is said, We are promised shall not be immoderately imposed.

How that agreeth with his Majesties Commission and Proclamation, which are quoted in the Margent, they make no Answer; but in the published Sermon, distinguish a Tribute from a Loan or Aid, whereby they acknowledged it was not well before; and indeed it was improper and absurd, worthy of none but Dr. Sibthorp.

I have now delivered the grounds whereupon I refused to authorise this Book, being sorry at my heart, that the King, my gracious Master, should rest so great a building upon so weak a foundation, the Treatise being so slender, and without substance, but that it proceeded from a hungry man.

If I had been in Council, when the Project for this Loan was first handled, I would have used my best Reasons to have had it well grounded; but I was absent, and knew not whereupon they proceeded, only I saw it was followed with much vehemency: And since it was put in execution,

Anno 1627. cution, I did not interpose my self to know the grounds of one, nor of the other.

It seemeth therefore strange unto me, that in the upshot of the business, I was called in to make that good by Divinity, which others had done; and must have no other inducements to it, but Doctor Sibthorp's contemptible Treatise. I imagined this for the manner of the carriage of it, to be somewhat like unto the Earl of Somerset's Case, who abused the Wife of the Earl of Essex, must have her divorced from her Husband, and must himself marry her: And this must not be done, but that the Archbishop of Canterbury must ratifie all judicially. I know the Cases are different, but I only compare the manner of the carriage.

Sibthorp's Sermon licenced by the Bp. of London. When the Approbation of the Sermon was by me refused, it was carried to the Bishop of London, who gave a great and stately allowance of it; the good man being not willing that any thing should stick which was sent unto him from the Court, as appeareth by the Book, which is commonly called, The Seven Sacraments, which was allowed by his Lordship, with all the Errors; which since that time have been expunged, and taken out of it.

But before this passed the Bishop's File, there is one accident which fitly cometh in to be recounted in this place. My Lord of London hath a Chaplain, Doctor Worral by name, who is Scholar good enough, but a kind of free Fellow-like man, and of no very tender Conscience. Doctor Sibthorp's Sermon was brought unto him, and, hand over head, (as the Proverb is) he approved it, and subscribed his name unto it. But afterwards, being better advised, he sent it to a learned Gentleman of the Inner Temple, and writing some few lines unto him, craveth his opinion of that which he had done; the Gentleman read it: but although he had promised to return his judgment by Letter, yet he refused so to do, but desired that Doctor Worral would come himself; which being done, he spake to this purpose: 'What have you done? You have allowed a strange Book yonder; which, if it be true, there is no Muum or Tuum, no man in England hath any thing of his own: If ever the Tide turn, and matters be called to a reckoning, you will be hanged for publishing such a Book. To which the Doctor answered, Yea, but my hand is to it; what shall I do? For that, the other replied, you must scrape out your name, and do not so much as suffer the sign of any letter to remain in the Paper. Which accordingly he did, and withdrew his finger from the Pye.

But what the Chaplain well advised would not do, his Lord, without sticking, accomplished; and so being insensibly hatched, it came flying into the World: But in my opinion, the Book hath perswaded very few understanding men, and hath not gained the King six pence.

Pars Secunda.

Hitherto I have declared at length all passages concerning the Sermon, and, to my remembrance, I have not quitted any thing that was worthy the knowing. I am now in the second place to shew what was the issue of this not allowing the worthy and learned Treatise. In the height of this Question, I privately understood, from a Friend in the Court, that for a punishment upon me, it was resolved, that I should be sent away to Canterbury, and confined there. I kept this silently, and expected God's pleasure; yet laying it up still in my mind, esteeming the Duke to be of the number of them, touching whom Tacitus observeth, That such as are false in their love, are true in their hate. But whatsoever the event must be, I made that use of the Report, that Jacula praevisa minus feriunt. The Duke, at the first, was earnest with the King, that I must be presently sent avay before his going to Sea: For, saith he, if I were gone, he would be every day at Whitehall, and at the Council Table, and there will cross all things that I have intended. To meet with his Objection, I got me avay to Croyden a Month sooner than in ordinary years I have used to do; but the Term was ended early, and my main fit of the Stone did call upon me to get me to the Countrey, that there on Horse-back I might ride upon the Downs; which I afterwards performed, and, I thank God, found great use of it, in recovering of my stomach, which was almost utterly gone.

The Duke hastned his preparations for the Fleet; but still that cometh in for one Memorandum, That if he were once absent, there should no day pass over, but that the Archbishop would be with the King, and infuse things that would be contrary to his proceedings. What a miserable and restless thing Ambition is, when one Talented, but as a common person, yet by the favour of his Prince, hath gotten that interest, that in a fort, all the Keys of England hang at his Girdle, (which the wise Queen Elizabeth would never endure in any Subject) yet standeth in his own heart in such tickle terms, as that he feared every shadow, and thinketh, that the lending of the King's ear unto any grave and well-seasoned Report, may blow him out of all; which, in his estimation, he thinketh is settled upon no good foundation, but the affection of the Prince, which may be mutable, as it is in all men more or less: If a man would wish harm unto his Enemy, could he wish him a greater torment, than to be wrested and wringed with ambitious thoughts? Well, at first it went current, that with all haste I must be doffed, but upon latter consideration, it must be staid till the Duke be at Sea, and then put in execution by the King himself, that, as it seemeth, Buckingham might be free from blame, if any should be laid upon any person. Hence it was, that after his going, there was new prosecution of the Torke-shire men, and the refusing Londoners were pursued more fervently than before; and it is very likely, that the Arrow came out of the same Quiver; that the Bishop coming to the Election at Westminster, was driven back so suddenly to Bugden. Take heed of these things, Noble Duke, you put your King to the worst parts, whereof you may hear one day: So when your Sovereign in the Parliament time had spoken sharply to both Houses, commanding them to go together again, and to give more money, and commanding them to meddle no more with the Duke of Buckingham; you came the next day, and thought to smooth all, taking the glory of qualifying disturbances to your self; whereas if you had read Books of true State Government, wherewithal you are not acquainted, sweet things are personally to be acted by Kings and Princes, as giving of Honours, and bestowing of noted Benefits; and those things that are sour and distasting, are to be performed by their Ministers; you go the contrary way.

But as before the whole House falleth on fire, some sparks do flie out; so, before the Message of the King was brought me by the Secretary, there were some inklings that such a thing would follow.

And

Anno And upon the naming of me (by occasion) it was 1627: said by a Creature of the Duke's, That it would not be long, before the Archbishop should be se-questred (that was the word.) So well acquainted are the Duke's followers with great actions that are ready to fall out in State.

Accordingly on Tuesday the Fifth of July, One thousand six hundred twenty and seven, the Lord Conway came unto me to Croydon, before Dinner time, having travelled, as he said, a long journey that morning, even from Oatlands thither; he would say nothing till he had dined:
then, because he was to return to Oatlands that night, I took him into the Gallery, and when we were both sat down, we fell to it in this manner.

M^T Lord, I know you, coming from Court, have somewhat to say to me.

Secretary. It is true; my Lord, and I am the most unwilling man in the World to bring unpleasing News to any Person of Quality, to whom I wish well, and especially to such a one, as of whose Meat I have eaten, and been merry at his House: But I come from the King, and must deliver his pleasure; I know who you are: and much more, with very civil language.

Archb. I doubt not, my Lord, but you have somewhat to say; and therefore I pray you in plain terms let me have it.

The Archbishop commanded to withdraw.

Secret. It is then his Majesties pleasure, that you should withdraw your self unto Canterbury; for which he will afford you some convenient time.

Archb. Is that it? then I must use the words of the Psalmist, He shall not be afraid of any evil ridings, for his heart standeth fast, and believeth in the Lord. But, I pray you, what is my fault that bringeth this upon me?

Secret. The King saith, you know.

Archb. Truly, I know none, unless it be that I am lame, which I cannot help; it is against my will, and I am not proud of it.

Secret. The King bad me tell you, That if any expostulation were used—

Archb. No, I will not use any expostulation; if it be his pleasure, I will obey. I know my self to be an honest man, and therefore fear nothing. But, my Lord, do you think it is for the King's service in this sort to send me away?

Secret. No, by God! I do not think it, and so yesterday I told the King with an Oath; but he will have it so.

Archb. I must say as before, He shall not be afraid of any evil tidings, for his heart standeth fast, and he believeth in the Lord. But I pray you, my Lord, is the King precisely set upon my going to Canterbury? There are questions in Law between me and that Town, about the Liberty of my Archbishoprick, which I, by my Oath, am bound to maintain; and if I should be among them, I have many Adversaries of the Citizens;
I have there some Tenants, and the Dean and Chapter are interested in the Question; I would be unwilling that my Servants and their People should fall together by the ears, while I am in the Town: His Majesty knows this difference to be between us, by the token that a Suit which I lately brought against them, by a Quo Warranto in the King's Bench, was stopped, Justice being denied me, which is not usual to be denied to any Subject; and the King well knoweth by whose means it was stayed. I have therefore another House, called Foord, five miles beyond Canterbury, and more out of the way; his Majesty may be pleased to let me go thither.

Secret. I can say nothing to that, but I will acquaint the King with it; and I conceive nothing to the contrary, but that his Majesty will yield so much unto you. I have a second charge to deliver unto you, and that is, That his Majesty will not have you from henceforth to meddle with the High Commission; he will take care that it shall be done otherwise.

Archb. I do not doubt but it shall be better managed, than it hath been by me: And yet, my Lord, I tell you, that for these many years that I have had the direction of that Court, the time is to come, that ever honest man did find fault, that he had not there Justice done.

Secret. It is now Vacation time, and so consequently little to do; and by Michaelmas his Majesty may set all in order.

Archb. I am sorry that the King proceedeth thus with me, and letteth me not know the cause.

Secret. Although I have no Commission to tell you so, it is for a Book which you would not allow, which concerned the King's Service.

Archb. If that be it, when I am questioned for it, I doubt not but to give an honest Answer.

Secret. You will never be questioned for it.

Archb. Then am I the more hardly dealt withal, to be censured, and not called to my Answer.

Secret. Well, my Lord, I will remember that of Foord; and will your Grace command me any more service?

Archb. No, my Lord, but God be with you; only I end where I began, with the words of the Prophet, He shall not be afraid of any evil ridings, for his heart standeth fast, and believeth in the Lord.

It comforted me not a little, that the word was now out: My confining must be for not allowing of a Book! I had much ado to forbear smiling when I heard it, because now it was clear, it was not for Felony or Treason that was laid to my charge, nor for intelligence with the Spaniards or French, nor for correspondence with Jesuits or Seminary Priests, or any other grievous crime, I thank God for that. I had almost forgotten, that among many other memorable Speeches that passed between us, I used this one, That peradventure the King might be offended at me, because I was no more present at the matter of the Loan;
but, said I, my lameness hindered me therein, and I hoped thereby to do my Master better service, because if ever course be taken to reconcile the King and his People, (which if it be not, this Kingdom will rue it in the end) I would hope among many other, to be a good Instrument therein, since my hand hath not been in those bitternesses which have of late fallen out.

Your Grace saith well, saith the Secretary: Would you that I should tell the King so much? Yea, said I, if you please; I hold it not unfit that his Majesty should know it.

What he reported therein, I do not know;
but matters proceeded in the former course, as if there were no regard had of any such thing.

The Lord Conway being gone from me for two or three days, I expected to hear the resolution, to what place in Kent I should betake my self;
and receiving no news, I tossed many things in my mind, as perhaps, that the King desired to hear somewhat from the Duke, how he sped in his journey; or that peradventure he might alter

Anno 1627. his purpose, upon report of my ready obeying; or that it might so fall out, that some of the Lords of the Court understanding, upon the Secretary's return from Croyden, that which was formerly concealed from them, might infuse some other Counseis into the King. These thoughts I resolved, at last, not forgetting the courtes of the Court, and imprinting that into my heart, That there was no good intended towards me, but that any advantage would be taken against me, I sent a man to Whitehall, whither the King was now come for a night or two, and by him I wrote to the Lord Conway, in these words.

My very good Lord,

The Archbishop writes to the Lord
Conway, to know if his Majesty will give him his choise of two Houses to retire to.

I Do not forget the Message which you brought unto me on Thursday last, and because I have heard nothing from you since that time, I send this Messenger on purpose to know what is resolved touching the House, or Houses where I must remain: There belong to the Archbishoprick three Houses in Kent, one at Canterbury, another five miles beyond, called Foord, and a third on the side of Canterbury, but two miles off, the name whereof is Becksburn.

I pray your Lordship to let me know his Majesties pleasure, whether he will leave the choise of any of those Houses to me to reside in: I have reason to know the resolution hereof, because I must make my provision of Wood, and Coals, and Hay, for some definite place; and when I shall have Brewed, it is fit I should know where to put it, or else it will not serve the turn: It is an unseasonable time to brew now, and as untimely to cut Wood, being green in the highest degree, and to make Coals, without all which, my House cannot be kept. But when I shall know what must be my Habitation, I will send down my Servants presently, to make the best Provisions that they can. And so expecting your Lordship's Answer, I leave you to the Almighty, and remain,

Your Lordship's

Croyden, July 10.
1627.

very loving Friend,

G. Cant.

He made my Servant stay, and when he had gone up to know the King's further pleasure, he returned me the Answer following.

May it please your Grace,

The Lord
Conway's
Answer.

I Am ashamed, and do confess my fault, that I wrote not to your Grace before I received your Reproof, though a gracious one; but, in truth, I did not neglect, nor forget. But the continual oppression of business, would not permit me to advertise to your Grace the King's Answer. His Majesty heard seriously your Professions and Answers, and commanded me to signify unto you, That he knew not the present difference between you and the Town; and if he had, he would not have cast you into that inconvenience. He was well pleased you should go to your House at Foord, and said, he did not expect when the Question was ended between your Grace and the Town, that you should go to Canterbury.

And he further said, He would not tie you to so short a time, as might be any way inconvenient, but doth expect, that your Grace will govern it so, as his Majesty shall not need to warn you a second time.

I will not fail to move his Majesty, to give you liberty to chuse either of your Houses you name, and give you knowledge of his pleasure, and in all things be ready to obey your commandments, or take occasion to serve you in the condition of

Car. 3.

Your Grace's

Whitehall, July 10.
1627.

most humble Servant,

Conway.

I could not but observe therein that passage, That the King doth expect, that your Grace will govern it so, as his Majesty will not need to warn you a second time; I needed no Interpreter to expound those words, and therefore did take order, that one of my Officers was presently dispatched unto Foord, to see the House ready.

While Necessaries were caring for, and I lay for some days at Croyden, and afterwards at Lambeth, the City of London was filled with the report of my confining (for so they did term it) and divers men spake diversly of it. I will not trouble my self to mention some idle things, but some other of them require a little consideration. A main matter that the Duke was said to take in ill part, was, the resort which was made to my House at the times of Dinner and Supper, and that oftentimes of such as did not love him.

The reason why the Duke was thought to be offended with the Archbishop.

My Answer unto that is, That by Nature I have been given to keep a House according to my proportion, since I have had any Means, and God hath blessed me in it. That it is a property by St. Paul required in a Bishop, That he should be given to hospitality; that it is another of his Rules, Let your conversation be without covetousness; and those things I had in mine eyes. Besides, I have no Wife nor Child; and as for my Kindred, I do that for them which I hold fit; but I will not rob the Church nor the Poor for them.

The Archbishop accustomed to Hospitality.

Again, It is so rare a fault in these days, that men not feeding on the King's meat, but of their own charge, should frankly entertain their Friends when they come unto them, that I deserve to be pardoned for it. But this is not all.

When King James gave me the Bishoprick, he did once between him and me, and another time before the Earl of Salisbury, charge me that I should carry my House Nobly (that was his Majesties word) and live like an Archbishop; which I promised him to do: And when men came to my House, who were of all civil sorts, I gave them friendly entertainment, not sitting what exceptions the Duke made against them; for I knew he might as undeservedly think ill of others, as he did of me. But I medled with no man's quarrels, and if I should have received none but such as cordially, and in truth, had loved him, I might have gone to Dinner many times without Company. There frequented me Lords Spiritual and Temporal, divers Privy Counsellors, as occasion served, and Men of the highest Rank; where, if the Duke thought that we had busied our selves about him, he was much deceived: Yet perhaps the old saying is true, That a man who is guilty of one Evil to himself, thinketh that all men that talk together, do say somewhat of him. I do not envy him that happiness, but let it ever attend him.

K. James
enjoyed the Archbishop to live like an Archbishop.

As for other men of good report, but of lesser quality, I have heard some by name, to whom exception hath been taken, and these are three, (I know from the Court, by a Friend, that my House, House, for a good space of time, hath been watched; and I marvel that they have not rather named sixty than three.)

The first of these is Sir Dudley Diggs, a very great Mote in the Duke's Eye, as I am informed; for it is said, That this Knight hath paid him in Parliament with many sharp speeches. If this be so, yet what is that to me? he is of age to answer for himself. But in the time of the late Parliament, when the Earl of Carlisle came unto me, and dealt with me thereabout, I gave him my word, and I did it truly, That I was not acquainted with these things; only being sick, as I was, I had in general given him advice, That he should do nothing, that might give just offence to the King; and I have credibly heard, that when Sir Dudley was last in the Fleet, committed from the Council Table, he was much dealt withal to know, Whether he was not instigated by me to accuse the Duke in Parliament: The Knight, with all the protestations and assurances that could come from a Gentleman, acquitted me of the part, and whole, wherein he did me but Right: And I do remember, when that man, now so hated, was a great Servant of the Duke's. So that if he have now lost him, it cannot but be presumed, that it is for some unworthy carriage, which the Gentleman conceiveth hath, by that Lord, been offered unto him.

Moreover, how can I but imagine, the words and actions of Sir Dudley Diggs have been ill interpreted and reported: when I myself saw the Duke stand up nine times in a morning in the Parliament House, to fasten upon him words little less (if at all less) than Treason; when by the particular Votes of all the Lords and Commons in both Houses, he was quit of those things, which the other would have enforced upon him: And a little while before he was hastily clapt into the Tower, and within a day or two released again, because nothing was proved against him. And I assure you, I am so little interested in his actions, that to this day I could never learn the reason why he was imprisoned in the Fleet, although he was kept there for seven or eight weeks. I distinguish the King from the Duke of Buckingham, the one is our Sovereign by the Laws of God and Men; the other a Subject as we are: And if any Subject do impeach another, though of different degrees, let the Party grieved remedy himself by Law, and not by Power.

But to speak further for this Knight, I may not forget when he was publicly employed, one time to the Hague, a second time to Muscovia, and thirdly into Ireland, about affairs of the State; such opinion was then held of his good endeavours. And, for my own part, ever since the days of Queen Elizabeth, I have been nearly acquainted with him; he was my Pupil at Oxford, and a very towardsly one; and this knowledge each of other, hath continued unto this time. He calleth me Father, and I term his Wife my Daughter; his eldest Son is my God-son, and their Children are, in love, accounted my Grandchildren.

The second that I have heard named, was Sir Francis Harrington, a Gentleman whom, for divers years, I have not seen, and who, for ought I know, was never in my House but once in his life.

The third was Sir Thomas Wentworth, who had occasion to send unto me, and sometimes to see me, because we were joynt Executors to Sir George Savile, who married his Sister, and was my Pupil at Oxford; to whose Son also, Sir Thomas Wentworth and I were Guardians, as may appear in the Court of Wards, and many things passed between us in that behalf; yet, to my remembrance, I saw not this Gentleman but once in these three quarters of a year last past; at which time he came to seek his Brother-in-law, the Lord Clifford, who was then with me at Dinner at Lameth.

For one of the punishments laid upon me, it was told me by the Lord Conway, That I must meddle no more with the High Commission; and accordingly, within a few days after, a Warrant is sent to the Attorney General, that the Commission must be renewed, and the Archbishop must be left out: This under-hand being buzzed about the Town, with no small mixture of spight, I conceived it to be agreeable to the proceedings with the Lords and Gentlemen which refused to contribute to the Loan, they all being laid aside in the Commissions for Lieutenancy, and the Peace, in their several Countreys. For my part, I had no cause to grieve at this, since it was his Majesties pleasure; but it was by the Actors therein understood otherwise, they supposing that this power gave me the more Authority and Splendor in the Church and Commonwealth.

To deliver therefore truly the state of this question, it cannot be denied, but that it was a great point of Policy, for the establishing of Order in the Ecclesiastical, and consequently Civil Estate also, to erect such a Court, whereby Church-men that exorbitated in any grievous manner, might be castigated, and rectified; and such sort of crimes in the Laity might be censured, as were of Ecclesiastical Cognizance. And verily this is of great use in the Kingdom, as well for the cherishing the Study of the Civil Law, as otherwise: so that it be kept incorruptible, and with that integrity, as so grave a Meeting and Assembly requireth. That was principally my care, who took much pains, and spent much money, that in fair and commendable sort, Justice was indifferently administered to all the King's people that had to do with us: But every one might see, that this was to my singular trouble; for besides that to keep things in a streight course, sometimes in fits of Gout, I was forced by my Servants to be carried into the Court, where I could not speak much, but with difficulty; I was at no time free from Petitions, from Examinations, from signing of Warrants, to call some, to release others, from giving way to speeding and forwarding Acts of Courts; Suitors, as their fashion is, being so importunate, as that in Summer and Winter, in the day and in the night, in sickness and health, they would not be denied.

These things were daily dispatched by me out of Duty, and more out of Charity, no allowance of Pay being from the King, or of Fee from the Subject, to us that were the Judges: Nay, I may say more, the holding of that Court in such a sort as I did, was very expenceful to me out of my private Purse, in giving weekly entertainment to the Commissioners; the reason whereof was this: King James being desirous, when he made me Archbishop, that all matters should gravely and honourably be carried, directed me, that I should always call some of the Bishops, that were about London, and some Divines and Civilians, that by a good presence, Causes might be handled for the reputation of the Action; and willed me withal to imitate therein the Lord Archbishop Whigist, who invited weekly some of the Judges to Dinner, the rather Anno rather to allure them thither. This advice proceeded from the Bishop of Durham that now is, 1627. which was not ill, if it came from a good intention.

The High Commissioners chargeable to the Archbishop.

I obeyed it singly, and did that which was enjoined: But whereas in those times the Commissioners were but few, since that time there hath been such an inundation of all sorts of men into that Company, that without proportion, both Lords Spiritual and Temporal, Commissioners and not Commissioners, resorted thither, and divers of them brought so many of their men, that it was truly a burthen to me. I think it may by my Officers be justified upon Oath, That since I was Arch-bishop, the thing alone hath cost me out of my private Estate one thousand pounds and a half, and if I did say two thousand pounds, it were not much amiss, besides all the trouble of my Servants; who neither directly, nor indirectly, gained six pence thereby in a whole year, but only travel and pains for their Master's honour, and of that they had enough: My house being like a great Hostelry every Thursday in the Term; and for my Expences, no man giving me so much as thanks.

Now this being the true Case, if the Church and Common-wealth be well provided for in the Administration of Justice, and regard be had of the Publick, can any discreet man think, that the removing of me from this molestation, is any true punishment upon me? I being one that have framed my self to Reality, and not to Opinion, and growing more and more in years, and consequently into weakness, having before surfeited so long of worldly shews, whereof nothing is truly gained temporally, but vexation of spirit; I have had enough of these things, and do not dote upon them: The World, I hope, hath found me more stayed and reserved in my courses.

Nevertheless, whatsoever was expedient for this, was dispatched by me while I lived at Lambeth and Croyden, albeit I went not out of door.

Yea, but you were otherwise inutile, not coming to the Star-Chamber, nor to the Council-Table.

The Archbishop's infirmity permitted him not to come to the Star-Chamber, or Council-Table.

My pain, or weakness, by the Gout, must excuse me herein. When I was younger, and had my health, I so diligently attended at the Star-Chamber, that for full seven years I was not one day wanting. And for the Council-Table, the same reason of my Indisposition may satisfy: But there are many other things that do speak for me. The greatest matters there handled, were for Money, or more attempts of War: For the one of these, we of the Clergy had done our parts already; the Clergy having put themselves into Payments of Subsidy, by an Act of Parliament, not only for these two last years, when the Temporality lay in a sort dry, but yet there are three years behind, in which our Payments run on with weight enough unto us; and no man can justly doubt, but my hand was in those Grants in a principal fashion.

And concerning the Provisions for War, I must confess mine ignorance in the Feats thereof; I knew not the grounds whereupon the Controversies were entered in general: I thought, that before Wars were begun, there should be store of Treasure; That it was not good to fall out with many great Princes at once; That the turning of our Forces another way, must needs be some diminution from the King of Denmark, who was engaged by us into the Quarrel for the Palatinate and Germans, and hazarded both his Person and Dominions in the prosecution of the Question. These matters I thought upon, as one that had sometimes been acquainted with Councils; but I kept my thoughts unto my self.

Again, I was never sent for to the Council-Table, but I went, saving one time, when I was so ill, that I might not stir abroad.

Moreover, I was sure that there wanted no Counsellors at the Board, the number being so much increased as it was. Besides, I had no great encouragement to thrust my crazy Body abroad, since I saw what little esteem was made of me in those things which belonged to mine own Occupation; with Bishopricks, and Deanries, or other Church-places, I was no more acquainted than if I had dwelt at Venice, and understood of them but by some Gazette.

The Duke of Buckingham had the managing of these things, as it was generally conceived: For, what was he not fit to determine, in Church, or Common-wealth; in Court, or Council; in Peace, or War; at Land, or at Sea; at home, or in Foreign parts?

Mountague had put out his Arminian Book; I three times complain'd of it, but he was held up against me, and by the Duke, magnified as a well-deserving man.

Cofens put out his Treatise, which they commonly call, [The Seven Sacraments:] which, in the first Edition, had many strange things in it, as it seemeth: I knew nothing of it, but as it pleased my Lord of Durham, and the Bishop of Bath: So the World did read.

We were wont in the High-Commission, to repress obstinate and busie Papists: In the end of King James his time, a Letter was brought me under the Hand and Signet of the King, That we must not meddle with any such matter, nor exact the twelve pence for the Sunday of those which came not to the Church, (with which Forfeit we never meddled.) And this was told us to be in contemplation of a Marriage intended with the Lady Mary, the Daughter of France.

After the death of King James, such another Letter was brought from King Charles, and all Executions against Papists was suspended. But when the Term was at Reading, by open divulgation in all Courts, under the Great Seal of England, We and all Magistrates are set at liberty to do as it was prescribed by Law: And now our Pursuivants must have their Warrants again, and take all the Priests they can; whereof Mr. Cross took fourteen or fifteen in a very short space. Not long after, all these are set free; and Letters come from the King, under his Royal Signet, That all Warrants must be taken from our Messengers, because they spoiled the Catholics, and carried themselves unorderly unto them, especially the Bishop's Pursuivants: Whereas we had in all but two; Cross, my Messenger, for whom I did offer to be answerable; and Thomlinson, for whom my Lord of London (I think) would do as much. But the Caterpillers indeed, were the Pursuivants used by the Secretaries, men of no value, and shifters in the World, who had been punished and turn'd away by us for great misdemeanors.

But truth of Religion and God's Service, was wont to over-rule human Policies, and not to be over-ruled; and I am certain, that things best prosper, where those courses are held. But be what it may be, I could not tell what to make this Variation of the Compass, since it was or commanded unto me to put such and such things in execution. But I never understood any thing of the Counsel, whereby I might give my judgment how fit or unfit they were, or might speak to alter the Tenure, whereunto in former times I had been otherwise used. Variety of Reasons breedeth Variety of Actions.

For the matter of the Loan, I knew not a long time what to make of it: I was not present when the Advice was taken: I understood not what was the Foundation whereupon the Building was raised, neither did ever any of the Council acquaint me therewith. I saw on the one side the King's necessity for Money, and especially it being resolved, that the War should be pursued; and on the other side I could not forget, that in the Parliament great Sums were offered, if the Petitions of the Commons might be hearkened unto. It ran still in my mind, That the old and usual way was best; That in Kingdoms the Harmony was sweetest, where the Prince and the People turned well together; That, whatsoever pretence of Greatness, he was but an unhappy man, that set the King and the Body of the Realm at division; That the People (though not fit to be too much cockered, yet) are they, that must pray, that must pay, that must fight for their Princes; That it could not be, that a man so universally hated in the Kingdom as the Duke was, must, for the preservation of himself, desperately adventure on any thing, if he might be hearkened unto.

These Meditations I had with my self; and, God knoweth, I frequently in my Prayers did beg, That he, whom these things did most concern, would seriously think upon them. It ran in my mind, that this new device for Money could not long hold out; That then we must return into the High-way, whither it were best to retire our selves betimes, the shortest Errors being the best. But these thoughts I suppressed within my Soul; neither did I ever discourage any man from Lending, nor encourage any man to hold back: which I confidently avouch.

At the opening of the Commission for the Loan, I was sent for from Croyden. It seemed to me a strange thing; but I was told there, That howsoever it shewed, the King would have it so, there was no speaking against it. I have not heard, that men throughout the Kingdom should lend Money against their will; I knew not what to make of it: But when I saw the Instructions, the Refusers should be sent away for Souldiers to the King of Denmark, I began to remember Urias, that was set in the Fore-front of the Battel; and, to speak truth, I durst not be tender in it. And when afterwards I saw, that men were to be put to their Oath, with whom they had had conference, and whether any did dissuade them; And yet further beheld, that divers were to be imprisoned: I thought this was somewhat a New World. Yet all this while I swallowed my own spittle, and spake nothing of it to any man. Nay, when after some trial in Middlesex, the first Sitting was for Surrey in my House at Lambeth, and the Lords were there assembled with the Justices of the whole County, I gave them entertainment in no mean fashion: and I sate with them, albeit I said nothing; for the confusion was such, that I knew not what to make of it: Things went on every day, and speech was, of much Money to be raised out of some Counties; yet afterwards it was not so readily paid, as preferred; and at length some refused even in London it self, and Southwark, besides many Gentlemen of special rank, and some Lords, as it was said. And though it was reported, that they were but a contemptible company, yet the Prisons in London demonstrated, that they were not a very few, but persons both of note and number. The Judges besides concurring another way, That they could not allow the Legality of the Demand, and the Enforcement that is used thereupon, did somewhat puzzle me for being too busie in promoting of that, for which I might one day suffer. Yet hitherto I remained silent, hoping that time would break that off, which was almost come to an absolute period. But instead of this, by the permission of God, I was called up to the King to look clearly into the Question. When the allowance of Sibthorp's Pamphlet was put upon me, I then had some reason, out of the grounds of that Sermon, to fear, (and I pray God that my fear was in vain) that the Duke had a purpose to turn upside-down the Laws, and the whole Fundamental Courses, and Liberties of the Subject, and to leave us not under the Statutes and Customs which our Progenitors enjoyed, but to the pleasure of Princes; of whom, as some are gentle and benign, so some others, to ingreat themselves, might strain more than the string will bear.

Besides, now it came in my heart, that I was present at the King's Coronation, where many things on the Prince's part were solemnly promised; which being observed, would keep all in order, and the King should have a loving and faithful people, and the Commons should have a kind and gracious King. The contemplation of these things made me stay my Judgment; not any unwillingness to do my Prince any dutiful service, whom I must and do honour above all the Creatures in the World, and will adventure as far for his true good, as any one whatsoever. But I am loath to plunge my self over head and ears in these difficulties, that I can neither live with quietness of Conscience, nor depart out of the World with good fame and estimation. And perhaps my Sovereign, if hereafter he looked well into this Paradox, would, of all the World, hate me, because one of my Profession, Age, and Calling, would deceive him, and with base flattery swerve from the Truth. The hearts of Kings are in the hand of God, and he can turn them as the Rivers of Water.

I draw to a conclusion; only repute it not amiss (because so much falleth in here) to observe a few words of the Duke of Buckingham, not as now he is, but as he was in his rising. I say nothing of his being in France, because I was not present, and divers others there be that remember it well; but I take him at his first repair to Court. King James, for many insolencies, grew weary of Somerset; and the Kingdom groaning under the Triumvirate of Northampton, Suffolk, and Somerset, (though Northampton soon after died) was glad to be rid of him. We could have no way so good to effectuate that which was the common desire, as to bring in another in his room; one Nail (as the Proverb is) being to be driven out by another. It was now observed, that the King began to cast his eye upon George Villiers, who was then Cup-bearer, and seemed a modest and courteous Youth. But King James had a fashion, that he would never admit any to nearness about himself, but such an one as the Queen should commend unto him, and make some suit on his behalf; that if the Queen afterwards, being ill treated, should complain of this Dear one, he might make his answer, It is long of your self, for you were the party that commended him unto me. Our old Master took Anno: delight strangely in things of this nature.

Cur. 3.

The Archbishop's observation concerning the rise of the Duke.

1627. That Noble Queen (who now resteth in Heaven) knew her Husband well; and having been bitten with Favourites both in England and Scotland, was very shie to adventure upon this request. King James, in the mean time, more and more loathed Somerset, and did not much conceal it, that his affection increased towards the other; but the Queen would not come to it, albeit divers Lords (whereof some are dead, and some yet living) did earnestly solicit her Majesty thereunto. When it would not do, I was very much moved to put to my helping hand, they knowing, that Queen Anne was graciously pleased to give me more credit than ordinary, which all her attendants knew she continued till the time of her death. I laboured much, but could not prevail; the Queen oft saying to me, My Lord, you and the rest of your friends know not what to do: I know your Master better than you all; for if this young man be once brought in, the first persons that he will plague, must be you that labour for him; yea, I shall have my part also: The King will reach him to despise and hardly intreat us all, that he may seem to be beholden to none but himself. Noble Queen! how like a Prophetess or Oracle did you speak!

Notwithstanding this, we were still instant, telling her Majesty, that the Change would be for the better: For George was a good nature, which the other was not; and if he should degenerate, yet it would be a long time before he were able to attain to that height of evil, which the other had. In the end, upon importunity, Queen Anne condescended, and so pressed it with the King, that he assented thereunto: Which was so stricken while the Iron was hot, that in the Queens Bed-Chamber, the King Knighted him with the Rapi-er which the Prince did wear. And when the King gave order to swear him of the Bed-Chamber, Somerset, who was near, importuned the King with a Message, that he might be only sworn a Groom: But my self and others that were at the door, sent to her Majesty, that she would perfect her work, and cause him to be sworn a Gentleman of the Chamber. There is a Lord or two living that had a hand in this achievement; I diminish nothing of their praise for so happy a work: But I know my own part best; and, in the word of an honest man, I have reported nothing but truth. George went in with the King; but no sooner he got loose, but he came forth unto me into the Privy-gallery, and there embraced me: he professed, that he was so infinitely bound unto me, that all his life-long he must honour me as his Father. And now he did beseech me, that I would give him some lessons how he should carry himself. When he earnestly followed this chace, I told him I would give him three short Lessons, if he would learn them. The first was, That daily upon his knees he should pray to God to bless the King his Master, and to give him (George) grace, studiously to serve and please him. The second was, That he should do all good offices between the King and the Queen, and between the King and the Prince. The third was, That he should fill his Masters ears with nothing but Truth. I made him repeat these three things unto me, and then I would have him to acquaint the King with them, and so tell me, when I met him again, what the King said unto him. He promised me he would; and the morrow after, Mr. Tho. Murry, the Prince's Tutor, and I, standing together in the Gallery at White-hall, Sir George Villiers coming forth, and drawing to us, he told Mr. Murry how much he was beholden unto me, and that I had given him certain Instructions; which I prayed him to rehearse, as indifferently well he did before us; yea, and that he had acquainted the King with them, who said, They were Instructions worthy of an Arch-bishop to give to a young man. His countenance of thankfulness for a few daies continued, but not long, either to me, or any others his Well-wishers. The Roman Historian Tacitus hath somewhere a note, That Benefits, while they may be requited, seem Courtesies; but when they are so high that they cannot be repaid, they prove matters of Hatred.

Thus, to lie by me, to quicken my remembrance, I have laid down the Cause and the Proceedings of my sending into Kent, where I remain at the writing of this Treatise: Praying God to bless and guide our King aright; To continue the Prosperity and welfare of this Kingdom, which at this time is shrewdly shaken; To send good and worthy men to be Governours of our Church; To prosper my mind and body, that I may do nothing that may give a wound to my Conscience; and then to send me patience quietly to endure whatsoever his Divine Majesty shall be pleased to lay upon me; Da quod jubes, & jube quod vis! And in the end to give me such a happy deliverance, either in life or death, as may be most for his glory, and for the wholesome example of others, who look much on the Actions and Passions of Men of my Place.

'Several Gentleman, as you have heard, were imprisoned upon their refusal of the Loan, and five of them brought their Habeas Corpus, viz. Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Hevingham, Sir Edward Hampden.

'In Michaelmas Term, 3 Caroli, a Return was made of their several Commitments. [To instance only in one, all the rest being in the same form.] The Warden of the Fleet made this Return,

'That Sir Walter Earl, Knight, named in the Writ, is detained in the Prison of the Fleet in his Custody, by Special Command of the King, to him signified by Warrant of several of the Privy-Council, in these words:

'Whereas Sir Walter Earl, Knight, was heretofore committed to your Custody, These are to will and require you still to detain him, letting you know, that both his first Commitment, and direction for the continuance of him in Prison, were, and are, by his Majesties special Commandment.

From White-hall,
Nov. 7. 1627.

Tho. Coventrey.

Because this hath been a cause much disputed amongst our Lawyers whether a Commitment per Speciale mandatum Domini Regis be good in Law or not, the Proceedings and Judgment of the Judges herein you have in the Historical Collections, as followeth:

Sir Thomas Darnel was the first that was brought to the Bar upon that Writ, where the King's Attorney-general, Sir Robert Heath, did inform the Court, that his Majesty told him, He heard, that some of the imprisoned Gentlemen for the Loan did report, That the King did deny them the course

Anno 1627. course of Justice; and therefore his Majesty commanded him to renew the Writ of Habeas Corpus, lest they would not move for another themselves, by reason the Warden of the Fleet had not returned the first according to his duty.

To this, Sir Thomas Darnel replied, that such words never came into his thoughts: and did humbly pray, they might make no impression upon the Court to the disparagement of his Cause; for he was accused of that he was in no manner guilty of. Upon which Sir Nicholas Hyde, Chief Justice, said, That he had made a fair and temperate Answer; And you may perceive (said the Chief Justice) the upright and sincere proceedings which have been in this business: You no sooner moved for a Habeas Corpus, but it was granted you; you no sooner desired Counsel, but they were assigned you, though any Counsel might move for you without being assigned, and should have had no blame for it: The King's pleasure is, his Law should take place and be executed, and for that do we sit here; and whether the Commitment be by the King or others, this Court is the place where the King doth sit in person to do right, if injury be done: And we have power to examine it; and if it appear that any man hath wrong done him by his Imprisonment, we have power to deliver and discharge him; if otherwise, he is to be remanded by us to Prison again. And the Attorney-General, after the Chief Justice had spoken, said, Though this be a Case which concerns the King in an high degree, yet he hath been so gracious and so just, as not to refuse the Examination and Determination thereof according to the Laws of the Kingdom.

Then the Court proceeded to hear the Arguments made in the Prisoners behalf. Mr. Noy argued for Sir Walter Earl, Sergeant Bramston for Sir John Heveningham, Mr. Selden for Sir Edward Hampden, Mr. Calthrop for Sir John Corbet, who were all assigned of Counsel with the Prisoners by the Court of King's-Bench, upon a Petition delivered by them to that purpose. After they had argued, Mr. Attorney had a day appointed to argue for the King. It is not our intention to take up the Reader's time with the Arguments at large, either by the one side or the other: We shall only hint unto you some Generals, chiefly concerning the form of the Return of the Writ. The first Exception taken by the Council for the imprisoned Gentlemen, was to the form of the Return.

1. For that the Return is not positive, but referred to the signification made by another, (by the Lords of the Council.)
2. The Keepers of the Prisons have not return'd the Cause of the Commitment, but the Cause of the Cause; which they held not to be good.
3. That the Return of the Commitment is imperfect, for that it sheweth only the Cause of the detaining in Prison, and not the Cause of the first Commitment.

Lastly, That the Return is contradictory in itself: For that in the first part thereof it is certified, that the detaining of those Gentlemen in Prison is per speciale mandatum Domini Regis; and when the Warrant of the Lords of the Council is shewn, it appeareth, that the Commitment is by the Command of the King, signified by the Lords of the Council.

The second general Exception was to the matter of the Return; and that was touching the imprisonment, per speciale mandatum Domini Regis;

by the Lords of the Council, without any Cause expressed. Wherefore, said Mr. Selden, by the constant and settled Laws of this Kingdom (without which, we having nothing) no man can be justly imprisoned, either by the King or Council, without a Cause of the Commitment; and that ought to be expressed in the Return. The Law saith expressly, No Free-man shall be imprisoned without due Process of the Law: Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur nisi per legem terræ, &c. And in the Charter of King John there are these words, Nec eum in carcerem mittemus, We will not commit him to Prison; that is, The King himself will not.

This Right (saith Sergeant Bramston) is the onely means that a Subject hath, whereby to obtain his liberty; and the end of it is, to return the Cause of the Imprisonment, that it may be examined in this Court, whether the Parties ought to be discharged or not: Which cannot be done upon this Return; for the Cause of the Imprisonment is so far from appearing particularly by it, that there is no Cause at all expressed: And the Writ requires, that the Cause of the Imprisonment should be return'd, and the Cause ought to be expressed so far, as that it ought to be none of those Causes, for which, by the Laws of the Kingdom, the Subject ought not to be imprisoned; and it ought to be expressed, that it was by Presentment or Indictment, or upon Petition or Suggestion made unto the King. For (said he) observe but the consequence: If those Gentlemen who are committed, without any Cause shewn, should not be Bailed, but remanded; the Subjects of the Kingdom may be restrained of their Liberty for ever, and by Law there can be no remedy. We shall not reflect upon the present time and Government; but we are to look what may betide us in time to come hereafter. The Laws are called the great Inheritance of every Subject, and the Inheritance of Inheritances, without which, we have nothing that deserves the name of Inheritance.

If upon a Habeas Corpus a Cause of Commitment be certified, then (said Mr. Noy) the Cause is to be tried before your Lordships; but if no Cause be shewn, the Court must do that which standeth with Law and Justice, and that is, to deliver the Party. The Commons did complain in Edw. 3. his time, that the Great Charter, and other Statutes, were broken; They desired, that for the good of himself and his People, they may be kept and put in execution, and not infringed, by making any Arrest by Special Command, or otherwise. And the Answer which was given them, was this, That the said Great Charter and other Statutes should be put in execution according to the Petition, without disturbance of Arrests by Special Command; and the King granteth the Commons desire in the same words, as they were expressed in their Petition. And afterwards complaining again, That notwithstanding this Answer of the King, they were imprisoned by Special Command, without Indictment, or other legal course of Law; the King's Answer was, upon another Petition unto him, That he was therewith well pleased; and for the future he added further, If any man be grieved, let him complain, and Right shall be done. And forasmuch as it doth not appear to the Court, that there was any cause of the Commitment of these Members, no Charge against them, no Indictment or Process according to the Laws: Wherefore Mr. Noy prayed they might be no longer detained in Prison, but be Bailed or Discharged.

Anno 1627. Mr. Attorney had told you, That the King hath done it; and we trust him in great matters: And we make no doubt but the King, if you seek to him, knowing the cause why you are imprisoned, will have mercy; but we leave that, we must not counsel you: If in Justice we ought to deliver you, we would do it; but upon these Grounds, Records, Presidents, and Resolutions, cited and produced, the Court is of opinion, they cannot deliver you, but you must be remanded.

About this time not only the Pens and Tongues of Foraigners; but of our Male-contents at home, were set on work purposely to cast a blemish upon the Duke's conduct of Affairs in the Isle of Rhee, many were dissatisfied, saith the Collector, with the Civilities that passed between Toras and the Duke: but more at home, and upon better grounds, were offended with the Earl of Holland's stay, the wind serving, not bringing the Supplies to the Duke in due time, whereby the Siege in the Isle might have been strengthened and continued, and the Passes into the Island sufficiently guarded, which would have infallibly prevented any relief from going to the besieged. These Ships were ready partly at Plymouth under the Lord Wilmot; and part at Charham under the Earl of Holland, who failing as before of his time to attend the Wind, and the King coming from his Summer Progress, finds him in Portsmouth Road, where he received the News, That his Majesty had ordered Wilmot to be gone for Rhee with his Squadron, and that Holland might now stay his own leisure. Now when it was too late, he makes hast and gets to Plymouth aboard the Fleet, and weighs; and in his way meets the Duke not at all pleased with his delays in bringing the Supplies, but upon his remonstrance and submission, at last the Duke permits him to come from Portsmouth, where he was ordered to stay under the notion of ordering the Ships and Souldiers there, which gave Holland good reason to expect to feel the effects of his ruin, had not, as before, his submission prevented. The French had got into the Isle with Provisions, and Sir John Burroughs going to view the Works was wounded by a shot, whereof he dyed: a Person much lamented both for his valour and conduct. In the mean time Sir Pierce Crosby, and others, with about one thousand six hundred English and Irish arrive in the Duke's Camp; and Toras being streightned, and in want now more than ever, sends out Sir Greene to the French King with advice of his Condition, who escaped our Guards, & came to the K. in his Leaguer against Rochel, who dispatch'd away some small Vessels with relief for Toras in the Cittadel for some small time; and presently after being near at hand under the advantage of the little Fort in the Isle, at first neglected to be taken in, got in more Provision into the Citadel, whereon they subsisted till the end of the Siege. At last the Rochellers after some difference amongst themselves, put forth their Manifesto and declare for England; and the Duke of Rohan gives out Commissions to the same purpose, and declares in preservation of the two Edicts of Peace, and of nothing farther than that they be observed. On the other side, the French declares he will observe the said Edicts, and Rohan and Sobiez to be Traitors, and whoever should kill the later, shall be accounted noble. Toras again desires a Treaty of the Duke, whilst the French had from the Spaniard got a great Supply of Shipping, making in all one hundred Sail, exceeding the English Navy in number, but durst not engage ours. Toras desires from the Duke leave

Car. 3. to send a Gentleman to the French King; the Duke consents so as he might send along with him a Gentleman to have safe conduct through France into England, but he was detained by the French; and hereupon the other was not permitted to go into the Citadel; who, however, acquainted the French King sufficiently how things stood with Toras in the Citadel, who again renews the Treaty, pretending that if relief came not by such a day and hour, he would deliver the Citadel and Island: In the interval relief got in, and the Ship which brought the fresh Men and Provisions carried off the sick and wounded, whilst those within drew over the Works all sorts of Provisions upon their Pikes heads, and that they wanted nothing. The Duke goes on to Mine and Battery, when he receives news that more Forces were Landed under the Meadow Castle in the Island to encounter with the English, who draw out of their Trenches, & beat them under the security of that Castle, and regain'd their own Trenches, seized by the besieged, in which Actions many mens lives were lost on both sides. And now Winter coming on, it being about the middle of October, the Duke hath thoughts of returning homewards, which being communicated to Sobiez he saith, that the Earl of Holland is coming with recruits, that the loss of Rochel would be the consequence of that retreat, that it would be to the dishonour of the King of Great Britain. Upon such entreaty the Duke continues the Siege, and Storms the Citadel and Forts on the sixth of October; but all in vain, for they were on all sides inaccessible, and the Citadel was re-inforced with fresh men and Provisions; hereupon the Duke raises the Siege and retreats, and was followed by the French, who were equal to ours in Foot, and much superiour to ours in Horse, yet dared they not to engage ours in the plain Field, who several times drew up for that purpose, and proffered them the Battel; but no sooner were they entered the narrow Cawsey (having not secured it by a Fort) but the enemy engageth our Rear, and the Horse being but weak, disordered our Foot, which the enemy took the advantage of, and followed them close, and many were drowned in the Salt Pits and Ditches on each side the Cawsey, and the Crowd was so great on the Bridge, upon the Enemies close pursuit, that many were drowned in the River. And notwithstanding all these disadvantages, the English Rally and drew up to Fight the Enemy, but Mon-sieur retreats over the Bridge, declining any further engagement, though he had so great advantage: the loss of the English was considerable, and the more to be lamented, that the terms whereupon he engaged were so unequal.

This, in short, is a true Account of that Action in the Isle of Rhee, betwixt the French Rhodamantades of Jenardus the Parisian Advocate, and our own Male-contents, who delighted ever to make all things worse on the one side, and the most partial accounts which were given thereof after the Duke's return by ours on the other hand. In very truth, the fault lay hard upon the Earl of Holland for not coming with the Supplies, though he pretended the stay of the Ships at Charham, and that the Winds did not serve, &c. And now great were the Complaints of the Mariners for their Pay, some being in Arrears for three years, that the Enemies came into our Harbour, survey our Rivers, and the Fishermen can scarce look out: A vast number of our Ships have been lost and taken in the three years past, and the Merchants cease to build more, because they were prest for the

Anno King's service at a low rate, and not paid; and 1627. the Mariners flee from their own employment, fearing to be prest again; and our Enemies grow upon us, especially in the Eastern Countries.

And the Rochellers send their Deputies humbly to remonstrate their weak, distressed, and low Condition to his Majesty; wherein they gave his Majesty most humble thanks for the great assistance and comfort they had received by the Fleet sent in July last, whereof the Duke of Buckingham was Admiral, which would have been of greater assistance unto them, had the season of the year permitted their stay longer there, or that the supply of Victuals and Ammunition had come unto them which his Majesty had assigned. That they are given to understand, that there is application made to the King of Denmark, to propound the making of a Peace between the two Crowns of England and France, a thing to be wished (if really intended :) But the Proceedings of France with the Reformed Churches there, have hitherto been such, as when they speak most fair, and nothing but Peace uttered, nothing less was intended, and great advantages thereby have been taken against the Reformed Churches. But in case the Treaty do proceed, they humbly prayed, that then his Majesty will be pleased to insist upon the Capitulation which was made upon his mediation, and for which he pass'd his word, that the Reformed Churches should perform on their part, which they kept inviolable, till there were Forces placed and kept in Forts against them, contrary to Capitulation, and more Forces drawn down, in order to the reduction of the Remonstrants, and a Fleet unexpectedly come upon them, to destroy their Navigation, when nothing on their part was offered in violation of the Treaty.

They did further remonstrate, That now the Forces of France are breaking down apace about them, totally to block them up by Land, and do intend to make a Barricado cross the Channel, leaving a narrow passage for the flux and reflux of the Sea, and by that means to stop all manner of Provisions by Sea; which evidently remonstrates their further ruin, if they, with all expedition, have not succour and help from his Majesty of Great Britain: For their necessities and straits are very great already, by reason their Magazines are consumed, their Moneys spent, and the Inhabitants reduced to small allowances. And therefore do beseech his Majesty, with all possible diligence to send them supply of all sorts of Provisions fit for a Siege, and to succour them once more with the Navy-Royal to interrupt the blocking up of the River; otherwise they are inevitably lost. And lastly, they did humbly beseech his Majesty, and the Lords of his Council, to have also so far pity of their indigency and need, as to permit a general Collection to be made in England and Scotland, of such persons, whom God shall move to contribute to their succour and relief. And declare, that they are resolved still to hold out, hoping yet a relief would come that might be of advantage unto them; and they were assured thereof by the Duke of Buckingham at his departure, that he would once more come in person to their assistance.

Hereupon Sir Robert Cotton's advice was desired concerning the present posture of Affairs, which was as followeth:

AS soon as the House of Austria had incorporated it self with Spain, and by their new discoveries gotten to themselves the Wealth of the Indies, they began to affect, and have ever since pursued a Fifth Monarchy. The Emperour Charles would lay the first Foundation of Italy, by surprising Rome: From this he was thrust by force, and respect of Religion, Hen. 8. being made Caput Fœderis against him. He then attempted High-Germany, practising by faction and force to reduce them first to Petty-States, and so to his absolute power. In this, Hen. 8. again prevented him, by laying the Lutheran Princes under his Confederacy and Assistance. His Son, the Second Philip, pursued the same Ambition in the Netherlands of Germany, by reduction whereof, he intended to make his way further into the others. This the late Queen of England interrupted, by siding with the afflicted People on the one part, and making herself the Head of the Protestant League with the Princes, on the other part, drawing in secret of State the countenance of France, to give the more reputation of assistance to them, and security to it self.

Spain seeing his hopes thus fruitless by these unions, and straits, began first to break, if he might, the Amity of France and England: but finding the common danger to be a fast tie, he raiseth up a party in that Kingdom of his own; by which the French King was so distressed, that had not the English Council assisted and relieved him, Spain had there removed that next and greatest Obstacle of his Ambition.

His Council now tells him from these examples, That the way to his great work is impossible, so long as England lay a let in his way; and adviseth him, that the remove of that obstacle be the first of his intents. This drew on those often secret practices against the person of the Queen, and his open fury in Eighry Eight against the Body of the State: Which she perceiving, following the advice of a free Council, would never after admit of a Peace; winning thereby the hearts of a loving People, who ever found hands and money for all occasions at home, and keeping sacredly all her Alliances abroad, securing to her Confederates, all her time, freedom from fear of Spanish slavery, and so ended her old and happy daies in glory.

Spain then, by the wisdom and power of that great Lady, dispoiled so of his means to hurt, though not of his desires, makes up with her peaceful Successor, of happy memory, that Golden League; that disarming us at home by the opinion of Security, and giving them a power in our Councils, by believing their Friendships and pretended Marriage, gave them way to cherish amongst us a Party of their own, and benefit of power abroad to lead in Jealousie and some Division between us and our Confederates: By which, we see, they have swallowed up the Fortune of your Majesty's Brothers Estate, with the rest of the Imperial States; distressed the King of Denmark by that quarrel; diverted Sweden's assistance by the Wars with the Pole, and moving them now with offer of the Danish Crown; and now (whether from the Plot of our Fatality) hath cast such a bone between France and us, as hath made themselves, by our quarrel of Religion, a fast Confederate, and us a dangerous Enemy. So as now we are left no other assurance against their malice and ambition, but the Netherlands, where the tie of mutual safety is weakened, by daily discontentments bred and fed between us, by some ill affected 1627. affected to both our securities, that from the doubtfulness of Friendship, as we now stand, we may rather suspect from our own domestick Faction, if they grow too furious, they will rather follow the example of Rome in her growing (that held, that equal safety, honourable and more easie, dare Regnum, than Subjugare Provinciam) considering the power they have in their hands, than to give any friendly assistance to save the present condition of a State. You may therefore see in what terms we stand abroad, and I fear we are at home for resistance in no better state. There must be to withstand a Forreign Invasion, a proportion both of Sea and Land Forces: For to give an Enemy an easie passage, and a Port to relieve him in, is no less than to hazard all at one stake.

And it is to be considered, That no March by Land can be of that speed to make head against the landing of an Enemy. Then that follows, That there is no such prevention, as to be Master of the Sea. To this point of Necessary Defence, there can be no less than Two hundred and forty thousand pounds.

For the Land Forces, if it were for an Offensive War, the men of less livelyhood were the best spared; and we used formerly to make such War Purgamenta Reipub. if we made no further purchase by it. But for the safety of a Commonwealth, the wisdom of all times did never intrust the Publick Cause to any other than to such as had a portion in the Publick Adventure. And that we saw in Eighty Eight, when the care of the Queen and of the Council did make the body of that large Army no other than of the Trained Bands, which with the Auxiliaries of the whole Realm, amounted to no less than Twenty four thousand men. Neither were any of these drawn from forth their Country and proper Habitations, before the end of May, that they might be no long grievance to the Publick; such discontentments being to us a more fatal Enemy, than any Forreign Forces.

The careful distributing and directing of their Sea and Land Forces, being more fitting for a Council of War, than a private man to advise of, I pass over; yet shall ever be willing and ready, when I shall be called, humbly to offer up such Observations, as I have gathered by the former like occasion in this Realm.

To make up this Preparation, there are requisite two things, Money, and Affections; for they cannot be properly severed. It was well and wisely said of that great and grave Counsellor the Lord Burleigh in the like case, to the late Queen; Win hearts, and you have their hands and purses. And I find that of late, Diffidence hath been in the one, and hath unhappily prevented the other.

In gathering then of Money for this present need, there are three things requisite, Speed, Assurance, and Satisfaction; And the way to gather (as, in other like cases hath been done) must be by the Path-way formerly called Via Regia, being more secure and speedy: For by unknown and untrodden ways, it is both rough and tedious, and never succeedeth well. This last way, although it took place as it were by a supply at first, and received no general denial, yet since, it hath drawn many to consult with themselves and others in the consequence, as it is now conceived a pressure on their Liberties, and against Law; I much fear, if that now again it be offered, either in the same face, or by Privy Seal, it will be refused wholly.

Neither find I that the restraint of the Recusants hath produc'd any other effect, than a stiff resolution in themselves and others to forbear. Besides although it were at the first with some assurance, yet when we consider the Commissions and other forms incident to such like services, as that how long it hangs in hand, and the many delays that are, we may easily see that such a sum granted by the Parliament is far sooner and easier levied.

If any will make the succession of times to produce an inevitable necessity to enforce it if denied, whether in general by Excise or Imposition, or in particular on some select persons, which is the custom of some Countries, and so conclude it, as there, for the Publick State, supremâ lege; He must look for this to be told him, That seeing Necessity must conclude always to gather Money; 'tis less speedy or assured than that by a Parliament: The success attendeth the honour of the heedless Multitude, that are full of jealousy and distrust, and so unlike to comply to any unusual Course of Levy, but by force; which if used, the effect is fearful, and hath been fatal to the State. Whereas that by Parliament resteth principally on the Regal person, who may with ease and safety mould them to his fit designs by a gracious yielding to their just Desires and Petitions.

If a Parliament then be the most speedy assurance and safe way, it is fit to conceive what is the fairest way to act and work that to the present need.

First for the time of usual Summons, Forty days, reputed to be too large for this present Necessity, it may be by dating the Writs lessened, since it is no positive Law; so that a care be had that there may be a County-day after the Sheriff hath received the Writ, before the time of sitting. If then the Sum to be levied be once granted and agreed of for the time, there may be in the body of the Grant an Assignment made to the Knights of every County respectively, who under such assurance may safely give Security proportionable to the Receipts, to such as shall adventure in present for the Publick Service any Sums of Money.

The last and weightiest Consideration, if a Parliament be thought fit, is, How to remove and comply the Differences between the King and Subject in their mutual Demands. And what I have learned amongst the better sort of the Multitude, I will freely declare, that your Lordships may be the more enabled to remove and answer those Distrusts, that either concern Religion, publick safety of the King and State, or the just Liberty of the Commonwealth.

Religion is a matter that they lay nearest to their Consciences, and they are led by this ground of jealousy to doubt some practises against it. First, for that though the Spanish Match was broken by the careful industry of my Lord of Buckingham, out of his religious care (as he then declared) that the Articles there demanded might lead to some such Sufferance as might endanger the quiet, if not the state of the Reformed Religion here; yet there have (when he was an Actor principal in the Conditions of France) as hard, if not worse to the preservation of our Religion, passed, than those with Spain. And the suspect is strengthened by the close keeping of this agreement, and doubt in them of his affection, in that his Mother and others, many his Ministers of near employment about him, are so affected.

They talk much of his advancing men Popishly devoted, devoted, to places in the Camp of nearest service and chief Command; and that the Recusants have got these late years by his power, more courage and assurance than before.

Car. 3.

If to clear these doubts, (which perhaps are worse in fancy than in truth) he takes a course, it might much advance the Publick Service against the squeamish humours, that have more of violent Passion than of settled Judgment, and are not the least of the opposite number in the Commonwealth.

The next is the late misfortunes and losses of Men, Munition, and Honour in the late Undertakings abroad; which the more temperate Spirits impute to want of Council, and the more sublime Wits to Practice.

They begin with the Palatinate, and lay the fault of the loss thereof on the imputed Credit of Gondomer, distrusting him for the staying of supply to Sir Horatio Vere, when Colonel Cecil was cast on that employment; by which the King of Spain became Master of the King's Childrens Inheritance. And when Count Mansfield had a Royal Supply of Forces to assist the Princes of our party for the recovery thereof, either Plot or Error defeated the enterprise for us to Spain's advantage. That Sir Robert Mansfield's Expedition to Algiers, should purchase only the security and guard of the Spanish Coasts.

To spend many Hundred thousand pounds in the Cadiz Voyage, against the Advice in Parliament, only to warn the King of Spain to be in readiness, and so our selves weakned, is taken for a sign of an ill affection among the Multitude.

The spending of much Munition, Victuals and Money, in my Lord Willoughbies Journey, is counted an unthrifty Error in the Director of it; To disarm our selves in fruitless Voyages, may seem a Plot of danger.

It was held not long ago a fundamental Rule of our Neighbours, and our Security, by the old Lord Burleigh, That nothing can prevent the Spanish Monarchy, but a Fastness of those two Princes, whose Amity gave countenance and courage to the Netherlands and German Princes to make head against his Ambition. And we see, by this disunion, a fearful Defeat hath hapned to the King of Denmark and that party, to the advantage of the Austrian Family.

And this waste of Publick Treasure in fruitless Expeditions, will be an important Cause to hinder any new supply in Parliament.

Another Fear that may disturb the smooth and speedy passage of the King's desire in Parliament, is the vast waste of the King's livelyhood; whereby is like, as in former times, to arise this jealousy and fear, That when he hath not of his own to support his ordinary Charge, for which the Lands of the Crown were settled unalterable, and called Sacrum patrimonium Principis, that then he must needs of necessity rest upon those assistances of the people, which ever were only collected and consigned for the Commonwealth; from whence it is like there will be no great labour and stiffness, to induce his Majesty to an Act of Resumption; since such desires of the State have found an easie way in the Will of all Princes, from the Third Henry unto the last.

But that which is like to pass the deepest into their Disputes and Care, is the late Pressures they supposed to have been done upon the Publick Liberty and Freedom of the Subject, in commanding their Goods without assent by Parliament, imprisoning and confining their Persons without special Cause declared, and that made good against them by the Judges lately, and pretending a Writ to command their attendances in Forreign War; All which they are like to enforce as repugnant to any positive Laws, Institutions, and Customary Immunities of this Commonwealth.

And these dangerous distastes to the People are not a little improved by the unexampled course, as they conceive, of retaining an Inland Army in Winter-season, when former times of general fear, as in Eigbry eight, produced none such; And makes them in their distracted fears to conjecture idly, it was raised wholly to subject their Fortunes to the Will of Power, rather than of Law; and make good some further breach upon their Liberties and Freedoms at home, rather than defend us from any Force abroad. How far such Jealousies, if they meet with any unusual disorder of lawless Soldiers, are an apt distemper of the loose and needy Multitude, which will easily turn away upon any occasion in the State that they can side withal, as a glorious pretence of Religion and Publick safety, when their true end will be only rapine and ruin of all, is worthy a prudent and preventing care.

I have thus far delivered, with that freedom you pleased to admit, such Difficulties as I have taken up amongst the Multitude, as may arrest, if not remove Impediments to any Supply in Parliament. Which how to facilitate, may better become the care of your Judgments, than my Ignorance.

Only I could wish to remove away a personal distaste of my Lord Duke of Buckingham amongst the people: He might be pleased, if there be a necessity of a Parliament, to appear first Adviser thereunto, and of the satisfaction it shall please his Majesty of grace to give at such time to his people; which I would wish to be grounded by president of his best and fortunate Progenitors; And which I conceive will satisfy the desires and hopes of all, if it may appear in some sort to be drawn down from him to the People; by the zealous care and industry that my Lord of Buckingham hath of the publick unity and content. By which there is no doubt but he may remain not only secure from any further quarrel with them, but merit a happy memory amongst them of a zealous Patriot. For, to expiate the passion of the people, at such times, with sacrifice of any of his Majesties Servants, I have found it—as in Ed. 2. Rich. 2. Hen. 6.—no less fatal to the Master than to the Ministers in the end.

A Resolution is now taken for a Parliament, and who so fit to represent the People therein than those Gentlemen who had refused to lend upon the Loan? who were now by order of the Council released; the List and Order followeth:

Orders were also issued out to the Lord Mayor of London, to use moderation in the demanding of the Loan-money, and that all discontents might be removed, the Lord Archbishop Abbot, the Earl of Bristol, and the Bishop of Lincoln, were sum-the Parliament, a Society of Jesuits is said to have been discovered in Clerkenwell, London, and amongst their Papers the Copy of a Letter, written to their Father Rector at Brussels, to this purport following:

A Letter from a Jesuit concerning the ensuing Parliament.

Father Rector,

Let not the damp of Astonishment seize upon your ardent and zealous soul in apprehending the sudden and unexpected Calling of a Parliament: We have not opposed, but rather furthered it; so that we hope as much in this Parliament, as ever we feared any in Queen Elizabeth's days.

You must know the Council is engaged to assist the King by way of Prerogative, in case the Parliamentary

Anno

tary way should fail. You shall see this Parliament will resemble the Pelican, which takes a pleasure to dig out with her beak her own bowels.

The Election of Knights and Burgeses hath been in such confusion of apparent Faction, as that which we were wont to procure heretofore with much Art and Industry (when the Spanish Match was in Treaty) now breaks out naturally as a borch or boil, and spits and spues out its own rankor and venom.

You remember how that famous and immortal Statesman the Count of Gondomer sed King James his fancy, and rocked him asleep with the soft sweet sound of Peace, to keep up the Spanish Treaty. Likewise we were much bound to some Statesmen of our own Countrey, for gaining time by procuring those most advantageous Cessations of Arms in the Palatinate, and advancing the Honour and Integrity of the Spanish Nation, and vilifying the Hollanders; remonstrating to King James, That that State was most ungrateful both to his Predecessor Queen Elizabeth, and his Sacred Majesty; That the States were more obnoxious than the Turk, and perpetually injured his Majesties loving Subjects in the East-Indies, and likewise they have usurped from his Majesty the Regality and unvaluable profit of the Narrow Seas in fishing upon the English Coast, &c.

This great States-man had but one principal means to further their great and good designs, which was to set on King James, that none but the Puritan Faction, which plotted nothing but Anarchy, and his Confusion, were averse to this most happy Union. We steered on the same Course, and have made great use of this Anarchical Election, and have prejudicated and anticipated the Great one, that none but the King's Enemies, and his, are chosen of this Parliament, &c.

We have now many strings to our Bow, and have strongly fortified our Faction, and have added two Bulwarks more: For when King James lived (you know) he was very violent against Arminianism and interrupted (with his pestilent Wit and deep Learning) our strong Designs in Holland, and was a great Friend to that old Rebel and Heretick the Prince of Orange.

Now we have planted that Sovereign Drug Arminianism, which we hope will purge the Protestants from their Heresie; and it flourisheth and bears fruit in due season.

The Materials which build up our Bulwark, are the Projectors and Beggars, of all ranks and qualities: Howsoever, both these Factions cooperate to destroy the Parliament, and to introduce a new species and form of Government, which is Oligarchy.

Those serve as direct Mediums and Instrumens to our end, which is the Universal Catholick Monarchy. Our foundation must be Mutation, and Mutation will cause a Relaxation, which will serve as so many violent diseases; as the Stone, Gout, &c. to the speedy distraction of our perpetual and insufferable anguish of body, which is worse than death it self.

We proceed now by Counsel and mature deliberation, how and when to work upon the Duke's Jealousie and Revenge; And in this we give the honour to those which merit it, which are the Church-Catholicks.

There is another matter of Consequence, which we take much into our consideration and tender care, which is to stave off Puritans, that they hang not in the Duke's ears. They are impudent subtil people.

And it is to be feared lest they should negotiate a Reconciliation between the Duke and the Parliament at Oxford and Westminster; But now we assure our selves we have so handled the matter, that both Duke and Parliament are irreconcilable.

For the better prevention of the Puritans, the Arminians have already lock'd up the Duke's ears; And we have those of our own Religion, which stand continually at the Duke's Chamber, to see who goes in and out: We cannot be too circumspect and careful in this regard.

I cannot choose but laugh to see how some of our own Coat have accounted themselves; you would scarce know them, if you saw them: And 'tis admirable, how in speech and gesture they act the Puritans. The Cambridge Scholars, to their woful experience, shall see we can act the Puritans a little better than they have done the Jesuites: They have abused our sacred Patron Saint Ignatius in jest, but we will make them smart for it in earnest. I hope you will excuse my merry digression; for I confess unto you, I am at this time transported with joy to see how happily all Instruments and Means, as well great as less, cooperate unto our purposes.

But to return unto the main Fabrick: Our foundation is Arminianism; The Arminians and Projectors, as it appears in the premisses, affect mutation. This we second, and enforce by probable Arguments. In the first place we take into consideration the King's honour, and present necessity; and we shew how the King may free himself of his Ward, as Lewis the Eleventh did. And for his great splendor and lustre, he may raise a vast Revenue, and not be beholden to his Subjects; which is by way of Imposition of Excise. Then our Church-Catholicks proceed to shew the means how to settle this Excise, which must be by a Mercenary Army of Horse and Foot. For the Horse, we have made that sure; They shall be Foreigners and Germans, who will eat up the King's Revenues, and spoil the Countrey wheresoever they come, though they should be well paid. What harvock will they make there, when they get no pay, or are not duly paid? They will do more mischief than we hope the Army will do.

We are provident and careful, that this Mercenary Army of Two thousand Horse, and Twenty thousand Foot, shall be taken on and in pay before the Excise be settled. In forming the Excise, the Countrey is most likely to rise: If the Mercenary Army subjugate the Countrey, then the Soldiers and Projectors shall be paid out of the Confiscations; If the Countrey be too hard for the Soldiers, then they must consequently Mutiny, which is equally advantageous unto us. Our superlative design is, to work the Protestants, as well as the Catholicks, to welcome in a Conqueror, and that is by this means: We hope instantly to dissolve Trades, and hinder the building of Shipping, in devising probable Designs, and putting on the State upon Expeditions, as that of Cadiz was, in taking away the Merchant Ships, so that they may not easily catch and light upon the West-India Fleet, &c.

The Parliament Assembled on the Seventeenth of March, and the King spake to them as followeth:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THESE Times are for Action: Wherefore for Examples sake, I mean not to spend much time in Words; expecting accordingly that your (as I hope) good Resolutions will be speedy, not spending time unnecessarily, or (that I may better say) dangerously; For tedious Consultations at this conjuncture of time are as hurtful as ill Resolutions.

The King's Speech at the opening of the Parliament.

Anno 1627. I am sure you now expect from me, both to know the cause of your meeting, and what to resolve on: Yet I think that there is none here but knows that Common danger is the cause of this Parliament, and that Supply at this time is the chief end of it: So that I need but point to you what to do. I will use but few persuasions: For if to maintain your own Advices, and as now the case stands for the following thereof, the true Religion, Laws, and Liberties of this State, and the just Defence of our true Friends and Allies, be not sufficient, then no Elequence of Men or Angels will prevail.

Only let me remember you, That my duty most of all, and every one of yours according to his degree, is to seek the maintenance of this Church and Commonwealth: And certainly, there never was a time in which this duty was more necessarily required, than now.

I therefore judging a Parliament to be the ancient, speediest, and best way in this time of common danger, to give such Supply as to secure our selves, and to save our Friends from imminent ruine, have called you together. Every man now must do according to his Conscience: Wherefore if you (as God forbid) should not do your duties, in contributing what the State at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my Conscience, use those other means, which God hath put into my hands, to save that, which the follies of particular men may otherwise hazard to lose.

Take not this as a Threatning, for I scorn to threaten any but my Equals; but an Admonition from him, that both out of nature and duty, hath most care of your preservations and prosperities: And (though I thus speak) I hope that your demeanours at this time will be such, as shall not only make me approve your former Counsels, but lay on me such obligations, as shall tie me by way of thankfulness to meet often with you: For, be assured, that nothing can be more pleasing unto me, than to keep a good correspondence with you.

I will only add one thing more, and then leave my Lord Keeper to make a short Paraphrase upon the Text I have delivered you, which is To remember a thing, so the end we may forget it. You may imagine that I came here with a doubt of success of what I desire, remembering the distractions of the last Meeting: But I assure you, that I shall very easily and gladly forget and forgive what is past, so that you will at this present time leave the former ways of distractions, and follow the Counsel late given you, To maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of Peace.

And the Lord Keeper on this manner:

The Lord
Keeper's
Speech.

YE are here in Parliament by his Majesties Writ and Royal Command, to consult and conclude of the weighty and urgent Business of this Kingdom. Weighty it is, and great; as great as the honour, safety, and protection of Religion, King, and Countrey; And what can be greater? Urgent it is; It is little pleasure to tell or think how urgent: And to tell it with circumstances, were a long work: I will but touch the sum of it in few words.

The Pope and House of Austria have long affected, the one a Spiritual, the other a Temporal Monarchy: and to effect their ends, to serve each others turn, the House of Austria, besides the rich and vast Territories of both the Indies, and in Africa, joynd together, are become Masters of Spain and Italy, and the great Countrey of Germany. And although France be not under their subjection, yet they have environed it all about; the very bowels of the Kingdom are sway'd by the Popish Faction: They have gotten such a part, and such intercession in the Government, that under pretence of Religion, to root out the Protestants and our Religion, they have drawn the King to their adherence so far, that albeit upon his Majesties interposition by his Ambassadors, and his engagement of his Royal word, there was between the King and his Subjects Articles of Agreement, and the Subjects were quiet; whereof his Majesty, interested in that great Treaty, was bound to see a true accomplishment; yet against that strict Alliance, that Treaty hath been broken, and those of the Religion have been put to all extremity, and undoubtedly will be ruined, without present help. So as that King is not only diverted from assisting the common Cause, but hath been misled to engage himself in Hostile Acts against our King and other Princes, making way thereby for the House of Austria, to the ruine of his own and other Kingdoms.

Other Potentates, that in former times did ballance and interrupt the growing greatness of the House of Austria, are now removed and diverted. The Turk hath made Peace with the Emperor, and turned himself wholly into Wars with Asia: The King of Sweden is embroiled in a War with Poland, which is invented by Spanish practises, to keep that King from succouring our part: The King of Denmark is chased out of his Kingdom on this, and on that side the Sound; so as the House of Austria is on the point to command all the Sea-coasts from Dantzick to Embden, and all the Rivers falling into the Sea in that great extent: so as besides the power by Land, they begin to threaten our Part by Sea, to the subversion of all our State.

In the Baltick Sea, they are providing and arming all the Ships they can build or hire; and have at this time their Ambassadors treating at Lubbeck, to draw into their Service the Ham-Towns, whereby taking from us and our Neighbours the East-land Trade, by which our Shipping is supplied, they expect, without any blow given, to make themselves Masters of that Sea. In these Western parts, by the Dunkirkers, and by the now French and Spanish Admiral, to the ruine of Fishing (of infinite consequence, both to us, and the Low-Countreys) they infest all our Coast, so as we pass not safely from Port to Port. And that Fleet which lately assisted the French at the Isle of Rhee, is now preparing at S. Andrews, with other Ships built in the Coast of Biscay to re-inforce it; and a great Fleet is making ready in Lisbon; where, besides their own, they do serve themselves upon all Strangers Bottoms coming to that Coast for Trade; And these great Preparations are, no doubt, to assault us in England or Ireland, as they shall find advantage, and a place fit for their turn.

Our Friends of the Netherlands, besides the fear that justly troubles them, lest the whole force of the Emperor may fall down upon them, are distracted by their Voyages into the East, which hath carried both Men and Money into another World, and much weakened them at home.

G g

Thus

Anno 1627. Thus are we even ready on all sides to be swallowed up; the Emperor, France, and Spain being in open War against us, Germany over-run, the King of Denmark distressed, the King of Sweden diverted, and the Low-Country-men disabled to give us assurance.

I speak not this to increase fear, unworthy of English Courages, but to press to provision worthy the wisdom of a Parliament: And for that cause his Majesty hath called you hither, that by a timely provision against those great & imminent dangers, our selves may be strengthened at home, our Friends and Allies encouraged abroad, and those great causes of fear scattered and dispelled.

And because in all Warlike preparations, Treasure bears the name, and holds the semblance of the Nerves and Sinews; and if a Sinner be too short or too weak, if it be either shrunk or strained, the part becomes useless: It is needful that you make a good and timely supply of Treasure, without which, all Counsels will prove fruitless. I might press many Reasons to this end; but I will name but few.

First, For his Majesties sake, who requires it. Great is the Duty which we owe him by the Law of God; great by the Law of Nature, and our own Allegiance; great for his own merit, and the memory of his ever blessed Father. I do but point at them: But methinks our thoughts cannot but recoil on one Consideration touched by his Majesty, which, to me, seems to sound, like a Parliamentary Pact or Covenant.

A War was devised here, Assistance professed, yea, and protested here: I do but touch it, I know you will deeply think on it; and the more for the example the King hath set you; his Lands, his Plate, his Jewels he hath not spared to supply the War: What the People hath protested, the King, for his part, hath willingly performed.

Secondly, For the Cause sake: It concerns us in Christian Charity to tender the distressed of our Friends abroad; it concerns us in Honour not to abandon them, who have stood for us. And if this come not close enough, you shall find our Interest so woven and involved with theirs, that the Cause is more ours than theirs. If Religion be in peril, we have the most flourishing and Orthodox Church: If Honour be in question, the Stories and Monuments in former Ages will shew, that our Ancestors have left us as much as any Nation: If Trade and Commerce be in danger, we are Islanders, it is our life. All these at once lie at stake, and so doth our safety and Being.

Lastly, In respect of the manner of his Majesties demand, which is in Parliament, the way that hath ever best pleased the Subjects of England. And good cause for it: For, Aids granted in Parliament work good effects for the People; they be commonly accompanied with wholesome Laws, gracious Pardons, and the like. Besides, just and good Kings finding the love of their People, and the readiness of their Supplies, may the better forbear the use of their Prerogatives, and moderate the rigor of the Laws towards their Subjects.

This way, as his Majesty hath told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not as destitute of others, but as most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition, and to the desire and weal of his People. If this be deferred, Necessity, and the Sword of the Enemy make way to the others.

Remember his Majesties Admonition, I say, remember it.

Let me but add, and observe God's Mercy towards this Land above all others. The Torrent of War hath overwhelmed other Churches and Countreys; but God hath hitherto restrained it from us, and still gives us warning of every approaching danger, to save us from surprise. And our gracious Sovereign, in a true sense of it, calls together his High Court of Parliament, the lively Representation of the Wisdom, Wealth, and Power of the whole Kingdom, to joyn together to repel those Hostile Attempts, which distressed our Friends and Allies, and threatned our selves.

And therefore it behoves all to apply their thoughts unto Counsel and Consultations, worthy the Greatness and Wisdom of this Assembly; to avoid discontents and divisions, which may either distemper or delay; and to attend that Unum necessarium, the common Cause; propounding for the scope and work of all the Debates, the general Good of the King and Kingdom, whom God hath joyned together with an indissoluble knot, which none must attempt to cut or untie. And let all, by unity and good accord, endeavour to pattern this Parliament by the best that have been, that it may be a pattern to future Parliaments, and may infuse into Parliaments a kind of multiplying power and faculty, whereby they may be more frequent, and the King our Sovereign may delight to sit on his Throne, and from thence to distribute his graces and favours amongst his People.

His Majesty hath given you cause to be confident of this you have heard from his Royal mouth; which nevertheless he hath given me express command to redouble: If this Parliament, by their dutiful and wise proceedings, shall but give this occasion, His Majesty will be ready, not only to manifest his gracious acceptance, but to put out all memory of those distastes that have troubled former Parliaments.

I have but one thing more to add, and that is, As your Consultations be serious, so let them be speedy. The Enemy is before hand with us, and flies on the wings of success. We may dally and play with the Hour-glass, that is in our power, but the Hour will not stay for us; and an Opportunity once lost, cannot be regained.

And therefore resolve of your Supplies, that they may be timely, and sufficient, serving the Occasion: Your Counsel, your Aid, all is but lost, if your Aid be either too little, or too late: And his Majesty is resolved, that his Affairs cannot permit him to expect it over-long.

Sir John Finch chosen Speaker, on the Nineteenth of March made the Address following:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

YOur Obedient and Loyal Subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, by your Royal Summons here Assembled, in obedience to your gracious direction, according to their ancient usage and privileges, have lately proceeded to the choice of a Speaker; and whether sequestering their better Judgments for your more weighty Affairs, or to make it known, that their Honour and Wisdom can take neither increase, or diminution, by the value or demerit

Anno 1627. demerit of any one particular Member, in what place soever serving them; omitting others of worth and ability, they have fixed their eyes of favour and affection upon me.

Their long knowledge of my unsuitness every way to undergo a Charge of this important weight and consequence, gave me some hope they would have admitted my just excuse: Yet for their further and clearer satisfaction, I drew the Curtains, and let in what light I could upon my inmost thoughts, truly and really discovering to them what my self best knew, and what I most humbly beseech your Royal Majesty to take now into your consideration. That of so many hundreds sitting among them, they could have found few or none, whose presentation to your Majesty would have been of less repute or advantage to them: For, Et impeditioris linguae sum, and the poor experience I have of that Royal Assembly, is so ill ballanced with true Judgment, that every gust and wave hath power on me; whereby I shall not only suffer in my own particular, but (which I apprehend with much more care and sorrow) do prejudice to their common interest.

Wherefore, dread and dear Sovereign, as low as the lowest step of your Royal Throne, I humbly bend, appealing to your great and Sovereign Judgment, for my discharge from this so unequal a burthen imposed on me; most humbly and earnestly beseeching your most excellent Majesty, for the Honour of that great Council, and the better digestion of publick services there, and withal to avert so ill an Omen, as the choice of me in the beginning of a Parliament, ordained (I hope) for the joy of our own, and the envy of other Nations; that by your gracious command, the House may reconsult, and settle their better thoughts on some more worthy their Election, and your Majesties Approbation.

The King not admitting his Excuse, the Lord Keeper said,

Mr. Speaker,

The Lord Keeper's Answer to the Speaker.

HIS Majesty with most Gracious and Princely attention, hath heard your humble Excuse, he knoweth the weight and importance of your Place, but your ability to discharge it he approves, and commends the Election of the House of Commons, and therein receives the more content, because they followed the light taken from himself, who formerly made choice of you, to serve him in a place of Trust, both about himself and his Royal Consort; the Omen can't be ill, when the People so readily follow him, whom God hath ordained to go in and out before them.

And therefore, knowing your Tackling to be strong, and finding your Sail to be moderate, and not overborn, his Majesty doth doubt neither Gulph nor Wave to endanger your passage; but since you are duly chosen, his Majesty counsels and commands, that unto your Humility you add Resolution and Courage; they stand well together, and being joyned, they will arm all your Abilities, to that great employment of Service to your King and Countrey, which the Commons, by their Uniform voice, have put upon you; so his Majesty, by his Royal Approbation, doth grant unto you, and settle you Speaker.

Mr. Speaker's Speech.

Car. 3.

IT is now too long time to dispute with my Lord the King, but with all joy of heart and alacrity, humbly and thankfully meet so great a favour from the best of Masters, and the best of Men: Therefore first I bow my knee to your most Excellent Majesty, in all humble and hearty acknowledgment of this your great and gracious favour; the truth of mine own heart, (full of Zeal and Duty to your Majesty and the Publick, as any man's) quits me from all fear of running into wilful Errors, and your Majesties great goodness, (of which I have been so large a partaker) gives me strong assurance, that having by your gracious Beams drawn me up from Earth and Obscurity, you will uphold me, by a benign and gracious interpretation of all my Words and Actions, that I fall not down like a rude and imperfect vapour, but consume the rest of my days in the Zeal of your Majesties Service.

This great and glorious Assembly, made perfect by your Royal Presence, like a curious Perspective, the more I behold it, with the more joy and comfort I find a lively representation of that happiness we all enjoy; a better Tongue were fitter to express it, but a rich Stone returns its value, though ill set.

Here in the fulness and height of your Glory, like the Sun in the Exaltation of his Orb, sits your most Excellent Majesty (the Sovereign Monarch of this Isle) in a Throne made glorious by a long Succession of many great Princes, a Meditation worthy our better thoughts, that we live neither enthral'd to the slavery and rage of the giddy multitude, nor yet to the distracted Wills of many Masters, but under the Command of a King, the stay and strength of the People, one (as Homer said of Kings; Multorum consilium & aliorum) not so be laid in ballance with other men; (for Kings know no Tenure but God's Service) and their value is only tried at his Beam; besides, that is a Sovereign Hereditary which maketh the Commonwealth, the King's care, as that which is his own Patrimony and Inheritance of his Children, when Elective Monarchies quickly run to ruin, and are ever made poor by the enriching of several Families.

On your right hand are the Reverend, Religious, and Learned Prelates, the Lights of the Church, fit to be set in Golden Candlesticks, and not made contemptible by Parity and Poverty; that blessing, above all the rest, by God's great goodness, and your Majesties Piety; the Realm enjoys the Liberty of the Gospel, and the free possession of God's true Religion: Your Majesty passed the fiery Trial in Spain, and gave us the assurance, That your Faith is built on the Rock, against which the Gates of Hell shall never prevail.

Since your coming to the Crown, by your Royal Edict you have banished those Incendiaries of Rome, the Priests and Jesuites, Enemies to our Church and State, so as now they are gone to lurk in corners, like the Sons of Darkness; You have given life to the Law against Recusants; and by your exemplary Piety, have drawn more to the Church: Yet, Coge ingredi, ut impleatur domus mea, was his command that made the great Feast, and is the duty of Magistrates.

And certainly, Dread Sovereign, Religion will be ever a Target to them, that are a Buckler to it, strong to hold your Subjects hearts in true obedience; Our Religion never bred a Ravilliac, and that execrable Villany, never to be forgot here, when all of us should have turned to ashes, was a Monster that could never be bred, but by the Devil or Jesuites.

Who killed Henry the IV. King of France.

On your left hand sit your Nobles, the Lights of Anno Honour, full of Courage and Magnanimity, yet in 1627. right distance between Crown and People, neither overshadowing the one, nor oppressing the other.

Before your Throne, like the Twelve Lions under Solomon's Throne, sit the Lights of Justice, your Grave Judges, the Sages of Law, Learned and Just.

Our Laws, as excellent as they are, and surely no Human Laws excel them, nor could suit so well with the condition of the People; Justice could never keep her right Channel, nor run so clear, as in your Majesty's Reign it now doth.

I must not forget the other Lights, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses of the Third State, who, though they move more slow, and at more distance from your Royal Person, yet, I am confident, will be ever found constant to the Poles of Love and Loyalty. It is a gracious favour of your Majesty, and our former Kings, (which I have thought on) that when both the Houses are humble Suitors for any thing, they are never denied; and I assure my self, your Majesty shall find your Subjects so full of duty to the Crown, and of true and loyal affection to your Royal Person, that you shall never have cause to think your greatest favours ill bestowed upon them. This Union is a greatness beyond that of the Kingdom, to which you are Heir; is of more advantage to the Island, if the Division be not among our selves, which the God of Unity, for his Mercys sake, forbid, and so knit our hearts in love one to another, and all of us in Duty and Loyalty to your most Excellent Majesty, that this renowned Island perish not for want of discretion, but may ever flourish and be like the Jerusalem of God, where his name may be ever honoured.

Great and Gracious have been the Actions of your Royal Predecessors; yet greater remain for your Majesty, and most of those attend you for their perfection.

The first Christian Kings of Europe, that abated the swelling pride of the Pope, by banishing the usurped power over God's Vice-gerent, that first established the true Religion now professed, were all Kings of England, and the last a young one; Queen Elizabeth was a Woman, yet Spain had good cause to remember her, and the Protestants of France will never forget her.

Your Royal Father, of Blessed and Famous Memory, had a Reign like Solomon's; for Religion, no man knew more, and no man's knowledge was of more lustre and advantage to it; this Age shall declare to the next, and all Ages shall see it in his Kingly works; yet whilst under his glorious Reign we abounded with Peace and Plenty, our hands forgot to War, and our fingers to fight; till at last your Princely Mediation, upon the humble suit of both Houses, the two Treaties were dissolved, and a foundation laid for your Majesty to steer another course.

Eritis sicut Dii was the Serpents counsel, and ruined Mankind; nor is it fit for private men (much less for me) to search into the Counsels and Actions of Kings, (only Sovereign) from a heart full of zeal to your Glory and Greatness, to say to your Majesty, The time requires you, and Religion calls upon you, to go on with the Kingly course you have begun, till the State of Christendom be set at his right ballance again.

We see the Eagle spreading her Wings in Germany, reaching with her Talons as far as the Sound and the Baltick Sea, Denmark and Sweden in danger of utter ruin; Binslyn the Elector at the choice of the Emperor, invested, in a manner, solely in the House of Austria, our Religion in France never so near a Period, and we know from whom it is; Ille cui Monarchia Mundi, &c. and who, by the ruin of us and our Religion, would make a new Zodiack, and draw his eclipsed Lines through the East and West-Indies; but he that sits on High will, in his due time, laugh them to scorn; and, as the Wise Woman said unto King David, God will make my Lord the King a sure House; to continue still to fight the Battels of Jehovah, and let all England say, Amen.

I have presumed too far upon your Royal patience, therefore I will conclude with a few words for them that sent me, who are all most humble Suitors to your most Excellent Majesty.

1. For the better attending of the publick and important Service of the House, our Selves and our Attendants may be free, both in Person and Goods, from Arrests and Troubles, according to our Ancient Priviledges and Immunities.
2. Next, that your Majesty, according to our Ancient Use and Priviledge, will be graciously pleased to allow us Liberty and Freedom of Speech; and I assure my self, we shall not pass the latitude of Duty and Discretion.
3. That upon all occurrences of moment, sit for resort unto your Royal Person, your Majesty, upon humble suit at your best times, will vouchsafe us access to your Royal Person.
4. And lastly, That all our Proceedings may be lodged in your Royal Heart, with a belief of our Zeal and Loyalty, and reap the fruit of your Majesty's favourable and gracious Interpretation.

One word more I humbly beg for my self, that though it be the beginning of Parliaments, I may now and ever enjoy the benefit of your Majesty's most gracious, general, and free Pardon.

Mr. SPEAKER,

His Majesty with no less contentment than attention, hath hearkened to your Eloquent Discourse, and marked your beginning futable to his gracious encouragement and advice, not departing from your humble modesty but adding to it alacrity, thankfulness and joy of Heart. He observes that you derive these Rights from the Throne in Heaven, his Majesty looks thither, and with you joyns his Prayers, that both he and this Assembly may by the Divine Hand and Power be moulded into a joyful Union, for the safety and good of this Kingdom. Next in applying your self to the Throne on Earth, of his Majesties gracious acceptance, and of the fulness of Zeal in your self, his Majesty believes it, and not in you alone but in this great Assembly, and that both you and they may stand secure, not only from fear of wilful and pregnant Errors, but also from doubt of sinister interpretations, I may say with the Woman in Scripture, my Lord the King is like unto an Angel of God, of a quick, of a noble and just apprehension, he strains not at Gnats, but will easily distinguish between a Vapor and a Fog, betwixt a Mist of Errors and a Cloud of ill wills: If the heart be right, his Majesty knows that out of the abundance of the Heart, the Mouth speaks.

You proceed to a Survey of this great and glorious Assembly, and in it as in a curious Christall, you view the true happiness that we all enjoy. You have shewed and described it aright, and whosoever it is that saith otherwise, either hath no sight or false glasses.

We have enjoyed it long under gracious and good Princes, and the way to enjoy it still, is, to know

Anno 1627. know and acknowledge it, and that God hath not dealt so with other Nations, and a principal cause and means is, as you mention, in the Form of Government under which we live, a Monarchy and the best of Monarchies, where Sovereignty is Hereditary, no Interregnum, no Competition for a Crown; Descent and Succession are here at once; the Spirit of God did long since propound by the mouth of the wisest of Kings this Beatitude, Blessed art thou, O Land, where thy King is the Son of Nobles: The Frame of other States are subject, some to Unconstancy, some to Faction, some to Emulation and Ambition, and to many Distempers, where the people ever go to wrack: the Monarchy is most natural in its unity, the best Cement of Government, prevailing most in respect of the head that commands the rest; and therefore other States after they have continued a while, for the most part are reduced into this, as the best for Peace, for Strength, or for Continuance; but forms of Government though never so exact, move not of themselves, but are moved of the Governours.

And therefore this our Monarchy, and this great Assembly, the lively image of this our Monarchy, are made happy and perfect in his Royal presence, in the Royal presence of him that sits here in his Throne: The Law as it is glorious in itself, so it is glorious in the happy Laws and Oracles that issue from it, but most glorious by them that sit on it, his Majesty, and his most Royal Progenitors, incomparable Kings, that with much honor have swayed the Royal Scepter of this Kingdom, so many Successions and Reigns.

From the Throne of Majesty you turn aside to the Chair of Doctrine, the Reverend Prelates and the Stars of Religion, (as they are properly called) this is (as you have well said) a Blessing of Blessings, the very Pledge and Assurance that secures all the rest, that as our Religion is most Sincere and Orthodox, so our Clergy is eminent, both for purity of Doctrine, and integrity of Life, our Priests are clothed with Righteousness, and their lips preserve knowledge, and therefore we may say with the Prophet, Let God's Saints sing for joy. I must joyn with you in attributing this transcendent happiness, in the first place to the goodness of God; so in the second place to his Majesties Piety, who following the example of his ever blessed Father, is careful that all the Lamps of the Church should be furnished with Oyl, and they in Golden Candlesticks with the purest and best Oyl. The Schools and Nurseries of Learning were never so respected; Arts and Sciences did never so flourish, especially Divinity, as in these our last Ages: And as they shew his Majesties Piety, so they are infallible Arguments of his Constancy; the Tryal which you call the Fiery Tryal in a place of Danger, against all the power and policy of Rome and Spain, do prove his Majesties resolutions to be immutable; and his remarkable example in his Chappel and Closet, his strict oversight and command to his Household-servants, his charge to his Bishops and Judges, his Proclamations and Commissions, and the like, for the execution of the Laws, and his general care to keep the Fountain clear, both from Superstition and Schism, are fruits and effects of a pious Government.

From the Chair of Doctrine you turned to the State of Honour, to the Nobles and Barons of the Kingdom, these are as Robur Belli, and the service of the King and Kingdom, are to make good with their Swords what the Church doth allow and bless with their Prayers; therefore as the Prelates are the Lights of the Church, so these be the Stars of the State. We know the Stars have fought and fought mightily against God's Enemies.

From the State of Honour you turn to the State of Justice, and the Twelve Lions under Solomon's Throne, the Judges and Sages of the Law, and as they be particularly trusted with the Laws of the Kingdom, Laws undoubtedly fitted to the disposition of this people, for Leges Anglia & Consuetudines Angliae (are) Synonyma, & Consuetudo altera natura; so that besides their Justice and uprightness, Law is become natural to them. A powerful point of Obedience, such Laws in the mouth of the upright and Learned Judges, are like good waters in a pure Channel; the longer they run, the sweeter they are, and procure that effect which Solomon speaks of, when the Righteous be set in Authority, the people rejoyce.

From the State of Justice you come to the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the third State; the Scriptures are fulfilled; in the multitude of people is the King's Honour; and therefore you may be sure, that no distance of place or distance of order make a distance in affection: for wise Kings ever love their Honor next their heart. Kings are, Pastores Populi, and the care of the Shepherd extends to the furthest as well as the nearest of his Flocks, nay he hath as much care of the least Lambs as the greatest Cattel, and as it is in the Body natural, no Member is so far remote, but it is still and continually under the Care of the Head; so in this great and Politick Body of this Kingdom, no rank nor order of people so low and so far remote from the Throne, but daily and hourly they find and feel the influence and benefit of his Majesties Care and Providence; nay the superior rank of Nobles, of Judges, of Magistrates are not ordained for themselves but as Fountains to convey the Justice, Protection, and Goodness of the King to every inferior Member; and therefore as the King is just, so there is just cause you should be constant and Loyal to your power. And thus having perused both Houses by their special parts, you come to joyn them together, and in that juncture you observe the greatest denial of their requests is, that the King will Advise. It is a remarkable note, it shews also the Wisdom and Judgment of the House, Kings not willing to deny, and the People not willing to put them upon a denial; in the one modesty and wisdom in their request, in the other moderation and sweetness in their Answers.

But that is not all, King's deny not the requests of the House, it holds much better by the rules of proportion, that the House deny not the requests of the King, that is the ancient and true Union of Parliaments, and the God of Unity keep this Unity; you have rightly called this an union of Hearts; so then it is a Present fit for wise people to present to their King: Wise and Magnanimous Kings are a special gift from God, having large Hearts capable of greatness, it is never unwelcome to them where there is unity of Heart; so greatness is above all, and therefore present it to the King, and you cannot doubt of acceptance.

Having spoken of Union, you fell into Memorial of the great and glorious Actions of his Majesties Predecessors, in the thought of this great one that remains, if I mistake not your meaning, you would have it understood, that the Union of Princes and People made way to these memorable Actions of those former times, and we that wish the like in ours, should look back on our Forefathers; wisdom requires it, and that as we are the the Sons of our Ancestors, so we should do the deeds of our Ancestors.

Anno 1627. The Pride of Rome abated (as you say) by England, lifts up her Horn again, and Religion, like a Vine Tree planted, and deeply rooted here, did spread into our Neighbour Countries, but lately hath lost many of her Golden Branches.

The Austrian Eagle that a while ago could not flutter for want of Feathers, now soars aloft, and preys where she lighteth on our Friends and Allies.

Spain often soyled by us, laughs and insults. that by their disguised Treaties, they have spoiled the Patrimony of those Princes, Branches of the Royal Cedar, and now she Posts apace to Universal Monarchy, to the ruin of us, our Friends and Religion; but God hath prevented them, and I hope his People will still stay their course.

There is a Resolution in our King, there is, I trust, a Resolution, for I am sure there was in the Parliament for that great Action.

His Majesty as he hath a Solomon, so he hath many Dauids in the Glorious Catalogue of his Royal Descent, and hath joyued himself in the Blood of the greatest Princes, (as you mention) and besides he hath a Victorious name sutable to his thoughts, and therefore as you have encouraged him to fight the Battels of Jehovah, so let all put to their helping hands and help, that it may be the glory of our King and Nation, for to set Christendom in a right Ballance.

The Lord Keeper's Answer to the Speaker's several Petitions. And now, Mr. Speaker, to come to your Petitions that you have made in behalf of the House, his Majesty most graciously and readily grants them all, according to the true Rights and Privileges in Parliament, which he trusts and believes you will not transgress, nor exceed; therefore you may go on and conclude of the weighty and publick business, and the Almighty God prosper your work.

After this the House met, and one Bill was read about Recusants Children sent beyond Sea, and then the House rose.

And now take a Copy of the famous Speech without doors to inflame all things within, it was by way of Letter, representing the grievances of the State, and was communicated to several of the Members of the Lower House.

To my noble Friends of the Lower-House of Parliament.

If any County had held me worthy to have served in this Parliament, I had now been made a Member of your Lower-House, as formerly I have been in sundry other Parliaments: But how unkindly soever she dealeth with me, I will ever shew my thankfulness to her, and deliver, by way of observation, what I have heretofore learned in that grave and wise Assembly; for admonishment to the elder, and a path-way for the younger to walk in.

Parliaments, in my time, have been wont to take up some space at the first meetings, to settle the House, and to determine of unlawful Elections; and in this point they never had greater cause to be circumspect, than at this time: For by an Abuse lately crept, in there is introduced a custom, which if it be not fore-seen and prevented, will be a great derogation to the Honour, and a weakning to the power of your House. Where the Law giveth a freedom to Corporations to elect Burgeses, and forbiddeth any indirect course to be taken in their Elections; many of the Corporations are so base minded, and timorous, that they will not hazard the indignation of a Lord Lieutenants Letter, who underhand sticks not to threaten them with the charge of a Musket or a Horse at the Muster, if that he hath not the Election of the Burgeses, and not they themselves.

And commonly those that the Lords recommend, are such as desire it for protection, or are so ignorant of the place they serve for, as that there being occasion to speak of the Corporation for which they are chosen, they have asked their Neighbours sitting by, whether it were a Sea or a Land Town?

The next thing that is required, is, Liberty of Speech, without which Parliaments have little force or power; Speech begets doubts, and resolves them, and doubts in Speeches beget understanding; he that doubts much, asketh often, and learns much; and he that fears the worst, soonest prevents a mischief.

This Priviledge of Speech is anciently granted by the testimony of Philip Comines a Stranger, who prefers our Parliaments and Freedom of the Subject in them, above all other Assemblies; which Freedom, if it be broken or diminished, is negligently lost since the daies of Comines.

If freedom of speech should be prohibited, when men with modesty make repetition of the Grievances and Enormities of the Kingdom; when men shall desire reformation of wrongs and injuries committed, and have no relation of evil thought to his Majesty, but with open heart and zeal express their dutiful and reverend respect to him and his service: I say, if this kind of liberty of Speech be not allowed in time of Parliaments, they will extend no further than to Quarter Sessions, and their Meetings and Assemblies will be unnecessary, for all means of disorder new crept in, and all remedies and redresses will be quite taken away.

As it is no manners to contest with the King in his Election of Councillors and Servants, (for Kings obey no men, but their Laws) so were it a great negligence, and part of Treason, for a Subject not to be free in Speech against the abuses, wrongs, and offences, that may be occasioned by persons in Authority. What Remedy can be expected from a Prince to the Subject, if the enormities of his Kingdom be concealed from him? Or what King so religious or just in his own nature, that may not hazard the loss of the hearts of his Subjects, without this Liberty of Speech in Parliament? For such is the misfortune of most Princes, and such is the unhappiness of Subjects where Kings affections are settled, and their loves so far transported to promote servants, as they only trust and credit what they shall inform.

In this Case, what Subject dares complain? or what Subject dares contradict the words or actions of such a servant, if it be not warranted by freedom of a Parliament, they speaking with humility? for nothing obtaineth favour with a King, so much as diligent obedience.

The surest and safest way betwixt the King and his people, which hath least scandal of partiality, is with indifference, with integrity and sincerity, to examine the Grievances of the Kingdom, without touching upon the person of any man, farther than the cause giveth occasion. For otherwise, you shall contest with him that hath the Princes ears open to hearken to his inchanting

Anno 1627. ing tongue; he informs secretly, when you shall not be admitted to excuses, he will cast your deserved malice against him, to your contempt against the King, and seeking to lessen his Authority; and so will make the Prince the Shield of his Revenge.

These are the sinister practises of such Servants, to deceive their Sovereigns, when our Grievances shall be authentically proved, and made manifest to the world by your pains to examine, and freedom to speak. No Prince can be so affectionate to a Servant, or such an Enemy to himself, as not to admit of this indifferent proceeding: If his Services be allowable and good, they will appear with glory; if bad, your labour shall deserve thanks both of Prince and Country.

When Justice shall thus shine, people will be animated to serve their King with integrity: for they are naturally inclined to imitate Princes in good and bad.

The words of Cicero will then appear, That malicious and evil men make Princes poor; and one perfect good man is able to make a Realm Rich.

One Case I will instance, that is common in the mouths of all men, and generally, Vox Populi, vox Dei. One of quality in the last Expedition to the Isle of Rhee, endeavoured to conceal the number of men lost in the last Encounter, and confidently affirmed their number not to exceed three or four hundred; till a Doctor of Physick, out of tenderness of Conscience, and duty to his Majesty, could not dissemble the vulgar and true Report, but acquainted his Majesty with two thousand of his Subjects there lost. This was so contrary to the first information, and so displeasing to the Informer and his Designs, that he caused the Physicians remove from his Highness presence, who yet remains in kind of a banished man.

The truth of these two Reports is easily determined by the Clerks of the Bands of each Company, and is worthy to be discovered for Truths sake. Truth being so noble of it self, as it will make him honourable that promoteth it: Lies may shadow it, but not darken it: they may blame, but never shame it. By this small President his Majesty shall see himself abused; and it may be a means for him to reflect both upon Men and Matters.

The Men slain are no less injured by concealing their names, whose lives were lost for King and Country. The Romans would have held it the highest Honour for their Friends and Posterity so to die: And a Parliament may fear, that those that stick not so palpably to wrong a King, may as unjustly cast aspersions upon the House, and other his loving Subjects.

There is no remedy left for these mis-reports, but a freedom of Speech in Parliament. For there is no wise man that speaks, but knows what and when to speak, and how to hold his peace. Whilst Subjects tongues are tied, for fear they may reach him a rap whose Conscience cries guilty; the King and his People are kept from understanding one another; the Enemy is heartened abroad, and the malignant humour of discontent nourished at home, and all for one who is like a Dragon, that bites the ear of the Elephant, because he knows the Elephant cannot reach him with his Trunk; and Princes are abused by false Reports whispered in their ears by Sycophants and Flatterers.

Diogenes being asked what Beast bit forest, answered, Of Wild Beasts, the Back-biter; of Car. 3. Tame, the Flatterer.

Now to descend to Grievances, which are of two kinds; some concerning the Kingdom in general; some in particular, which have relation to the general.

The Grievances in general are so many in number, as will serve for every Member of the House to present two apiece to your views. And because I cannot be admitted amongst you my self, yet in regard I have been a Member of you, I will presume so far as to rank my self with you, and to tender the number of two unto your consideration.

My first complaint is, Of Tules of Honour; and in two kinds.

First, In respect of the Parties themselves, their Estates and Parentage.

Secondly, In respect of the manner of their attaining thereunto, which is mercenary, base, and corrupt, which, in reason, should not hold: For by Law, the consideration is unlawful.

Trajanus commended Plutarch for his Precepts in School, when he taught, That men should labour to deserve Honour, but avoid the getting of it basely; for if it were Reputation to have it by desert, it were Infamy to buy it for Money. In that Age where Rich men were honoured, Good men were despised.

Honour is not to be valued according to the vulgar opinion of men, but prized and esteemed as the Sirname of Virtue, ingendred in the mind; and such Honour no King can give, or Mopey can purchase. He that will strive to be more Honourable than others, must abandon Passion, Pride, and Arrogancy; that so his Vertue may shine above others. For Honour consists not in the Title of a Lord, but in the opinion People have of their Vertue; for it is much more honor to deserve, and not to have it, than to have it, and not deserve it.

There is one of these three things, that commonly causeth mans Advancement; Desert, Favour, and Power.

The first makes a man worthy of it, the other two are but abuses: For Favour is but a blind Fortune, an ounce of which at Court, is better than a pound of Wisdom: Fortune never favoureth, but flattereth; she never promiseth, but in the end she deceiveth; she never raiseth, but she casteth down again. And this Advancement is meet to be called Luck than Merit.

That Honour that is compassed by Power, takes unto it self Liberty, and desires not to be governed by wisdom, but force: It knows not what it desireth, nor hath a feeling of any Injury: It is neither moved with sweet words, nor pitiful tears; such men leave not to do evil, because they have a desire to it, but when their power faileth to do it.

The true Honour amongst the Honourablest is, where Fortune casts down, where there is no fault; But it is Infamy where Fortune raiseth, where there is no Merit.

Examine the state and condition of men raised to Honour these twenty five years past, and whether it be desert, favour or power that hath preferred them.

Enter into the mischief the Kingdom hath suffered and doth suffer by it, and the cause of his Ma-

Anno 1627. Majesties great wants will soon appear: If you Collect with your selves how many hungry Courtiers have been raised to the highest top of honour.

After this, examine their Princely expence in these twenty five years, their Estates in present, and what is requisite to maintain them in their future degrees of honour, to themselves and their Posterities, and you shall find his Majesties annual Revenues consumed and spent upon those unworthy persons. Besides the impairing and impoverishing of the State, it brings with it the contempt of Greatness and Authority, it breeds an inward malice in Gentlemen better deserving of their Country, and better able to maintain the degree of honour without charge to King or Kingdom, and whose Houses and Alliance may better challenge it than the best of them.

The Character of a covetous man is, that he getteth his Goods with care and envy of his Neighbours, with sorrow to his Enemies, with travel to his body, with grief to his Spirit, with Scruple to his conscience, with danger to his soul, with suit to his Children and curse to his heirs; his desire is to live poor, to die rich: But as these vices are made virtues, even so is he honoured for them with Title of Nobility.

When Philip the second, King of Spain, entred with Arms upon his Kingdom of Portugal, and though with his Sword he might have made fitting Laws; yet were there some few Priviledges which the Portugals besought they might enjoy; one whereof was, That the King would make no unworthy person Noble, or without their approbation, which was granted them, and to this day they hold that Freedom, which keeps that Kingdom in the antient State, Honour and Dignity, (that is to say) two Dukes, one Marquess and eighteen Earls: And thus much for the point of Honour.

The second Grievance I will recommend to your view, is, The carriage of our Wars, the excessive charges vainly spent therein, the unworthiness of the people imployed, the grave and experienced neglected, the designs not warranted by reason and discretion, and the executions worse performed, with many other circumstances that depend upon it.

But before I Proceed herein, I must crave leave to speak to two Points:

The one to declare the property and condition of Impostors and Deceivers of Princes.

In the other I must clear the House of Parliament of an Imputation cast upon it.

Abusers of Princes are they that perswade them to War; to become poor, when they may live in Peace, and become rich; when they may be loved, cause them to be hated; when they may enjoy their lives surely, put them in hazard of cross fortune rashly; and lastly, having necessity to use their Subjects, put them into that necessity, as they refuse to do for him: All this is Pride of the Perswader, as Socrates saith.

In the Second I will clear the Parliament (in which I was a Member) of an ungrateful aspersion cast upon it, that is to say, That the Parliament was a cause to draw his Majesty into a War, and failed on their parts to contribute to it.

These have been often repeated, and the Parliament accused; the contrary hath been as often reiterated, and the truth expressed how far the Parliament proceeded therein. But to stop the mouths of such false Reports, and to free the Parliament of such a calumnation I must use this Argument;

At the Assembly of Oxford, the Parliament being Prorogued thither, Money was required of us towards the furnishing of his Majesties Fleet then preparing, upon many reasons alledged, too tedious now to repeat: with one consent it was refused.

Whereupon there was offer made by him, that, next the King, seemed to have best Authority, That if they would but contribute Forty thousand pounds, they should choose their enemy.

Whereupon I infer, That before that proposition there was no Enemy; and therefore no Wars; the motion for Money being denied, the Parliament instantly brake up; and seeing no Enemy was nominated, nor Money consented unto by us, I see not how the House can be taxed for Peace-breakers, but rather the name to be cast upon some young men; for youth by nature is prone to Pride, especially where experience wants; They are credulous in what they hear that pleaseth them, and incredulous in what is told them by wise men; They are despisers of others Counsels, and very poor in their own; They are dangerous for Princes to rely on, for self-will is of greater force than Precepts.

Now to proceed: In October following the Fleet to put to Sea, and what they did is apparent, by a Relation written by their General at his Return.

The Voyage being ended, another followed the next Summer under the command of that noble Lord, the Earl of Lindsey, which through the weakness and disability of the Ships, was not able to perform what he had in Charge, and what he desired.

The last and most lamentable, was that to the Isle of Rhee, which I likewise refer to a man I have seen, and to the Books Printed and extant.

These, with that to Algier, to make up a Mess of Island Voyages, I wish might be referred to the examination of choice and experienced Souldiers by Land and by Sea, to report their opinions of it, That so their Errors, their wasteful expences, their Negligences, their weak Designs, and want of experience, may appear, with the success that might have proved, if Advice and Counsel had had preheminance above Will and Arrogancy; For he that is ignorant of truth and knowledge, and led away with pride of his own opinions, must needs err. After it hath past your approbation, it is worthy his Majesties view, who then shall see the difference of Actions well mannaged, and rash and heady enterprises undertook by ignorance, and performed by folly.

Businesses of so great a consequence ought to be considered of with Counsel, and not only of the necessity, profit and honour, but of the possibility that was like to follow; for an action well begun is half ended.

My experience in Discipline of War by Land and Sea can say no more than to refer it to others; for 'tis a course I never was bred to in my youth, and now too late in mine age to practise: Only one thing I observe, that in the two Journeys of Cadiz and Rhee, in the first a Land-Souldier commanded at Sea, who knew not what belonged thereunto; and the other was carryed by him that was Souldier neither by Land nor by Sea; and the success proved accordingly in both: yet their Anno 1627. their errors were never questioned, but they both highly advanced.

And it is no marvel; for according to the old saying, The best Fencer is not alwaies the best Fighter; the fairer Tilter, not the best experienced Souldier; nor the eye of a Favourite at Court, the best General of an Host: And who-soever takes upon him that command without knowledge, beholds himself in a false Glass, that makes him seem what he is not.

As on the contrary, Experience is the Mother of Prudence, and Prudence will take Counsel, lest she joyn her self with her Will: hastiness causeth repentance, and forwardness causeth hinderance.

Of the Evils that followed upon these two Voyages, your selves are sufficient Witnesses, and can judge of them: As namely, the Billeting of Souldiers in the Country, and bringing their Ships into Harbours, not abating the entertainment of the one, nor the wages of the other. And yet notwithstanding this needless cost and charges, our Ships and Coasts are daily infested in such sort, as we dare not peep out of Harbour.

Were the carriage of things now answerable to the Prudence and Presidents of former times, we cannot pretend a fear of Invasion; because our Ships are divided into several Harbours, and our Souldiers Billeted in In-land Countries; besides, the season of the year giveth no opportunity to an Enemy to attempt it.

Here is a Mass of Wealth curiously consum'd, whether the King or Subject bear it, and no man bettered, but only those that have the Titles of Souldiers, yet never had the happiness or honour to see what appertained to service.

Their example of disorder encourages the other to follow their Liberty, People that were wont to live poorly, yet safely, are now by these Fellows and their Followers robbed and spoiled, and no remedy for redress.

The Rich stand upon their Guard, and dare not resort to their Church, lest in their absence their Houses be surpris'd and rifled.

The Enemy giveth a sudden attempt and returneth, the others do every day rob and spoil.

The Enemy surpriseth with fear, the others have neither fear nor shame.

The first lessening the greatness of the Roman Empire, was by the insolency of Souldiers, and the first raising of the House of Ottoman, was by permission and conniving at his Army.

What man is there so old in England that hath seen, or what youth so young that ever thought to see, Scottish men and Irish men Garrisoned in England, and no Enemy appear against us? Or who could have imagined he should ever have seen our own people tyrannized over in our own Kingdom by these of our own Nation, and those Scottish and Irish, and not dare so much as complain?

Would our Fore-fathers have thought it safety or policy to draw two thousand Scottish men and Irish men into the Isle of Wight, for their defence against France, when they of the Isle desired it not, nay, when they opposed it?

Would they have thought it wisdom, that two thousand Mouths, besides the Inhabitants, should live on the food of that Island, and so bring themselves into want and penury of Victuals, if they should in earnest be attempted by an Enemy? Would they have thought fit the Charge of it should be required of them, and yet they do suffer all injuries from the hands of strange Souldiers, when the meanest Boy in the Island is taught to mannage Arms better than the best of them that are there Billeted? No, but they would rather have thought it discretion, upon the return of those Voyages, to have caused the men to repair to the places where they were preferred, and to have ordered, that each Parish should have set them to work for their maintenance, with command to be ready, upon warning, to repair to the place of Rendezvous.

There is no place or part of England so remote from the Sea, but they might have resorted to the Port assigned, before the Ships could be furnished or drawn together. They would have thought it more wisdom to have retired to their own Harbours, and to have had their men discharged, than to have continued this needless and expenceful course that is taken. They would have judged it better to have supplied the Isle of Wight with two thousand men out of the main Land, when they feared any evil to the Island, than to send for them out of Scotland, and to keep them in continual entertainment. They would have thought it more fit to have returned the barbarous Irish into the Country from whence they came, than to make them a vexation to the places and parts where they remain, seeing no shadow of reason can be pretended for it.

England wants no men, and hath as good and able men as either of the other two Nations, if his Majesty had occasion to use them.

England, with small charge, can raise what men his Majesty pleaseth to command, and that suddenly, and discharge them again without trouble or charge as quickly. The wise men of England would have thought two or three hundred thousand pounds better spared, than thus wastefully consumed, and disorders committed; we may compute it to that sum, and yet keep our selves within compass: And notwithstanding the want of Money, and the waies to exact it of the Subject, is all the Song now sung. He that sees and complains of the evil manning of things, is either imprisoned, banished the Court, or censured for a Discontent.

There is no English-man, but knoweth the heart of every other true-hearted English-man, and with one consent will all obey our Prince, and to his Person we owe all due reverence; and we may truly say, No King is more happy in Subjects for their love, nor no Subjects readier to serve their King with their Purse and Persons, nor never people was better blest with a King, who is endowed with all kind of virtues, and stained with no manner of vice.

False informers, and misguiders of good Kings, are much more perilous, than if Princes themselves were evil: for commonly as Worms breed soonest in soft and sweet Wood, so are the best Natures, inclined to Honour and Justice, soonest abused by false Flatterers.

The evil they commit under the Authority of good Princes, is accounted as done by the Prince himself; but commonly such people in the end pay for it; for he that desires not to do good, cannot be wise, but will fall into four thousand follies.

One of the first Propositions made to the House, will be for Money to support his Majesty's vast expence at this time, that the Enemy threatens thunder against the Kingdom. Your often Alarms upon such pretences, may make you now too secure; for true it is, that the last Anno 1627. Parliament, Books were published of invincible Preparations intended against us, and nothing came of it. But beware you be not deceived by an old saying, That when one usually tells lies, he is not trusted when he speaks truth; for certainly the danger is much more, than by the power and greatness of another Enemy.

In this case you must give for your own sakes, that so you may be sure to enjoy what is yours; for your Sovereigns sake, to maintain his greatness and state; and for your Countreys sake, to keep it from oppression of the Enemy: but withal, you ought to lay down the condition of the Kingdom, and to shew, that your necessity cannot run parallel with your Hearts and your desires; that your minds will be carried with a willingness to give, but your hands will keep back your hearts for want of ability to give.

Themistocles demanding Tribute of the Athenians, told them, He brought two Gods with him, that is to say, Perswasion and Violence: They answered, That they had two other Gods in their Countrey, both great and powerful, which were Poverty and Impossibility, which hindred them from giving.

We may truly say, That God hath so placed and seated this Isle of England, that nothing but evil counsel can hurt it. But true it is, advice that is not warranted from wise men, may prove more forcible and perilous, than the power of an Enemy.

The Scripture telleth us, That the thought perissheth that taketh not counsel.

A King of the Lacedemonians asked how a Kingdom might ever stand, and was answered, Two ways; If a King take counsel of wise honest men, and they speak freely; And do Justice uprightly.

There was never Censor that judged, Senator that Ordered, Emperour that Commanded, Council that Executed, Orator that Perswaded, nor any other mortal man, but sometimes he committed Errors, and deserved either blame or punishment for his misdoings; and if he were wise, desired advice what to do.

St. Gregory saith, No man can give so faithful counsel, as he who loves one more than his gifts; then who are, or can be, so true Counsellors to our noble King, as a House of Commons that hath no relation to a King's gift, but only to his Honour, flourishing Estate and Safety?

This is the time to amend evil Counsels past, and to let evil Counsellors see their Errors.

This is the time for all men to put to their helps, some with their hands to fight, others with their advice to counsel: And for my advice, this it is;

That you present to his Majesty in all humbleness, your willing minds and hearts, to repair and fit to Sea his Majesties Navy, your selves to have power to make them able and serviceable, with the advice of experienced men that you may call unto you. This is a matter of great importance at this present for the safety of King, Realm, and Subject; for the strength of the Kingdom much depends upon this Bulwark, which we may well term, The Walls of England.

His Majesty shall find himself much eased by it, Businesses shall be carried without his trouble or care. Money shall not be sought for to that end, but provided by you: his Majesty may dispose of the rest of his Revenue at his pleasure.

By your frugality and husbandry, his Majesty shall have occasion to judge of things past, of yours in present, and hereafter it will serve for a President to walk after; it will stop the mouths of malignant tongues, that inform his Majesty of the unwillingness of the Subject to give; and it will make it apparent, that their true grief is not in the matter of giving, but to see the evil employing of it when it is given.

If any man shall pervert this good meaning and motion of yours, and inform his Majesty, 'Tis a derogation from his Honour to yield to his Subjects upon Conditions: His Majesty shall have good cause to prove such mens eyes malicious and unthankful, and thereby to disprove them in all their other actions: For what can it lessen the reputation of a Prince, whom the Subject only and wholly obeyeth, that a Parliament, which his Majesty doth acknowledge to be his highest Council, should advise him, and he follow the advice of such a Council? What dishonour rather were it to be advised and ruled by one Counsellor alone, against whom there is just exception taken of the whole Common-wealth?

Marcus Portio saith, That the Commonwealth is everlasting, where the Prince seeks to get obedience and love, and the Subjects to gain the affection of the Prince; and that Kingdom is unhappy where their Prince is served out of ends and hope of reward, and hath no other assurance of them but their service.

Upon the Twentieth of March the House of Commons settle their grand Committees, and desire the Lords concurrence to a Petition to the King for a Fast, as followeth:

The Petition for a Fast.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

WE your most humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in this present Parliament assembled, upon a tender and compassionate sense of the extreame Calamities of the Reformed Churches abroad, and with much sorrow apprehending the displeasure of Almighty God declared against our selves, the manifold evils already fallen upon us, and those which are further threatned, as by your Sacred Majesty was intimated unto us, even to the utter destruction and subversion of this Church and State, and which our sins have justly deserved; and being now by your Majesties gracious favour assembled in Parliament, as the great Council of this your Kingdom, to consult of such means as we think fittest to redress the present, and prevent the future evils, wherein we, through God's blessing, intend to employ our utmost endeavours, humbly beseech your Majesty, that by your special Command, one or more days may be forthwith solemnly set apart, wherein both our selves and the whole Kingdom may, by fasting and prayers, seek reconciliation at the hands of Almighty God, and with humble and penitent hearts beseech him to remove those miseries that lie upon us and our neighbour Churches, to avert those which are threatned, to continue the favours we yet enjoy, and particularly to bestow his abundant blessing upon your Majesty and this present Par-

Anno 1627. Parliament, so that all our Counsels and Resolutions being blessed by his Divine assistance, may produce much honour and safety to your Majesty, your People and Allies.

Debates touching Grievances.

Saturday the Two and twentieth of March, was spent in opening the grievances and state of the Kingdom, as billeting of Soldiers, Loans by Benevolences and Privy Seal, and the imprisoning certain Gentlemen who refused to lend upon that account, who afterwards bringing their Habeas Corpus, were notwithstanding remanded to Prison; nor did the House encline to supply his Majesty till these Grievances were redressed: To which purpose Sir Francis Seimour thus began;

Sir Francis Seimour.

‘This is the great Council of the Kingdom, and here (if not here alone) his Majesty may see as in a true glass, the state of the Kingdom; we are called hither by his Majesties Writs to give him faithful Counsel, such as may stand with his honour; but this we must do without flattery: we are sent hither by the Commons to discharge that trust reposed in us, by delivering up their just Grievances, and this we must do without fear: let us not therefore be like Cambyfes Judges, who being demanded of their King, Whether it were not lawful for him to do what in it self was unlawful: They (rather to please the King, than to discharge their own Consciences) answered, That the Persian Kings might do what they listed. This base flattery tends to mischief, being fitter for reproof than imitation; and as flattery, so fear taketh away the judgment: let us not then be possessed with fear or flattery, of corruptions the basest: For my own part I shall shun both these, and speak my Conscience with as much duty to his Majesty as any man, but not neglecting the Publick, in which his Majesty and the Commonwealth have an Interest: But how can we shew our affections whilst we retain our fears? or how can we think of giving of Subsidies, till we know whether we have any thing to give or no? for if his Majesty be perswaded by any to take from his Subjects what he will, and where it pleaseth him; I would gladly know what we have to give? Its true, it is ill with those Subjects that shall give Laws to their Princes, and as ill with those Princes which shall use force with those Laws; that this hath been done, appeareth by the billeting of Soldiers; a thing no way advantageous to his Majesties Service, but a burthen to the Commonwealth. This also appeareth by the last Levy of Money against an Act of Parliament.

Again, Mr. Speaker, what greater proof can there be of this, than the imprisonment of divers Gentlemen for the Loan, who if they had done the contrary for fear, their fault had been as great as theirs that were the Projectors in it? and to countenance these Proceedings, hath it not been preached (or rather prated) in our Pulpits, that all we have is the Kings Jure Divino, say these Time-servers? they forsake their own Function, and turn ignorant States-men; we see how willing they will be to change a good Conscience for a Bishoprick, and (Mr. Speaker) we see how easie it is for a Prince, how just and good soever, to be abused, in regard he must see with other mens eyes, and hear with other mens ears. Let us not flatter his Majesty, it is too apparent to all the world, the King and People suffer more now than ever: His Majesty in his Affairs abroad, and his People in their Estates at home: But will you know the reason of all this, let us look back to the Actions of former Princes, and we shall find that those Princes have been in greatest want and extremity that exacted most of their Subjects, and most unfortunate in the choice of their Ministers, and to have failed most in their Undertakings. Happy is that Prince that hath those that are faithful of his Council: That which his Majesty wanted in the management of his Affairs concerning France and Spain, I am clear was his want of faithful Council to advise: The reason is plain, a Prince is strongest by faithful and wise Council, I would I could truly say, such have been employed abroad. I will confess, and still shall from my heart, he is no good Subject, nor well affected to his Majesty and the State, that will not willingly and freely lay down his life, when the end may be the service of his Majesty, and the good of the Commonwealth: But on the contrary, when against a Parliament Law, the Subject shall have taken from him his Goods against his Will, and his Liberty against the Laws of the Land; shall it be accounted want of duty in us to stand upon our Priviledges, hereditary to us, and confirmed by so many Acts of Parliament?

In doing this we shall but tread the steps of our Forefathers, who ever preferred the Publick Interest before their own Right, nay, before their own Lives; nor can it be any wrong to his Majesty to stand upon them so as thereby we may be the better enabled to do his Majesties service; but it will be a wrong to us and our Posterity, and our Consciences, if we willingly forego that which belongs to us by the Law of God, and of the Land, and this we shall do well to present to his Majesty; we have no cause to doubt of his Majesties gracious acceptance.

‘This debate (said Sir Thomas Wentworth) carries a double Aspect towards the Sovereign and the Subject, though both be innocent, both are injured and both to be cured. Surely, in the greatest humility I speak it, these illegal ways are punishment and marks of indignation, the raising of Loans strengthened by Commission, with unheard of Instructions and Oaths; the billeting of Soldiers by the Lieutenants, and Deputy Lieutenants, have been as if they could have perswaded Christian Princes, yea Worlds, that the Right of Empires had been to take away by strong hands, and they have endeavoured as far as possible for them, to do it. This hath not been done by the King (under the pleasing shade of whose Crown I hope we shall ever gather the fruits of Justice) but by Projectors, who have extended the Prerogative of the King, beyond the just Symmetry, which maketh a sweet harmony of the whole: They have brought the Crown into greater want then ever, by anticipating the Revenues; And can the Shepherd be thus smitten and the Sheep not scattered? They have introduced a Privy Council, ravishing at once the Spheres of all ancient Government, imprisoning us without either Bail or Bond; they have taken from us, what? what shall I say indeed, what have they left us? All means of supplying the King and ingratiating our selves with him, taking up the root of all Propriety, which if it be not seasonably set again into the ground by his Majesties own hands, we shall have instead of beauty, baldness. To the making of those whole, I shall apply my self, and propound a Remedy to all these Diseases.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

By

Anno 1627. By one and the same thing have King and People been hurt, and by the same must they be cured; to vindicate, what, new things? no, our ancient vital Liberties, by reinforcing the ancient Laws made by our Ancestors, by setting forth such a Character of them, as no licentious spirit shall dare to enter upon them; and shall we think this is a way to break a Parliament? no, our desires are modest and just, I speak truly both for the Interest of the King and People, if we enjoy not those, it will be impossible to relieve him.

Therefore let us never fear they shall not be accepted by his goodness; wherefore I shall shortly descend to my motions, consisting of four parts, two of which have relation to our Persons, two to the propriety of Goods for our Persons: First, the freedom of them from imprisonment. Secondly, from employment abroad, contrary to the ancient Customs. For our Goods, that no Levies be made, but by Parliament. Secondly, no billeting of Soldiers. It is most necessary that these be resolved, that the Subject may be secured in both: Then for the manner, it will be fit to determine it by a grand Committee.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard acts the part of a Moderator.

Mr. Speaker,

THIS is the goodness of God, and the favour of the King, that hath brought us again to this place, and if we be as thankful to both as our duty to both requires, our meeting certainly will be crown'd with a blessing. This is the Crisis of Parliaments; we shall know by this if Parliaments live or die, the King and the Kingdom will be valued or disvalued both by Enemies and Friends, by the success of this Parliament. The Counsels of this House will have operations on all, 'tis fit we be wise; his Majesty begins to us with affection, proclaiming, that he will rely on his Peoples love. Preservation is natural, we are not now on the bene esse, but on the esse; be sure England is ours, and then prune it. Is it no small matter that we have provoked two most Potent Kings? We have united them, and have betrayed our selves more than our Enemies could. Men and Brethren, what shall we do? Is there no Balm in Gilead? If the King draw one way, the Parliament another, we must all sink: but I hope better of so grave, so wise an Assembly. I respect no particular, I am not so wise to condemn what is determined by the major part, one day tells another, and one Parliament instructs another. I desire this House to avoid all contestations, the hearts of Kings are great, 'tis comely that Kings have the better of their Subjects. Give the King leave to come off, I believe his Majesty with longing doth expect the occasion. 'Tis lawful, and our duty, to advise his Majesty, but the way is to take a right course to attain the right end; which I think may be thus: By trusting the King, and thereby to breed a trust in him towards us; by giving him a large Supply according to his wants, by prostrating our Grievances humbly at his feet, from thence they will have the best way to his heart, that is done in duty to his Majesty. And to say all at once, Let us all labour to get the King on our side, and this may be no hard matter, considering the near subsistence between the King and People.

Now, Mr. Speaker, concerning the Bill brought in by that Honourable and Reverend Person, it is no doubt necessary for the preservation of the Liberty of the Subject; for this I speak resolutely, He that is not safe in his person dwelleth not at home. These particulars I humbly offer to the consideration of the House, wherein I have declared my self freely and sincerely.

Sir Edward Cook speaks next.

Ubi tempus habemus bonum operemur. I am absolutely to give Supply to his Majesty; yet with some caution. To tell you of Foreign dangers and inbred evils, I will not do it; the State is inclining to a Consumption, yet not incurable; I fear not Foreign Enemies, God send us peace at home: For this Disease I will propound Remedies, I will seek nothing out of mine own head, but from my heart, and out of Acts of Parliament. I am not able to flie to all Grievances, but only at Loans. Let us not flatter our selves; who will give Subsidies, if the King may impose what he will? and if, after Parliament, the King may inhaunce what he pleaseth? I know the King will not do it, I know he is a Religious King, free from personal vices; but he deals with other mens hands, and sees with other mens eyes. Will any give a Subsidy that will be taxed after Parliament at pleasure? The King cannot tax any by way of Loans: I differ from them, who would have this of Loans go amongst Grievances, but I would have it go alone.

I'll begin with a noble Record, it cheers me to think of it, 25 E. 3. it is worthy to be written in Letters of Gold; Loans against the will of the Subject, are against Reason, and the Franchises of the Land, and they desire restitution: What a word is that Franchise? The Lord may tax his Villain high or low, but it is against the Franchises of the Land, for Freemen to be taxed by their consent in Parliament; Franchise is a French word, and in Latin it is Libertas. In Magna Charta it is provided, that, Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur aut disseisetur de libero tenemento suo, &c. nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terra; Which Charter hath been confirmed by good Kings above thirty times.

When these Gentlemen had spoken, Sir John Cook, Secretary of State, took up the matter for the King, and concluded for redress of Grievances, so that Supplies take the precedency; and said:

I Had rather you would hear any than me; I will not answer what hath been already spoken; my intent is not to stir, but to quiet; not to provoke, but to appease: My desire is, that every one resort to his own heart to reunite the King and the State, and to take away the scandal from us; every one speaks from the abundance of his heart: I do conclude out of every ones Conclusion, to give to the King, to redress Grievances; all the difference is about the manner; we are all Inhabitants in one House, the Commonwealth, let every one in somewhat amend his House, somewhat is amiss: but if all the House be on fire, will we then think of mending what is amiss? will you not rather quench the fire? the danger all apprehend. The way that is propounded, I seek not to decline; illegal courses have been taken, it must be confessed, the redress redress must be by Laws and Punishment: but withal, add the Law of Necessity; Necessity hath no Law, you must abilitate the State to do, what you do by Petition require. It is wished we begin with Grievances. I deny not that we prepare them, but shall we offer them first? Will not this seem a Condition with his Majesty? Do we not deal with a wise King, jealous of his Honour?

All Subsidies cannot advantage his Majesty so much, as that his Subjects do agree to supply him;
this will amaze the Enemy more than ten Subsidies: Begin therefore with the King, and not with our selves.

Sir Robert Philips his Speech, March 22. 1627.

Mr. Speaker,

I Read of a Custom amongst the old Romans, that once every year they had a solemn Feast for their Slaves, at which time they had liberty, without exception, to speak what they would, hereby to ease their afflicted minds; which being finished, they severally returned to their former Servitude. This may, with some resemblance and distance, well set forth our present estate, where now after the revolution of some time, and grievous sufferance of many violent Oppressions, we have (as those Slaves had) a day of Liberty of Speech, but shall not hereafter (I trust) be Slaves, for we are Free; but what new illegal proceedings our Estates and Persons have suffered under, my Heart yearns to think, my Tongue falters to utter: They have been well represented by divers worthy Gentlemen before me, yet one, and the main, (as I conceive) hath not been touched, which is our Religion, Religion, Mr. Speaker, made vendible by Commission; and men for pecuniary Annual Rates dispensed withal, whereby Papists may (without fear of Law) practise Idolatry.

For the Oppressions, under which we groan, I draw them into two Heads.

Acts of power against Law, and Judgments of Law, against our Liberties, strange Instructions, violent exactions of Money thereupon, imprisonment of the persons of such, who to deliver over to their Posterity the liberty they received from their Fore-fathers (and lawfully were in possession of) refused to lend, and this aggravated by reason of the remediless continuance and length thereof, and chiefly the strange vast & unlimited power of Lieutenants & their Deputies, in Billeting of Souldiers, making Rates, in granting Warrants for Taxes, as their discretions guides them; and all against the Law.
These last are the most unsupportable burthens, and most cruel oppressions that ever yet the Kingdom of England endured. These upstart Deputy Lieutenants (of whom perhaps in some cases and times, there may be good use, being by Laws regulated and attempered) are the worst of grievances, and most zealous executioners of those violent and unlawful Courses, which have been commended unto them; of whose proceedings, and for the qualifying of whose unruly power, it is more than time, to consult, and determine. Judgments of Law against our Liberties have been three, each later stepping forward than the former, upon the Right of the Subjects, aiming in the end to tread and trample underfoot our Law, and that in the form of Law.

Car. 3.

1. The first was the Judgment of the Post nati, whereby a Nation (which I heartily love for their singular zeal in our Religion, and their free spirits to preserve our Liberties far beyond many of us) is made capable of any the like Favours, Privileges and Immunities as our selves enjoy;
and this specially argued in the Exchequer-Chamber by all the Judges of England.

2. The Second was the Judgment upon the Impositions in the Exchequer-Court by the Barons, which hath been the Course and Fountain of many bitter matters of affliction unto our Merchants.

3. The Third was that fatal late Judgment against the Liberty of the Subjects imprisoned by the King, argued and pronounced but by one alone. I can live, although another (without Title) be but to live with me; nay I can live although I pay Excises and Impositions far more than I do, but to have my Liberty (which is the Soul of my Life) taken from me by power, and to be put up in a Gaol without remedy by Law, and to be so adjudged! O improvident Ancestors!
O unwise Fore-fathers to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our Laws and Liberties of Parliament, and to neglect our Persons and Bodies; and to let them lie in Prison, and that Durante Beneplacito remediless! If this be Law, what do we talk of our Liberties, why do we trouble our selves with the dispute of Laws, Franchises, Propriety of Goods, and the like?
What may any man call his, if no Liberty?

I am weary with treading these waies, and conclude to have a select Committee deputed to frame a Petition to his Majesty for redress of those things, which being read, examined, and approved by the House, may be delivered to the King, of whose gracious Answer we have no cause to doubt, our desires being so Reasonable, our intentions so Loyal, and the manner so Humble, neither need we fear this to be the Critical Parliament (as was insinuated) or a way of distraction, but assure our selves of a happy issue:
then shall the King, as he calls us his great Council, find us his true Council, own us his good Council, which God grant.

Munday 24 March, Secretary Cook renewed the motion of Supplies for his Majesty, yet so, that Grievances be likewise taken into consideration.

WE all think fit (said he) that both these go hand in hand together; but let me put you in mind of that which concerns the King, let him have the precedency of Honour, if not of time; let the Heads of the King's Supply first be propounded, this will be an honour to the King, and will do service to the House; the end of this Parliament is the subsistence of the King, as he himself hath declared, and such a Command is not to be slighted; the King himself propound-ed it, and then he will agree with us in other requests that are fit for a King to give; we that have the happiness to attend his Majesty, can tell you, that no King is more ready to hear the complaints of his Subjects, and withal you know no King is more sensible of all Reproaches which touch his Honour.

Cook

Will

Anno 1627. Will it not be fit to grant him this Honour, to have the precedency? It was the speech of an ancient Parliament man, Let us deal gently with our King; by these Laws that we make, we do bind our selves, and it is an addition of his power: None that dies, but leaves his Heir to the favour of the King; none that lives, but needs the favour of the King: we having made our first union with God, it is next intended, that we be at one with our King: Is it not fit we beat peace with our Head? His Majesty desires it, and expects it. After this unity with our Head, there is consideration to be had of unity with our selves; after this, we shall be all knit in one Body, we shall all pronounce clearly Shibboleth, and we shall consider of the grievances and irregularities of the times, which none desires to be reform'd more than his Majesty, and those whom you think most averse: Let us take the best way for Reformation: And will not this be a happy union, if the whole Body concur to reduce all into regularity? if Laws be our Birth-rights, we shall hereby recover them and their splendor; this will have good aspect abroad, and it will give courage to our men that have been despised, and will prevent practises to continue divisions amongst us both at home and abroad. The first sower of Seeds of Distractions amongst us, was an Agent of Spain, Gondomar, that did his Master great service here and at home.

Since that, we had other Ministers that have blown the fire: The Ambassador of France told his Master at home, what he had wrought here the last Parliament, namely, divisions between King and People, and he was rewarded for it. Whilst we sit here in Parliament, there was another intended Parliament of Jesuits, and other Well-willers, within a mile of this place; that this is true, was discovered by Letters sent to Rome: the place of their meeting is chang'd, and some of them are there where they ought to be; if you look in your Kalendar, there is a day of S. Joseph, it was called in the Letter the Oriental day, and that was the day intended for their meeting. I speak this, to see God's hand to work our union in their division; they are not more rent from us, than they are from themselves. I desire the meanest judgment to consider what may follow by giving precedency to his Majesty, and by so doing, we shall put from our selves many imputations. If we give any occasion of breach, it is a great disadvantage; if otherwise, it is an obligation to his Majesty, which his Majesty will not forget.

Then he made a motion, That the same Committee may hear Propositions of general Heads of Supply, and afterward go to other businesses of the day for Grievances. Others preferred the consideration of Grievances, as a particular root that invades the main Liberty of the Subject. It is the Law (said they) that glorious fundamental Right, whereby we have power to give; we desire but that his Majesty may see us have that Right therein, which, next to God, we all desire; and then we doubt not, but we shall give his Majesty all supply we can. The time was, when it was usual to desire favours for sowing discords, as Gondomar did for Raleigh's head. But the Debates of this day came to no Resolution.

The day following Mr. Secretary Cook tender'd the House certain Propositions from the King, touching Supply; and told them, That his Majesty finding time precious, expects that they should begin speedily, lest they spend that time in deliberation, which should be spent in action; that he esteems the Grievances of the House his own, and stands not on Precedence in point of Honour. Therefore to satisfy his Majesty, let the same Committee take his Majesties Propositions into consideration, and let both concur, whether to sit on one in the Forenoon, or the other in the Afternoon, is all one to his Majesty.

Hereupon the House turned themselves into a Committee, and commanded Edward Littleton Esq; unto the Chair, and ordered the Committee to take into consideration the Liberty of the Subject, in his Person, and in his Goods; and also to take into consideration his Majesties Supply. In this Debate, the Grievances were reduced to six Heads, as to our Persons.

1. Attendance at the Council-board.
2. Imprisonment.
3. Confinement.
4. Designation for Foreign Employment.
5. Martial Law.
6. Undue Proceedings in matter of Judicature.

The first matter debated, was the Subjects Liberty in his Person; the particular instance was in the case of Sir John Heveningham, and those other Gentlemen who were imprisoned about Loan-money, and thereupon had brought their Habeas Corpus, had their Case argued, and were nevertheless remanded to Prison, and a Judgment, as it was then said, was entred. Whereupon Mr. Cresswell, of Lincolns Inn, spake to this purpose.

The Speech and Argument of Mr. Cresswell of Lincolns-Inn, one of the Members of the Commons House of Parliament, concerning the Subjects Grievances, by the late Imprisonment of their Persons, without any Declaration of the Cause; delivered March 25.

I Stand up to speak somewhat concerning the points of the Subjects Grievance, by Imprisonment of their Persons, without any Declaration of the Cause, contrary to, and in derogation of the Fundamental Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom.

I think I am one of the Puiſnes of our Profession, which are of the Members of this House: But howsoever, sure I am, that in respect of my own inabilities, I am the Puiſne of the whole House; and therefore according to the usual course of Students in our Profession, I may, as the Puiſne, speak first in time, because I can speak least in matter.

In pursuance of which course, I shall rather put the Case, than Argue it, and therefore I shall humbly desire, first of all, of this Honourable House in general, that the goodness of the Cause may receive no prejudice by the weakness of my Argument. And next, of all my Masters here of the same Profession in particular, That they by their Learned Judgments will supply the defects I shall discover by declaring of my unlearned Opinion.

Before I speak of the Question, give me leave as an entrance thereunto, to speak first of the occasion.

Anno 1627. You all know that Justice is the life, & the heart-blood of the Common-wealth, and if the Common-wealth bleed in that Master-Vein, all the Balm of Gilead is but in vain, to preserve this our Body of Policy from Ruin and Destruction.

Justice is the Columna & Corona Reipublicæ; she is both the Column and the Pillar, both the Crown and Glory of the Common-wealth. This is made good in Scripture by Solomon, the wisest King that ever Reigned upon Earth. For First, that she is the Pillar; he saith, That by Justice the Throne shall be established. Secondly, she is the Crown; for he saith, That by Justice a Nation shall be exalted.

Our Laws, which are the Rules of Justice, are the ne plus ultra, both to the King and Subject; And as they are Hercules Pillars, so are they the Pillars of every Hercules, to every Prince, which he must not pass.

Give me leave to resemble her to Nebuchadnezzar's Tree, for she is so great, that she doth shade not only the Pallace of the King and the House of Nobles, but also shelter the Cottage of the poorest Beggar.

Wherefore if now either the blasts of Indignation, or the unresistable violator of Law, Necessity, hath so bruised any of the Branches of this Tree, that either our Persons, our Goods, or Possessions have not the same shelter as before, yet therefore let us not neglect the Root of this great Tree; but rather with all our possible endeavours, and unfeigned duties, apply fresh and fertile Mould unto it; and also water it, even with our own Tears, that so these bruised Branches may be recovered, and the whole Tree again prosper and flourish: for this I have learned from an ancient Father of the Church, That though Preces Regum sunt Armatae; yet Arma Subditorum are but only Proces & Lachrymae.

I know well, that Cor Regis inscruabile; and that Kings, though they are but men before God, yet are they Gods before men. And therefore to my gracious and dread Sovereign, whose virtues are true qualities, ingenerate both in his Judgment and Nature, let my Arm be cut off; nay, let my Soul not live that day that I should dare to touch that forbidden Fruit, those Flowers of his Princely Crown and Diadem.

But yet in our Eden, in the Garden of the Common-wealth, as there are the Flowers of the Sun, which are so glorious, that they are to be handled by Royal Majesty; so are there also some Daisies, and wholsom Herbs, which every common hand, that lives and labours in this Garden, may pick and gather up, and take comfort and repose in them: Among all which, this Oculus Dei, this bona libertas, whereof I am now to speak is one, and the chief one.

Thus much, in all humbleness, I presume to speak for the occasion: I will now descend to the Question, wherein I hold (with all dutiful submission to better Judgments) That these Acts of Power in Imprisoning and Confining his Majesties Subjects in such manner, without any Declaration of the Cause, are against the Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom.

And that for these Reasons, thus briefly drawn, and concluded.

The First from the great favour the Law doth give unto, and the great care which the Law hath ever taken of the Liberties and Safeties of the Bodies and Persons of the Subjects of this Kingdom.

I shall not need to take the Question in pieces, nor handle it in parts dividedly, but as one entire, because I hold, no other difference between imprisonment and confinement than only this; that the one hath a less and straighter, the other a greater and larger Prison. And this word Confinement being not to be found in any one Case of our Laws, if therefore it is become the language of State, it is too difficult for me to define.

To proceed therefore in maintenance of my first Reason, I find the same doth so much favour the Subjects Liberty, that the Body of a man was not liable to be Arrested or Imprisoned, for any other cause at the Common-Law, but only for Force, and things done against the Peace: For the Common-Law (being the preserver of the Peace of the Land) so abhorreth Force, that she accounts those that commit it, her Capital Enemies, and therefore did subject their Bodies to Imprisonment. But by the Statutes of Marebridge, cap. 24. which was made 32 Hen. 3. who was the eighth King from the Conquest, because Bailiffs would not render account to their Lords, it was ordered, that their Bodies should be attached. And afterwards by the Statute 33 E. 3. 17. who was the Eleventh King after the Conquest, because men made no Conscience to pay their Debts, it was enacted, That their Bodies should likewise be Attached. But before those Statutes, no mans Body was subject to be taken, or imprisoned, otherwise than as aforesaid; whereby it is evident how much the Common-Law favoured the Liberty of the Subject, and protected his Body from Imprisonment.

I will enforce this Reason further by a Rule in Law, and some Cases in Law upon that Rule: the Rule is this, Corporalis injuria non recipit estimationem de futuro. So as if the Question be for wrong done to the person, the Law will not compel him to sustain it, and afterwards expect a remedy, for the Law holds no damage a sufficient recompence for wrong which is Corporal.

The Cases in Law to prove this Rule shall be these.

If one Menace me in my Goods, or that he will burn the Evidences of my Land, which he hath in his Custody, unless I make unto him a Bond; there I cannot avoid the Bond by Pleading this Menace: but if he restrains my person, or threatens me with Battery, or with burning my House, which is a Protection, or with burning an Instrument of Manumission, which is Evidence of Enfranchisement; upon these Menaces, or Direfums, I shall avoid the Bond by Plea: so if a Trespasser drives my Beasts over another mans Ground, and I pursue to rescue them, there I am a Trespasser to him on whose Ground I am.

But if a man assault my Person, and I for safety fly over into another man's Ground, there I am no Trespasser to him, for jure evenit ut quod quis ab tutelam sui Corporis fecerit, jure id fecisse existimatur; nay, which is more, the Common-Law did favour the Liberty not only of Free-men, but even of the persons of Bond-men and Villains, who have no right or propriety either in Lands or Goods, as Free-men have; and therefore, by the Law, could not make him his Villain; nay, if the Lord Commanded another to beat his Villain, and he did it, the Villain should should have his Action of Battery against him for it.

Anno 1627. If the Lord made a Lease for years to his Villain, if he did plead with his Villain, if he tendered his Villain to be Champion for him in a Writ of Right, any of these Acts, and many others which I omit, were in Law Infranchisements, and made these Villains Free-men; nay, in a Suit brought against one, if he by Attorney will plead that he is a Villain, the Law is so careful of Freedom, that it dissolves this Plea by Attorney; but he must do it propria persona, because it binds his Posterity and Blood to be Villains also. And thus much in general for my first Reason.

My next Reason is drawn by an Argument, à minore ad majus; I frame it thus, That if the King hath no absolute power over our Lands and Goods, then à fortiori not over our persons to imprison them, without declaring the cause; for our persons are much more worth than either Lands or Goods, which is proved by what I have already said. And Christ himself made it clear, when he said, An non est Corpus supra vestimentum? Is not the Body more worthy than Rayment? Where the Canonists say that (Vestimentum) comprehendeth all outward things, which are not in the same degree with that which is Corporal. And our Law also maketh it plain, that if a Villain purchase Frankland, this makes it Villain-Land, according to the nature of his person: but it holds not à Converso, Frankland shall not free the person.

Now that the King hath no absolute power, either over our Lands or Goods, I will only at this time but put a Case or two, without proof of the Premises, else my conclusion would not follow.

First, for Land, the King cannot by his Letters Patents make the Son of an Alien Heir to his Father, nor to any other, for he cannot disinherit the right Heir, saith the Book; no prejudice to the Lord of his Escheat.

The King, by his Prerogative, shall pay no Toll for things bought in Fairs or Markets; but a Custom for paying Toll to go over the Soil and Free-hold of another, shall bind the King, for this toucheth the Inheritance of the Subject: And therefore the King shall not have as much as a way over his Land, without payment; and if not a way, then certainly not the Land itself.

Next for Goods, if a man have a Jewel ingaged for ten pounds, and is attainted for Treason, the King shall not have this Jewel, if he pays not the Money. So if Cattel be Distreined, and the party afterwards Attainted, yet the King shall not have them until the party be satisfied for which they were Distreined.

And if in these Cases, where the owners of the Goods are such Capital Offenders, the King cannot have them, much less shall he have them when the owner is Innocent and no offender.

Nay, I may well say, That almost every Leaf and Page of all the Volumes of our Common-Law, prove this Right of Propriety, this distinction of Meum & Tuum, as well between King and Subject, as one Subject and another; and therefore my Conclusion follows, That if this Prerogative extend not neither to Lands nor Goods, then à fortiori, not to the person, which is more worthy than either Lands or Goods, as I said before.

And yet I agree, that by the very Law of Nature, service of the persons of the Subject, is subject to his Sovereign; but this must be in such things as are not against the Law of Nature, but to have the Body imprisoned without any cause declared, and so be in Bondage, I am sure is contrary unto, and against the Law of Nature, and therefore not to be enforced by the Sovereign upon the Subject.

My next Reason is drawn ab inutili & incommodo, for the Statute De frangentibus prisonam made 1 E. 3. is Quod nullus qui prisonam frerit subeat Judicium visa vel membrorum pro fractione prisonae tantum, nisi causa pro qua capus & imprisonatus fuerit, tale judicium requirat. Whence this Conclusion is clearly gathered, that if a man be Committed to Prison, without declaring for what cause; and then Malefactors do break the Prison, or the Gaolers suffer him to escape, albeit the person so escaping had committed Crimen Laesae Majestatis; yet neither the Gaoler, nor any other that procured the escape, can by the Law suffer any corporal punishment, for setting him at large, which if admitted might prove, in consequence, a matter of great danger to the Common-wealth.

My next is drawn à Regis honore, from that great honour, the Law doth attribute to Sovereign Majesty, and therefore the Rule of Law is, Solum Rex hoc non potest facere, quod non potest juste agere. And therefore if the Subject have the Nomination, and the King the Presentation to the Church, whereunto the King presents without the Subjects Nomination; here the Quare Impedit lies against the Incumbent (tantum) and the King is in Law no disturber.

And Hussy, Chief Justice in 1 H. 7. fol. 4. saith, Sir John Markham told King Edward the Fourth, he could not Arrest a man either for Treason or Felony, as a Subject might, because that if the King did wrong, the party could not have his Action against him; Why, what is the Reason, that an Action of false imprisonment lies against the Sheriff, if he Returns not the Writ by which he hath taken the body of the Subject? But this, because the Writ doth brevisiter enarrare causam captionis; which if it doth not, it shall abate, and is void in Law, to the end that being returned, the party when he appears, may know what to answer, and the Court what to Judge. And if the King's Writ under the Great Seal cannot imprison the Subject, unless it contain the cause, shall the King's Warrant otherwise do it without containing the cause, that so his Judges, upon Return thereof, may likewise Judge of the same, either to Remand or Judge the party imprisoned?

I should argue the point more closely upon the Statute of Magna Charta 29. quod nullus liber homo imprisonetur; the Statute of Westminster, 1 Cap. 15. for letting persons to Bail, and the Judgment lately given in the King's Bench. But that the latter of these Statutes having been by that Honourable Gentleman (to whom the Professors of the Law, both in this and all succeeding Ages, are and will be much bound) already expounded unto us. And that also fortified by these many Contemporary Expositions and Judgments, by him learnedly cited.

And there being many learned Lawyers here, whose time I will not waste, who were present, and some of them perhaps of Counsel in the late Case so adjudged in the King's Bench, where you, to whose Person I now speak, do well know I

Anno 1627. 'was absent, being then of Counsel in a Cause in another Court. And my practise being in the Country, far remote from the Treasuries of Antiquities, and Records, conducing to the clearing of this Question: Therefore the narrowness of my understanding, commands unto me sober ignorance, rather than presumptuous knowledge, and so commands me no further to trouble your patience. But I will conclude with that which I find reported of Sir John Davies, who was the King's Serjeant, and so by the duty of his place, would, no doubt, maintain to the uttermost, the King's Prerogative Royal; and yet it was by him thus said, in those Reports of his, in the Case of Tanistrey Customs, That the Kings of England have alwaies had a Monarchy Royal, and not a Monarchy Seignoral; Where, under the first (saith he) the Subjects are Free-men, and have propriety in their Goods, and Free-hold, and Inheritance in their Lands. But under the latter, they are as Villains and Slaves, and Proprietors of nothing, and therefore (saith he) when a Royal Monarch makes a new Conquest; yet if he receive any of the Nationals and Inhabitants, into his Protection, they, and their Heirs after them, shall enjoy their Lands, and Liberties, according to the Law, and there he voucheth this President, and Judgment following, given before William the Conqueror himself, viz.

'That one Sherborne, at the time of the Conquest, being owner of a Castle and Lands in Norfolk, the Conqueror gave the same to one Warren a Norman; and Sherborne dying, and the Heir claiming the same by descent, according to Law: It was before the Conqueror himself, adjudged for the Heir, and that the gift thereof by the Conqueror was void.

'If then it were thus in the Conquerors time, and by his own Sentence and Judgment, and have so continued in all the Successions of our Kings ever since, what doubt need we have, but that his Majesty (upon our humble Petition prostrated at his feet, which (as was well said) is the best passage to his heart) will vouchsafe unto us our ancient Liberties and Birth-rights, with a through Reformation of this, and other our just Grievances? And so I humbly crave pardon of this Honourable House, that I have made a short Lesson long, by making more Rests than Notes.

Sir Robert Philips.

This Matter of the Habeas Corpus was referred to a Committee, and Mr. Selden to make Report; Upon his Report Sir Robert Philips gave his Opinion, 'That this intended Judgment in the Habeas Corpus, was a draught made by some man that desired to strike us all from Liberties: But the Judges justly refused it; but if the Judges did intend it, we sit not here (said he) to answer the trust we are sent for; if we present not this matter to his Majesty. Let this business be further searched into, and see how this Judgment lies against us, and what the Judges do say concerning the same.

Sir Edward Cook.

Sir Edward Cook proceeded, and said, 'This draught of the Judgment will sting us, quia nulla causa fuit ostensa, being committed by command of the King, therefore he must not be bailed: What is this, but to declare upon Record, that any Subject, committed by such absolute command, may be detained in Prison for ever? What doth this tend to, but the utter subversion of the choice Liberty and Right belonging to every Free-born Subject of this Kingdom? I fear, were it not for this Parliament, that followed so close after the form of Judgment was drawn up, there would have been hard putting to have had it entered: But a Parliament brings Judges, Officers, and all men in good order.

But after this they desired the Opinion of the Judges.

Whitlock spake thus:

My Lords,

WE are, by your appointment, here ready to clear any Aspersions of the House of Commons in their late Presentment upon the King's Bench, that the Subject was wounded in the Judgment there lately given. If such a thing were, my Lords, your Lordships, not they, have the power to question and judge the same. But, my Lords, I say, there was no Judgment given, whereby either the Prerogative might be enlarged, or the Right of the Subject trenced upon. It is true, my Lords, in Michaelmas Term last, four Gentlemen petitioned for a Habeas Corpus, which they obtained, and Counsel was assigned unto them; the Reason was, Per specialem mandatum Domini Regis, which likewise was made known to us under the hands of Eighteen Privy Counsellors. Now, my Lords, if we had delivered them presently upon this, it must have been because the King did not shew cause wherein we should have judged the King had done wrong, and this is beyond our knowledge; for he might have committed them for other matters than we could have imagined; but they might say thus, They might have been kept in Prison all their days: I answer, No, but we did remit them, that we might better advise of the matter; and they the next day might have had a new Writ, if they had pleased. But they say, we ought not to have denied Bail: I answer, if we had done so, it must needs have reflected upon the King, that he had unjustly imprisoned them: And it appears in Dyer, 2 Eliz. that divers Gentlemen being committed, and requiring Habeas Corpus, some were bailed, others remitted: whereby it appears, much is left to the discretion of the Judges.

Judge Whitlock in justification of the Proceedings in the Upper Bench upon the Habeas Corpus.

'For that which troubleth so much, Remittitur quousque; This, my Lords, was only (as I said before) to take time what to do: and whereas they will have a difference between Remittitur & Remittitur quousque; My Lords, I confess I can find none; but there are new inventions to trouble old Records. And herein, my Lords, we have dealt with knowledge and understanding; for had we given a Judgment, the Party must thereupon have rested; every Judgment must come to an issue in matter, in fact, or demurrer in point of Law; here is neither, therefore no Judgment.

'For endeavouring to have a Judgment entered (it is true) Mr. Attorney pressed the same for his Majesties Service: But we having sworn to do right between his Majesty and his Subjects, commanded the Clerk to make no Entry, but according to the old form; and the Rule was given by the Chief Justice alone. I have spent my time in this Court, and I speak confidently, I did

Anno 1627. never see nor know by any Record, that upon such a Return as this, a man was bailed, the King not first consulted with, in such a Case as this.

The Commons House do not know what Letters and Commands we receive; for these remain in our Court, and are not viewed by them. For the rest of the matters presented by the House of Commons, they were not in agitation before us, whether the King may commit, and how long he may detain a man committed. Therefore having answered so much as concerneth us, I desire your Lordships good construction of what hath been said.

Judge Doderidge, concerning the same Subject, said,

Judge Doderidge the like.

It is no more fit for a Judge to decline to give an account of his doings, than for a Christian of his Faith. God knoweth, I have endeavoured all ways to keep a good Conscience; for a troubled one, who can bear? The Kingdom holds of none but God; and Judgments do not pass privately in Chambers, but publickly in Courts, (where every one may hear) which causeth Judgment to be given with maturity. Your Lordships have heard the particulars given by my Brother, how that Counsel being assigned to those four Gentlemen in the latter end of Michaelmas Term, their Cause received hearing, and upon consideration of the Statutes and Records, we found some of them to be according to the good old Law of Magna Charta; but we thought that they did not come so close to this Case, as that Bail should be presently thereupon granted. My Lords, the Habeas Corpus consisteth of three parts; the Writ, the Return upon the Writ or Schedule, and the Entry or Rule reciting the Habeas Corpus and the Return, together with the Opinion of the Court, either a Remittitur, or a Traditur in Ballivum. In this Case, a Remittitur was granted, which we did, that we might take better advisement upon the Case, and upon the Remittitur, my Lords, they might have had a new Writ the next day, and I wish they had, because, it may be, they had seen more, and we had been eased of a great labour. And, my Lords, when the Attorney, upon the Remittitur, pressed an Entry, we all straightly charged the Clerk, that he should make no other Entry, than such as our Predecessors had usually made in like Cases. For the difference between Remittitur and Remittitur quousque, I could never yet find any: I have now late in this Court Fifteen years, and I should know something: surely, if I had gone in a Mill so long, dust would cleave to my clothes. I am old, and have one foot in the Grave; therefore I will look to the better part as near as I can. But, Omnia habere in memoria, & in nullo errare, Divinum potius est quam Humanum.

The Lord Chief Justice Hyde, and Justice Jones delivered their Opinions much to the same purpose. The House proceedeth in further debate of the Liberty of the Subject.

Mr. Hackwel resumes the Debate of the Matter concerning the Habeas Corpus.

The late Judgment (said he) which lies in Bar, is only an Award, and no Judgment; and in the Lord Chief Justice his Argument, there was no word spoken, that the King might commit or detain without cause.

For the King to commit a man, is indignum Regi: Mercy and Honour flow immediately from the King, Judgment and Justice are his too, but they flow from his Ministers; the Sword is carried before him, but the Scepter in his hands. These are true Emblems of a good King.

The Law admits not the Kings power of detaining in Prison at pleasure. In ancient times Prisons were but pro custodia, carceres non ad penam, sed ad custodiam. Admit the King may commit a man, yet to detain him as long as he pleaseth, is dangerous, and then a man shall be punished before his offence: Imprisonment is a maceration of the body, and horrow to the mind; it is vis a peior morte.

Mr. Selden last of all produced the Statutes, Presidents, and Book Cases, which were expressed in point to the Question in hand, which were very large; and the House commanded that Case in the Lord Chief Justice Anderson's Book, all of his own hand-writing, to be openly read.

And for the Precedents cited by the King's Council, in the Four and thirtieth year of the Queen, as the Opinion of all the Judges; certainly there was a great mistake in it, and the mistake was the greater, when it passed as current by the Judges of the King's Bench, in the last Case of the Habeas Corpus. And that the truth of the Opinion may clearly appear, let us read the words out of the Lord Chief Justice Anderson's Report, out of the Book written with his own hand, which will contradict all those Apocrypha Reports that go upon the Case: The words of the Report were these;

Divers persons fueront commises a several temps a several prisons sur pleasure sans bon cause parte de queux estiant amenes en Banck le Roy. Es parte en le Commune Banck fueront accordant a le Ley de la terre mise a large & discharge de le imprisonment, par que aucuns grans fueront ostendus & procure un commandement a les Judges que ils ne fera ainsi apres. Ceo nient meens les Judges ne surcease mes per advise enter eux ils fesoient certain Articles le renouir de queux ensui, & delivrer eux al Seigneurs Chancellor & Treasurer & eux subscribe avec toutes leur mainies, les Articles sont come crismoint.

We her Majesties Justices of both Benches, and Barons of the Exchequer, desire your Lordships, that by some good means some order may be taken, that her Highnesses Subjects may not be committed or detain'd in prison by commandment of any Nobleman or Counsellor against the Laws of the Realm; either else to help us to have access to her Majesty, to the end to become Spitors to her for the same: for divers have been imprisoned for suing ordinary Actions and Suits at the Common Law, until they have been constrained to leave the same against their wills, and put the same to order, albeie Judgment and Execution have been had therein, to their great losses and griefs: for the aid of which persons

Anno 1628. sons, her Majesties Writs have sundry times been directed to sundry persons; having the custody of such persons unlawfully imprisoned, upon which Writs, no good or lawful cause of imprisonment hath been returned or certified: Whereupon, according to the Laws, they have been discharged of their imprisonment; some of which persons so delivered, have been again committed to Prison in secret places, and not to any common or ordinary Prison, or lawful Officer or Sheriff, or other lawfully authorized to have or keep a Goal; so that upon complaint made for their delivery, the Queens Courts cannot tell to whom to direct her Majesties Writs; and by this means Justice cannot be done. And moreover, divers Officers and Serjeants of London have been many times committed to Prison for lawful executing of her Majesties Writs, sued forth of her Majesties Court at Westminster, and thereby her Majesties Subjects and Officers are so terrified, that they dare not sue or execute her Majesties Laws, her Writs and Commandments: Divers others have been sent for by Pursuants, and brought to London from their dwellings, and by unlawful imprisonment have been constrained, not only to withdraw their lawful Suits, but have also been compelled to pay the Pursuants, so bringing such persons, great sums of money. All which, upon complaint, the Judges are bound by Office and Oath to relieve and help, by and according to her Majesties Laws. And where it pleaseth your Lordships to will divers of us to set down in what Cases a Prisoner sent to custody by her Majesty or her Council, is to be detained in Prison, and not to be delivered by her Majesties Court or Judges: We think, That if any person be committed by her Majesties command, from her Person, or by Order from the Council-board; and if any one or two of her Council commit one for High Treason, such persons so in the Cases before committed, may not be delivered by any of her Courts, without due trial by the Law, and Judgment of acquittal had. Nevertheless the Judges may award the Queens Writ, to bring the bodies of such Prisoners before them; and if upon return thereof, the causes of their Commitment be certified to the Judges, as it ought to be, then the Judges in the Cases before, ought not to deliver him, but to remand the Prisoner to the place from whence he came, which cannot conveniently be done, unless notice of the cause in general, or else in special, be given to the Keeper or Gaoler that shall have the custody of such a Prisoner. All the Judges and Barons did subscribe their Names to these Articles, Ter. Paschæ 34 Eliz. and delivered one to the Lord Chancellor, and another to the Lord Treasurer: After which time there did follow more quietness than before, in the Cause before-mentioned.

After the reading of this Report, Sir Edward Cook said,

Sir Edw. Cook.

THAT of my own knowledge this Book vvas written vwith my Lord Anderson's own hand; it is no flying report of a young Student. I vvas Solicitor then, and Treasurer Burley vvas as much against Commitment as any of this Kingdom; It vvas the Whire Staves that made this stir. Let us draw towards a conclusion: The Question is, Whether a Freeman can be imprisoned by the King, vvithout setting down the cause? I leave it as bare as Aesop's Crow; they that argue against it, Humores moti & non remoti corpus destruunt. It is a Maxim, The Common Law hath admeasured the King's Prerogative, that in no case it can prejudice the Inheritance of the Subjects; had the Law given the Prerogative to that vvwhich is taken, it vvould have set some time to it, else mark vvhat vvould follow. I shall have an Estate of Inheritance for life, or for years in my Land, or propriety in my Goods, and I shall be a Tenant at Will for my Liberty: I shall have propriety in my own House, and not liberty in my person, Persone vera non sunt probanda. The King hath distributed his Judicial Power to Courts of Justice, and to Ministers of Justice; it is too low for so great a Monarch as the King is, to commit men to Prison; and it is against Law, that men should be committed, and no cause shewed. I vvould not speak this, but that I hope my gracious King vvill hear of it; yet it is not I Edward Cook that speaks it, but the Records that spake it; vve have a National appropriate Law to this Nation; diversis ab orbe Britannis. I vvill conclude vvith the Acts of the Apostles, Chap. 25. It is against reason to send a man to prison, and not to shew the cause. It is now time to go to the Question.

Car. 4.

Resolved upon the Question, Nemine contradicente.

I. That no Freeman ought to be detained or kept in Prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King or Privy Council, or any other, unless some cause of the Commitment, Detainer or Restraint be expressed, for vvwhich by Law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained.

Resolves touching the Subjects Liberty in his Person.

II. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in Prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other, he praying the same.

III. That if a Freeman be committed or detained in Prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other, no cause of such Commitment; Detainer, or Restraint being expressed, for vvwhich by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same be returned upon a Habeas Corpus, granted for the said Party, then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

And then, as to the Property of the Subject in his Goods, they came to this Resolve;

That it is the ancient and undubitable Right of every Freeman, that he hath a full and absolute property in his Goods and Estate; that no Tax, Tallage, Loan, Benevolence, or other like Charge ought to be commanded, or levied by the King, or any of his Ministers, vvithout common consent by Act of Parliament.

Wednesday, March 26.

The Propositions tendred the day before by Secretary Cook from his Majesty, vvhere now received and read, but the Debate thereof vvas referred to another day. The Propositions vvwere these; viz.

Anno 1628.

The King's Propositions to the House of Commons touching Supply.

1. To furnish vvith Men and Victualls Thirty Ships, to guard the Narrow Seas, and along the Coasts.

2. To set out Ten other Ships for relief of the Town of Rochel.

3. To set out Ten other Ships for the preservation of the Elbe, the Sound, and Baltick Sea.

4. To levy Arms, Cloth, Victual, Pay, and transport an Army of 1000 Horse and 10000 Foot, for Foreign Service.

5. To pay and supply 6000 more, for the Service of Denmark.

6. To supply the Forts of the Office of Ordnance.

- Anno*
1628.
7. To supply the Stores of the Navy.
 8. To build Twenty Ships yearly for the increase of the Navy.
 9. To repair the Forts within the Land.
 10. To pay the Arrears of the Office of Ordnance.
 11. To pay the Arrears of the Victuallers Office.
 12. To pay the Arrears of the Treasure of the Navy.
 13. To pay the Arrears due for the Freight of divers Merchant-Ships imployed in his Majesties Service.
 14. To provide a Magazine for Victuals for Land and Sea-service.

And the Commons having a Conference with the Lords about the Petition against Recusants, Secretary Cook was appointed to manage the said Conference.

A Conference between the Lords and Commons managed by Secretary Cook against Recusants.

IN the first place (he said) we acknowledge all due honours, both unto the Reverend Fathers of the Church, and to our Noble Lords, in that ye have shined before us as worthy Lights, in the encouragement and maintenance of true Religion, being the true Support of all Dignities and Honours. And this forwardness of you is the more remarkable, when that Viperous Generation, as your Lordships justly styled them, do, at ease, with tooth and nail, essay to rend the Bowels of their Mother. Give me leave to tell you what I know, That these now both vaunt at home, and write to their Friends abroad, They hope all will be well, and doubt not to prevail, and to win ground upon us.

And a little to wake the Zeal and Care of our Learned and Grave Fathers, it is fit that they take notice of that Hierarchy, which is already established, in competition with their Lordships; for they have a Bishop consecrated by the Pope; the Bishop hath his Subaltern Officers of all kinds as Vicars-General, Arch-Deacons, Rural-Deans, Apparators, and such like; Neither are these Nominal or Titular Officers alone, but they all execute their Jurisdictions, and make their ordinary Visitations through the Kingdom, keep Courts, and determine Ecclesiastical Causes. And which is an Argument of more consequence, they keep ordinary intelligence by their Agents in Rome, and hold correspondence with the Nuncio's and Cardinals, both at Brussels and in France.

Neither are the Seculars alone grown to this height, but the Regulars are more active and dangerous, and have taken deep root; they have already planted their Societies and Colledges of both Sexes, they have settled Revenues, Houses, Libraries, Vestments, and all other necessary provisions, to travel or stay at home: Nay, even at this time they intend to hold a current Assembly with this Parliament.

But now since his Sacred Majesty hath extended his Royal Arm, and since the Lords of his Council have, by their Authority, caused this Nest of Wasps to be digged out of the Earth, and their Convocations to be scattered; and since your Lordships joyn in courage and resolution, at least to reduce this people to their lawful restraint, that they may do no more hurt, we conceive great hope and comfort, that the Almighty God will from henceforth, prosper our endeavours both at home and abroad.

But now, my Lords, to come to the chief Errand of this our Meeting, which is, to make known to you the Approbation of our House of that Petition to his Majesty, wherein you are pleased to request our concurrence. The House hath taken it into serious consideration, and from the beginning to the end approve of every word, and much commend your happy Pen; only we are required to present unto you a few Additions, whereby, we conceive, the Petition may be made more agreeable to the Statutes which are desired to be put in execution, and to a former Petition granted by his Majesty, recorded in both Houses, confirmed under the Broad-Seal of England, and published in all our Courts of ordinary Justice.

But these things we propound, not as our Resolutions, or as Matters to raise debate or dispute, but commend them only as our advice and desire, being ready notwithstanding to joyn with your Lordships in the Petition, as now it is, if your Lordships shall not find this Reason to be of weight.

This being agreed unto, on Monday the 31 of March, the Petition was presented to his Majesty by both Houses; at the delivery whereof, the Lord Keeper spake as followeth:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

THE Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament Assembled, out of the due care of the Glory of Almighty God, and of the Honour and Safety of your Majesty, do, with all humbleness, and with one unanimous consent, present to your Royal Hands, the most Loyal desires of all their hearts; which is set down in a dutiful Petition, which is, to quicken the Laws against the Perturbers of the Peace of all States. We cannot, nor do not forget your Majesties most gracious Acts and Answers on the like Petition; they are visible to the World, to your Majesties honour and comfort: We bend our knees and hearts, blessing God and your Majesty therefore; yet let it not seem needless that we repair again to your Majesty: The Husbandman knows what Weeds are not destroyed at one weeding: These are growing Evils, they are Weeds of a spreading nature: And we that come from all parts, do think it our duty to tell your Majesty, that God's Vineyard is not yet cleansed. And God himself requires that we pray to him often, even for what he means and promiseth to bestow on us. But my message comes from the Pen of both Houses; and therefore I humbly beseech your Majesty to lend a gracious ear to hear me read the Petition.

The Lord Keeper's Speech at the presenting a Petition from both Houses against Recusants.

The King's Answer to the Petition.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

DO very well approve the method of your proceedings in this Parliament, A few Principium; hoping that the rest of your Consultations will succeed the happier. And I like the Preamble of my Lord Keeper, otherwise I should have a little suspected that you had thought me not so careful of Religion as I have, and ever shall be, wherein I am as forward as you can desire. And for the Petition, I answer first in general, That I like it well, and will use these as well as other means for the maintenance and propagation of that Religion wherein I have lived, and do resolve to die. But for the particulars, you shall receive a more full Answer hereafter. And now will I only add this, That as we pray to God to help Anno 1628: help us, so we must help our selves: For we can have no assurance of his assistance, if we do lie in bed, and only pray, without using other means. And therefore I must remember you, that if we do not make provision speedily, we shall not be able to put one Ship to Sea this year. Verbum sapienti sat est.

Afterwards the Lord Keeper signified unto the House, That his Majesty had now given his Answer unto the Petition exhibited by both Houses against Recusants, and had commanded his Lordship to read the same Answer in this House; and Mr. Secretary to read it in the House of Commons. Whereupon the Clerk read the first Article of the said Petition, and the Lord Keeper read his Majesties Answer unto the same, and to each Article thereof.

The which Petition, with the Answers, follow, in hac verba.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

WE your most loyal and obedient Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, having, to our singular comfort, obtained your Majesties pious & gracious assent for a publick fast, to appeale the wrath of Almighty God kindled against us, and to prevent those grievous Judgments which do apparently press upon us, do, in all humility, present unto your Sacred Majesty all possible thanks for the same. And because the publick and visible sins of the Kingdom, are the undoubted causes of those visible Evils that are fallen upon us; amongst which sins, (as is apparent by the Word of God) Idolatry and Superstition are the most heinous and crying sins; to the end that we may constantly hope for the blessing of God to descend upon this our publick Humiliation, by abandoning those sins which do make a wall of separation betwixt God and us.

Artic. 1. WE most humbly and ardently beg at the hands of your most Sacred Majesty, That your Majesty will be pleased to give continual life and motion to all those Laws, that stand in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and all that have taken Orders, by Authority of the See of Rome, by exacting a more due and serious execution of the same: Amongst which number, those that have highly abused your Majesties clemency, by returning into the Kingdom after their banishment, contrary to your Highnesses express Proclamation, we humbly desire may be left to the severity of your Laws, without admitting of any mediation or intercession for them. And that such of your Majesties unsound and ill-affected Subjects, as do receive, harbour, or conceal any of their viperous Generation, may, without delay, suffer such penalties and punishments, as the Laws justly impose upon them.

His Majesties Answer unto the first Article of this Petition.

TO the first Point his Majesty answereth; That he will, according to your desire, give both life and motion to the Laws that stand in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and all that have taken Orders, by Authority of the See of Rome: And to that end, his Majesty will give strict order to all his Ministers, for the discovering and apprehending of them, and so leave them, being apprehended, to the trial of the Law. And in case, after trial, there shall be cause to respite execution of any of them, yet they shall be committed (according to the example of the best times) to the Castle of Witch, and there be safely kept from exercising their Functions, or spreading their superstitious and dangerous Doctrine; and the Receivers and Abettors, they shall be left to the Law.

Artic. 2. That your Majesty would be pleased to command a surer and strait watch to be kept in and over your Majesties Ports and Havens, and to commit the care and charge of searching of Ships for the discovery and apprehension, as well of Jesuits and Seminary Priests brought in, as of Children and young Students, sent over beyond the Seas, to such in the popson of Rebellion and Superstition, unto men of approved fidelity and Religion: And such as shall be convicted to have connived or combined in the bringing in the one, or conveying of the other, that the Laws may pass upon them with speedy execution.

His Majesties Answer to the second Article.

TO the second Article, His Majesty granteth all that is in this Article; and to this end will give order to the Lord Treasurer, Lord Admiral and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, that in their several places they be careful to see this Article fully executed, giving strict charge to all such as have place and authority under them, to use all diligence therein. And his Majesty requireth them, and all other his Officers and Ministers, to have a vigilant eye upon such as dwell in dangerous places of advantage or opportunity, for receiving or transporting of any such as are here mentioned. And his Majesty will take it for good Service, if any will give knowledge of any such as have connived or combined, or shall connive or combine, as is mentioned in this Article, that Justice may be strictly done upon them.

Artic. 3. That considering those dreadful dangers (never to be forgotten) which did involve your Majesties Sacred Person, and the whole representative Body of your Majesties Kingdom, plotted and framed by the free and common accels of Popish Recusants to the City of London, and to your Majesties Court, your Majesty would be graciously pleased to give speedy command for the present putting in practice those Laws that prohibit all Popish Recusants to come to the Court, or within ten Miles of the City of London; as also those Laws, that confine them to the distance of five miles from their dwelling Houses; and that such by-past Licences not warranted by Law, as have been granted unto them for their repair to the City of London may be discharged and annulled.

1628.

His Majesties Answer to the third Article.

TO the third; His Majesty will take order to restrain the recourse of Recusants to the Court; and also for the other Points in this Article his Majesty is well pleased that the Laws be duly executed, and that all unlawful Licenses be annulled and discharged.

Artic. 4.

That whereas it is more then probably conceived, that infinite sums of Monies have within these two or three years last past been extracted out of the Recusants within the Kingdom by colour of composition, and a small proportion of the same returned unto your Majesties Coffers, not only to the suddain enriching of private persons, but to the emboldning of Romish Recusants to entertain Massing Priests into their private Houses, and to exercise all their iniquie Rites of their gross Superstition, without fear of controll, amounting (as by their daily practice and ostentation we may conceive) to the nature of a concealed Toleration; your Majesty would be graciously pleased to entertain this particular more nearly into your Princely wisdom and consideration; and to dissolve this mystery of Iniquity patched up of colourable Leases, Contracts, and Preconvenances, being but Masks on the one part of fraud to deceive your Majesty and States, on the other part for private men to accomplish their corrupt ends.

His Majesties Answer to the fourth Article.

TO the fourth Article; his Majesty is most willing to punish for the time past, and prevent for the future any of the deceits and abuses mentioned in this Article, and will account it a good service in any, that will inform Himself, his Privy Council, Officers of his Revenues, Judges, or learned Counsel, of any thing that may reveal this Mystery of Iniquity. And his Majesty doth strictly command every of them, to whom such information shall be brought, that they suffer not the same to die, but do their uttermost endeavour to effect a clear discovery, and bring the Offenders to punishment. And to the intent no concealed Toleration may be effected, his Majesty leaves the Laws to their course.

Artic. 5.

That as the Persons of Ambassadors from Foreign Princes, and their Houses, be free for the exercises of their own Religion, so their Houses may not be made free Chappels and Sanctuaries unto your Majesties Subjects, popishly affected, to hear Mass, and to participate in all other Rites and Ceremonies of that Superstition, to the great offence of Almighty God, and scandal of your Majesties People loyally and religiously affected: That either the concourse of Recusants to such places may be restrained, or at least such a vigilant watch set upon them, at their return from those places, as they may be apprehended, and severally proceeded withal, Ut qui palam in luce peccant, in luce puniantur.

His Majesties Answer to the fifth Article.

TO the fifth; His Majesty is well pleased to prohibit and restrain their coming and resort to the Houses of Ambassadors, and will command a vigilant watch to be set for their taking and punishing, as is desired.

That no place of Authority and Command, within any the Counties of this your Majesties Kingdom, or any Ships of your Majesties Service, be committed to Popish Recusants, or to Non-communicants by the space of a year past, or to any such persons as according to direction of former Acts of State are justly to be suspected, as the Place and Authority of Lords Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Justices of Peace, or Captains, or other Officers or Ministers mentioned in the Statute made in the Third year of the reign of your Father of blessed Memory: And that such as by Connivance have crept into such places, may by your Majesties Royal Command be discharged of the same.

Artic. 6.

His Majesties Answer to the sixth Article.

TO the sixth; His Majesty is perswaded that this Article is already observed with good care; nevertheless, for the avoiding (as much as may be) all errors and escapes in that kind, his Majesty will give charge to the Lord Keeper, that at the next Term he call unto him all the Judges, and take Information from them of the state of their several Circuits, if any such (as are mentioned in this Article) be in the commission of the Peace, that due reformation may be made thereof; And will likewise give order to the Lord Admiral, and such others to whom it shall appertain, to make diligent enquiry and certificate to his Majesty, if any such be in place of Authority and Command in his Ships or Service.

That all your Majesties Judges, Justices and Ministers of Justice, unto whose care and trust, execution (which is the life of your Majesties Laws) is committed, may, by your Majesties Proclamation, not only be commanded to put in speedy execution those Laws which stand in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and Popish Recusants, but that your Majesty would be further pleased to command the said Judges, and Justices of Assize, to give a true and strict account of their proceedings, at their returns out of their Circuits, unto the Lord Keeper, by the Lord Keeper to be presented unto your Majesty.

Artic. 7.

His Majesties Answer to the Seventh Article.

TO the Seventh His Majesty doth fully grant it.

And

1628.
Artic. 8.

Add for a faire and clear erabication of all Popery for the future, and for the breeding and nursing up of a holy Generation, and a peculiar People, sanctified unto the true Worship of Almighty God, that until a Provisional Law may be made for the training and educating of the Children of Popish Recusants, in the Grounds and Principles of our holy Religion, which we conceive will be of more power and force to unite your people unto you in fastness of Love, Religion, and loyal Obedience, than all pecuniary Duties and penalties that can possibly be devised: Your Majesty would be pleased to take it into your own Princely care and consideration, these our humble Petitions proceeding from hearts and affections Loyally and Religiously devoted to God and your Majesties Service, and to the safety of your Majesties Sacred Person, we most zealously present to your Princely wisdom, craving your Majesties cheerful and gracious approbation.

His Majesties Answer to the Eighth Article.

TO the Eighth, his Majesty doth well approve it, as a matter of necessary consideration; and the Parliament now sitting, he recommendeth to both Houses the preparation of a fitting Law to that effect. And his Majesty doth further declare, that the mildness that hath been used towards those of the Popish Religion, hath been upon hope, that Foreign Princes thereby might be induced to use moderation towards their Subjects of the Reform'd Religion; but not finding that good effect which was expected, His Majesty resolveth, unless he shall very speedily see better fruits, to add a further degree of severity, to that which in that Petition is desired.

The 2 of April, the Propositions sent from his Majesty, were mentioned, and several of the Lower-House spake to them as followeth, Several Speeches made at the Debates concerning the King's Propositions for Supply, April 2. 1628.

Mr. Alford.

That to answer punctually to every Article, were but to discover the King's wants, which is neither safe nor fit (as the World now goes) nor is it good for him to ask more than we can give, nor for us to answer disproportionably; withal it might be drawn into a President for the Subjects to make and maintain Wars.

Sir Robert Mansell.

IT had been much better for us to have taken care for those Propositions three years since; my desire is, not to have the Commons over-burthened. That Seven of these Propositions are not to be neglected, viz. The safe Guarding of the Coasts; the defence of Elbe; the defence of Roche; the increasing of the Navy; the Repairing of the Forts; the discharging of the Arrears of Merchants Ships; and the defence of the King of Denmark; the other seven to be delayed to our next meeting at Michaelmas.

Sir Francis Seymour.

That as Supply is desired, so are we met for that purpose: But if by those late courses we be disabled, then he is not to expect it from us. Our greatest Grievances being his Majesties pressing wants. Two Subsidies formerly given, and five forceably and unadvisedly taken, are great motives not to be too forward. That we have too hastily drawn two great Enemies upon us, and both at one time; and all this done by men of small or no judgment.

Sir Peter Hayman.

That vast Propositions are delivered to us in shew, I desire, that he may give an Estimate of them that first brought them in.

Mr. Pym.

That in no case it is fit to examine the Propositions, especially of the Arrearages of the Merchants Ships, and for the preparation of Foreign Wars.

Secretary Cooke.

That three things especially are to be taken into consideration: the defence of Roche, the Elbe, and the Forts. He persuades to give bountifully now, which though the people do not presently pay it, yet it gives the King Credit abroad, and much advanceth his Affairs. We have already by our carriage and temper taken the King's Heart, which, he adviseth, we may make good use of.

Sir Dudley Diggs.

For to try and examine faithfully the Propositions, he refers it to the Judgment of the House, whether it be fit to handle the business in order, or to give in Gross, considering the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage is now brought into the House, which he thinks, they conceive to be given for the safe Guarding of the Seas.

Mr. Spencer.

IN no Case to enter into particulars, That formerly have been given our Subsidies for Repairing the Forts, and no Penny bestowed on them, but the Money wasted in dishonour.

Sir John Elliot.

That our late disasters at Cales and Rhe, might discourage us from thinking of any Foreign Attempts; at Cales when we neglected the taking of the Spanish Fleet in the Harbour; nothing attempted at our Landing but Drinking and Disorder; no good account given at their return, concerning the Service. At St. Martins, the whole Action carried against the Judgment of the best Commanders, which makes all the World despise and condemn us; besides, enriching of the Enemy with kindness, parleying with the Forts, without Presidents, which time will bring to light.

Sir

1628.

Sir Edward Cooke.

That when England stood alone, without Friends, or addition of Kingdoms, as 42 E. 3. the King (wholly guided by his Parliament Council) brought alwaies home Victory, and prevailed both against France and Scotland. His Four Reasons of it were, First, Good Counsel. Secondly, Valiant Leaders. Thirdly, Timely Provision. Fourthly, Good Employment, and Forecast; and likewise in Rich. 2. Hen. 4. Hen. 5. he desires to give plentifully, and that in Gross; and not to examine the particulars, alledging Solomon's Rule, Qui repetit separat; For (said he) if we rip them up, we sever them for ever. And in that Proposition for setting forth Thirty Ships, shall we pay Tonnage and Poudage for them. This will draw a dangerous President, likewise in that other of setting forth (God knows whither) one thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot; being not able to set them forth, how shall we look to maintain them abroad? That in an Island, the Defensive War is best, and most proper. To conclude, our gift in Gross will suit best with these times; for, by that course, we shall seem to allow all the Propositions, and except against none.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

That he will look after the Island of England, and no farther, except our fortunes were better. That as he is bound in duty to the King, so in Faith and Love to his Country. That our Freedom and Liberty being known and granted, we may proportion our Gift. His Conclusion was, that the final debate of this Question may be laid aside until Friday, and in the mean time, to go on with the Grievances.

Sir Henry Martin.

Not to dash the Ship of the Common-wealth twice upon one Rock, the Disease we are now Sick of is the King's evil, which none but himself can cure; and Jacob's Example is our best President, who Wrestling with the Angel, would not give over till he got the Blessing. That over often Repetition of Grievances breeds hate and dislike. And because we have not to give what is asked; yet to give freely what we intend to give: and so by this means, we shall gain the King's Heart.

Mr. Kirton.

He desires to know the Rock, to the end we may avoid it; and not to go back, but forward in our Consultations.

Sir Robert Phillips.

His good hopes are in his Majesties Royal Care and Wisdom, that the free and great Council is the best, but time and hope of change is coming towards us: Rome and Spain trench deeply in our Counsels. That heretofore there hath been a fair progress on both parts, according to the saying of the late King, If the Parliament should give more than the Country could bear, They gave him a Purse with a Knife in it.

Serjeant Hoskins.

That knowing our own Right, we shall be better enabled to give. Two legs go best together, our just Grievances, and our Supply, which he desires may not be separated; for by presenting them together, they shall be both taken, or both refused.

Presently after the discussing of the King's great affairs and engagements, the House of Commons to enable him to go through with his designs, for his Majesties and the Kingdoms Honour, granted the Five Subsidies, of which their love, Sir John Cooke desired to be (and was appointed by the House) the Reporter to his Majesty, which he did accordingly.

The Debate about the Propositions being laid by, the House took into Consideration the Grievance of Confinement, and Designation for Foreign Employment; the Persons speaking to these were

Mr. Selden.

Confinement is different from Imprisonment, and it is against the Law that any should be confined, either to his House, or else-where: I know not what you can call a punishment, but there is some ground of it, or mention thereof in Acts of Parliament, Law-Books, or Records; but for this of Confinement, I find none: Indeed Jews have been confined in former times to certain places, as here in London to the Old Jewry: The Civilians have perpetual Prisons, and coercive Prisons, upon Judgments in Court. Carcer domesticus is a confinement for mad-men.

Sir T. Hobby.

I Was employed in 88. in that Service, it was then thought fit that Recusants should be confined in strong places, but it was not held legal, and when the Navy was dispersed, they were let at liberty; and the Parliament Petitioned the Queen for a Law, to warrant the Confinement: Hereupon it was resolved, That no Free-men ought to be confined by any Command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unless it be by Act of Parliament, or by other due course or warrant of Law. And then the House proceeded to the Debate, concerning Designation to Foreign Employment.

Sir Peter Hayman.

Touching Designation to Foreign Employment, Sir Peter Hayman opened his own Case: I have forgot my employment unto the Palatine, I was called before the Lords of the Council, for what I know not, I heard it was for not lending on a Privy-Seal. I told them, if they will take my Estate, let them, I will give it up, lend I will not. When I was before the Lords of the Council, they laid to my charge my unwillingness to serve the King; I said, I had my Life and my Estate to serve my Country, and my Religion: They put upon me, if I did not pay, I should be put upon an employment of Service. I was willing. After ten weeks waiting, they told me I was to go with a Lord into the Palatinate, and that I should have employment there, and means besfitting. I told them, I was a Sub-

Anno 1628. A Subject, and desired means. Some put on very eagerly, some dealt nobly; they said, I must go on my own purse: I told them, Nemo militat suis expensis. Some told me, I must go; I began to think, what, must I? none were ever sent out in that kind. Lawyers told me, I could not be so sent. Having that assurance, I demanded means, and was resolved not to stir upon those terms, and in silence and duty I denied. Upon this, they having given me a command to go, after twelve daies they told me, they would not send me as a souldier, but to attend on an Embassador. I knew that stone would hit me. I settled my troubled Estate, and addressed my self to that Service.

Mr. Hackwell.

This is a great point, that much concerns the Common-wealth, if the King cannot command a Subject to his necessary Service; and on the other side, it will be little less than an honorable banishment to the Subject, if he may. Our Books say, the King cannot compel any to go out of the Realm; and an Action brought against him, he cannot plead in Bar, that he is by command from the King in Foreign Service, but the King may give him his protection. 5 E. 3. N. 9. in the Parliament-Roll there was an Ordinance, whereby the King had power to send some to Ireland, it is ordained, that such Sages of the Law and Souldiers, where need shall be, though they refuse to go, and excuse themselves, if their excuses be not reasonable, the King may do to them according to right and reason: If the King by Law could do this of himself, and send them to Ireland his own Dominion, he would never have taken power from his Parliament; and if men do not according to that Law, there is no imprisonment prescribed.

Sir E. Cook.

NO restraint, be it never so little, but is Imprisonment, and foreign employment is a kind of honourable Banishment: I my self was designed to go to Ireland, I was willing to go, and hoped if I had gone, to have found some Accomplishments there: There is difference when the Party is the King's servant, and when not. 46 E. 3. this was the time when the Law was in its height: Sir Richard Pembridge was a Baron, and the King's Servant, and Warden of the Cinque-Ports, he was commanded to go to Ireland and to serve as Deputy there, which he refused: He was not committed, but the King was highly offended, and having Offices and Fees and Lands pro servitio suo impenso, the King seized his Lands and Offices: I went to the Parliament Roll, 47 E. 3. where I found another president for Foreign employment; they that have Offices pro consilio or servitio impenso, if they refuse, those Lands and Offices so given are seized, but no Commitment.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

If any man owes a man a displeasure, and shall procure him to be put into Foreign Employment, it will be a matter of high concernment to the Subject: We know the Honour and Justice of the King, but we know not what his Ministers or the mediation of Embassadors may do to work their own wrath upon any man.

Sir John Elliot.

If you grant this Liberty, what are you the better by other privileges? what difference is there between imprisonment at home, and constrained employment abroad; it is no less than a temporal Banishment, neither is it for his Majesties service to constrain his Subjects to employment abroad: Honour and Reward invites them rather to seek it; but to be compelled, stands not with our Liberty.

Resolved by the House, That no Free-men ought to be confined by any command from the King, or Privy Council, or any other, unless it be by Act of Parliament, or by other due course or warrant of Law.

The Debate concerning the Supply was put off till Friday following.

Thursday, 3 of April.

Mr. Secretary Cook brought the House this Message from the King.

His Majesty having understood that some rumours were spread abroad of a sharp Message yesterday delivered by me, and of some malicious words, that the Duke should speak yesterday at the Council-Board, he commanded me to tell you of the malice of those false reports, for that nothing fell from the Duke or that Board, but what was for the good of this Assembly: He would have you observe the malice of those spirits that thus put in these Jealousies: Had the Duke so spoken, he should have contradicted himself, for all of us of the Council can tell, he was the first mover and perswader of this Assembly of Parliament to the King. Esteem of the King according to his Actions, and not these Tales; His Majesty takes notice of our purpose, that on Friday we shall resolve upon Supply, which his Majesty graciously accepts of, and that our free gift without any condition should testify to the world, that we will be as far from incroaching upon his Prerogative, as he will be to incroach upon our Liberties; and this shall well appear, when we present our Grievances to him, and then we shall know that he hath no intention to violate our Liberties, only let us not present them with any asperity of words; he counts it his greatest glory to be a King of Free-men, not of Villains: He thought to have delivered this Message himself, but that he feared it would take us too much time.

The King sends a Message to the House by Secretary Cook, touching some words said to be spoken by the Duke.

Then he added a word of his own, 'Yesterday after Dinner we attended his Majesty, and he asked us what we had done: We said we had entered into the consideration of Supply, and that the final Resolution was deferred till Friday; and that this was done for just reasons, to joyn the business of his Majesties and our Countries together, and this would further his Majesty, and it would give content to the Country, and that this union here might be spread abroad in the World. His Majesty answered, For God's sake, why should any hinder them in their Liberties? if they did it not, I should think they dealt not faithfully with me. You may see a true Character of his Majesties disposition: let us proceed with courage, and rest assured his Majesty will give great ear unto us, and let us all joyn to make a perfect union to win the Kings heart; we shall find a gracious answer from the King, and a hearty co-operation from those that you think to be

Debates on the Message.

The House upon this debate acknowledged his Majesty had put a threefold Obligation on them; First, in giving them satisfaction. Secondly, in giving them assurance (which is a great Law) that he will protect and relieve them. Thirdly, in giving them advice as may best the Gravity of that Assembly and his own Honour. So they concluded to carry themselves as their Progenitors before had done, who never were marked for stepping too far on the Kings Prerogative, and they returned their humble thanks to his Majesty.

Friday 4
April, Secretary
Cook brings another Message
from the King.

The day following Mr. Secretary Cook delivered another Message from the King, viz. His Majesty hath again commanded me to put you in mind how the eyes and interest of the Christian world, are cast upon the good or evil success of this Assembly. He also graciously taketh notice of that which is in agitation amongst us, touching the freedom of our Persons, and propriety of our Goods; and that this particular care (which he no way misliketh) may not retard our resolution for the general good, he willerth us cheerfully to proceed in both, and to express our readiness to supply his great occasions, upon assurance that we shall enjoy our Rights and Liberties, with as much freedom and security in his time as in any age heretofore under the best of our Kings. And whether you shall think fit to secure our selves herein, by way of Bill or otherwise, so as it be provided for with due respect of his Honour and the publick good, whereof he doubteth not but that you will be careful, he promitteth and assureth you that he will give way unto it; and the more confidence you shall shew in his grace and goodness, the more you shall prevail to obtain your desires.

Upon this occasion Mr. Pym spake.

Mr. Pym.

That in business of weight, dispatch is better than discourse; We came not hither without all motives that can be towards his Majesty, had he never sent in this Message; We know the danger of our Enemies, we must give Expedition to Expedition; let us forbear particulars. A man in a journey is hindered by asking too many questions: I do believe our peril is as great as may be, every man complains of it, that doth encourage the Enemy: our way is to take that that took away our Estates, that is, the Enemy; to give speedily is that that the King calls for: A word spoken in season, is like an Apple of Silver; and actions are more precious than words. Let us hasten our Resolutions to supply his Majesty. And after some debate, they came to this unanimous Resolve,

That Five Subsidies be given to his Majesty; and Mr. Secretary Cook was appointed to acquaint his Majesty with the Resolution of the House.

Monday the 7. of April.

Mr. Secretary
Cook reports
the King's acceptance of Five Subsidies.

Mr. Secretary Cook reported to the House the King's acceptance of the Subsidies, and how his Majesty was pleased to ask, by how many voices they were gained; I said, But by one. His Majesty asked, How many were against him? I said, None; for they were voted by one voice, and one general consent. His Majesty was much affected therewith, and called the Lords in Council, and there gave them an account what had passed; besides, it gave his Majesty no small content, that although Five Subsidies be inferior to his wants, yet it is the greatest gift that ever was given in Parliament; and now he sees with this he shall have the affections of his People, which will be greater to him than all value. He said, He liked Parliaments at the first, but since (he knew not how) he was grown to a distaste of them; but was now where he was before, he loves them, and shall rejoice to meet with his People often.

Upon the giving of the Five Subsidies, the Duke of Bucks made this Speech at the Council-Table, and Mr. Secretary at that time acquainted the House therewith. The Speech was this.

Sir, methinks I behold you a great King, for Love is greater than Majesty; opinion that the people loved you not, had almost lost you in the opinion of the World; but this day makes you appear as you are, a glorious King, loved at home, and now to be feared abroad; this falling out so happily, give me leave, I beseech you, to be an humble suitor to your Majesty; First for my self, that I who have had the honor to be your Favorite, may now give up that Title unto them, they to be your Favourites, and I to be your Servant. My second suit is, That they having done also well, you will account of them as one; a Body of many Members, but all of one heart: opinion might have made them differ, but affection did move them all to joyn with like love in this great gift: for proportion, although it be less than your occasions may ask, yet it is more than ever Subjects did give in so short a time; nor am I perswaded it will rest there, for this is but as an earnest of their affections, to let you see, and the world know, what Subjects you have, that when the honor, and the good of the State is engaged, and aid asked in the ordinary way of Parliament, you cannot want. This is not the gift of five Subsidies alone, but the opening of a Mine of Subsidies that lieth in their hearts. This good beginning hath wrought already these effects, they have taken your heart, drawn from you a Declaration that you will love Parliaments. And again, this will meet (I make no question) with such respect, that their demands will be just, dutiful, and moderate; for they that know thus to give, know well what is fit to ask. Then cannot your Majesty do less than out-go their demands, or else you do less than your self or them; for your Message begot trust, their truth and your promises must then beget performances. This being done, then shall I, with a glad heart, behold this work as well ended as now begun, and then shall I hope, that Parliaments shall be made hereafter so frequent, by the effects and good use of them, as they shall have this further benefit, to deter from approaching your ears those projectors and inducers of innovation, as disturbers, both of Church and Common-wealth. Now, Sir, to open my heart, and to ease my grief, please you to pardon me a word more; I must confess I have long lived in pain, sleep hath given me

of Bucks speech at the Council-Table
therupon.

Anno. 1628. me no rest, Favours and Fortunes no content, such have been my secret sorrows, to be thought the man of separation, and that divided the King from his People, and them from him; but I hope it shall appear, they were some mistaken minds, that would have made me the evil Spirit that walketh between a good Master and Loyal People, by ill Offices; whereas, by your Majesties favour, I shall ever endeavour to approve my self a good Spirit, breathing nothing but the best of Services to them all. Therefore this day I account more blessed to me than my birth, to see my self able to serve them, to see you brought in love with Parliaments, to see a Parliament express such a love to you; and God so love me and mine, as I joy to see this day.

Mr. Secretary Cook also at this time repeated the substance of the King's Answer to the Petition concerning Recusants. And after he had done, Sir John Elliot expressed the great satisfaction which he apprehended, the House in general, and himself in special, had received touching each particular of his Majesties gracious Answer; but shewed his dislike, that Mr. Secretary, in the close of his Relation, made mention of another in addition to his Majesty, which formerly had been a matter of complaint in the House, the mixture with his Majesty, not only in the business, but in his name. 'Is it (said he) that any man conceives the mention of others (of what quality so ever) can add encouragement or affection to us in our duties and loyalties towards his Majesty, or give them greater latitude or extent, than naturally they have? Or is it supposed, that the power or Interest of any man can add more readiness to his Majesty, in his gracious inclination to us, than his own goodness gives him? I cannot believe it. And as the sweetness and piety of his Majesty, which we have in admiration, makes me confident in this, so the expressions of our duty so perspicuous and clear, as already hath been given, is my assurance for the other.

But, Sir, I am sorry there is this occasion, that these things should be argued, or this mixture which was formerly condemned, should appear again: I beseech you, Sir, let it not be hereafter, let no man take this boldness within these Walls to introduce it, though, I confess, for my particular, I shall readily commend, nay, thank that man, whose endeavours are applied in such Offices, as may be advantageable for the publick: Yet in this matter, so contrary to the Custom of our Fathers and the honour of our Times, I cannot without scandal apprehend it, nor without some Characters or Exception pass it by, that such interposition for the future may be left.

Now let us proceed; said he, to those services that concern his Majesty and the Subject, which (I doubt not) in the end will render us so real unto him, that we shall not need more help to endear us to his favour.

And now we come to give you the Conference which the Commons had with the Lords. It was managed by the Persons following, but that part which consists of Book-Cases and Presidents which was mannag'd by Mr. Selden, doth follow the other.

SIR Dudley Digges began with this Introduction: 'I am commanded to shew unto your Lordships in general, that the Laws of England are grounded on Reason, more ancient than Books, consisting much in unwritten Customs, yet so full of Justice and true Equity, that your most honourable Predecessors and Ancestors propounded them with a Nolumus mutari; and so ancient, that from the Saxon daies, notwithstanding the injuries and ruines of time, they have continued in most part the same, as may appear in old remaining Monuments of the Laws of Ethelbert, the first Christian King of Kent, Ina the King of the West-Saxons, Offa of the Mercians, and of Alfred the great Monarch, who united the Saxon Heptarchy, whose Laws are yet to be seen published, as some think, by Parliament, as he shies to that end, Ut qui sub uno Rege, sub una Legge regerentur. And though the Book of Lawsfield, speaking of the times of the Danes, saies, then, Ius positum erat in regna, leges & consuetudines sapientia sunt; and, Prava voluntas, vi & violentia magis regnabant quam Iudicia vel Justitia: Yet, by the blessing of God, a good King Edward, commonly called St. Edward, did awaken those Laws, and as the old words are, Excitavit reparavit, reparatas decoravit, decoratas confirmavit; which confirmavit shews, that good King Edward did not give those Laws, which William the Conquerour, and all his Successors, since that time, have sworn unto.

And here, my Lords, by many Cases frequent in our modern Laws, strongly concurring with those of the ancient Saxon Kings, I might, if time were not more precious, demonstrate, that our Laws and Customs were the same.

I will only intreat your Lordships leave to tell you, That as we have now, even in those Saxon times, they had their Court Barons, and Court-Leets, and Sheriffs Courts, by which, as Tacitus saies of the Germans, their Ancestors, Jura reddebant per pagos & vicos; and I do believe, as we have now, they had their Parliaments, where new Laws were made, Cum consensu Prælatorum, Magnatum & totius Communitatis; or as another writes, Cum consilio Prælatorum, Nobilium & sapientium Laicorum; I will add nothing out of Glanville, that wrote in the time of Hen. 2. or Bracton, that writ in the daies of Hen. 3. only give me leave to cite that of Fortescue, the learned Chancellor to H. 6. who writing of this Kingdom, saies, Regnum istud moribus nationum & regum temporibus, eisdem quibus nunc regitur legibus & consuetudinibus regebatur. But, my good Lords, as the Poet said of Fame, I may say of our Common-Law, Ingrrediturque solo, caput inter nubila condit.

Wherefore the cloudy part being mine, I will make haste to open way for your Lordships, to hear more certain Arguments, and such as go on more sure grounds.

Be pleas'd then to know, that it is an undoubted and fundamental Point of this so ancient Common-Law of England, That the Subject hath a true property in his Goods and Possessions, which doth preserve as Sacred, that Meum & Tuum, that is the Nurse of Industry and Mother of Courage; and without which, there can be no Justice, of which Meum & Tuum is the proper object. But the undoubted Birth-right of true Subjects hath lately not a little been invaded and prejudiced by pressures; the more grievous, because they have been pursued by Imprisonment, contrary to the Franchises of this Land: and when according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, redress hath been sought for in a legal way, by

It is ill taken by Sir John Elliot, that the Duke's name was intermingled with the King's by Secretary Cook.

Sir Dudley Digges begins the Conference by way of Introduction.

Anno 1628. demanding Habeas Corpus from the Judges, and a discharge by Trial according to Law of the Land, success hath failed: that now enforceth the Commons in this present Parliament Assembled, to examine, by Acts of Parliament, Precedents and Reasons, the truth of the English Subjects liberty, which I shall leave to a learned Gentleman to argue.

Mr. Littleton.

Next after Sir Dudley Digges, spake Mr. Ed. Littleton of the Inner-Temple, 'That their Lordships have heard, that the Commons have taken into consideration the matter of personal Liberty, and after long debate thereof, they have, upon a full search, and clear understanding of all things pertinent to the Question, unanimously declared, That no Free-man ought to be committed or restrained in Prison by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unless some cause of commitment, detainer or restraint be expressed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained: And they have sent me, with other of their Members, to represent unto your Lordships the true grounds of their resolution, and have charged me particularly, leaving the reasons of Law and Precedents for others, to give your Lordships satisfaction, that this Liberty is established and confirmed by the whole State, the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, by several Acts of Parliament, the Authority whereof is so great, that it can receive no Answer, save by Interpretation or Repeal by future Statutes. And these I shall mind your Lordships of, are so direct in the point, that they can bear no other exposition at all; and sure I am, they are still in force. The first of them is the grand Charter of the Liberties of England, first granted in the 17 year of King John, and renewed in the 19 year of Hen. 3. and since confirmed in Parliament above Thirty times; the words there are, Chap. 29. Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disseisietur de libero tenemento suo vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, aut utlagatur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec eum mittemus, nisi per legale iudicium Parium suorum, vel per legem terra.

He then proceeded to open, and argued learnedly upon the several particulars in the last recited Clause of Magna Charta; and further shewed, That no invasion was made upon this personal Liberty, till the time of King Edw. 3. which was soon repented by the Subject, for in the 5 Ed. 3. Chap. 9. it is enacted, That no man from henceforth shall be attached on any occasion, nor forejudged of Life or Limb, nor his Lands, Tenements, Goods, nor Chattels, seised into the King's hands, against the Form of the Great Charter, and the Law of the Land. And 25 Ed. 3. Chap. 4. it is more full, and doth expound the words of the Grand Charter, which is thus; Whereas it is contained in the Grand Charter of the Franchises of England, that none shall be imprisoned, nor put out of his Freehold, nor Free-custom, unless it be by the Law of the Land, it is awarded, assented, and established, That from henceforth none shall be taken by Petition or Suggestion made to our Lord the King, or to his Council, unless it be by Indictment or Presentment of his Good and lawful People of the same Neighbourhood; which such Deed shall be done in due manner, or by Process made by Writ original at the Common-Law; nor that none be outed of his Franchises, Office, nor Freehold, unless it be duly brought in Answer, and forejudged of the same, by the course of the Law, and that if any thing be done against the same, it shall be redressed and holden for none. And 28 Ed. 3. Chap. 3. it is more direct, this liberty being followed with fresh Suit by the Subject, where the words are not many, but very full and significant, That no man, of what state and condition he be, shall be put out of his Lands nor Tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without it be brought in Answer by due process of the Law. Several other Statutes were cited by him, in confirmation of this point of the liberty of the Subject.

The King's Council afterward made Objections to the said Argument, yet acknowledged, That the seven Statutes urged by the House of Commons, are in force; yet said, That some of them are in general words, and therefore conclude nothing, but are to be expounded by Precedents, and some of them are applied to the suggestion of Subjects, and not to the King's command simply of its self; and that per legem terra in Magna Charta, cannot be understood for process of Law, and original Writs; for that in Criminal proceedings, no original Writ is usual at all, but every Constable, either for Felony, or breach of the Peace, or to prevent the breach of the Peace, may commit without Process or original Writ; it were very hard the King should not have the power of a Constable. They also argued, That the King was not bound to express the cause of Imprisonment, because there may be in it matter of State, not fit to be revealed for a time, lest the Confederates thereupon make means to escape the hands of Justice. Besides, that which the Commons do say, That the Party ought to be delivered or bailed, is a contradiction in it self; for Bailing doth signifie a kind of imprisonment still, Delivery is a total freeing: And besides, Bailing is a grace or favour of a Court of Justice, and they may refuse to do it.

To this it was replied, That the Statutes were direct in point, and though some of them speak of suggestions of the Subjects, yet they are in equal reason a commitment by command of the King, as when the King taketh notice of a thing himself. And for the words, per legem terra original Writs only are not intended, but all other legal Process, which comprehendeth the whole proceedings of the Law upon Cause other than trial by Jury, and the course of the Law is rendred by due process of the Law, and no man ought to be imprisoned by special Command without Indictment, or other due process to be made by the Law. And whereas it is said, there might be danger in revealing the Cause, that may be avoided, by declaring a general Cause, as for Treason, suspicion of Treason, misprision of Treason, Felony, without expressing the particulars, which can give no greater light to a Confederate, than will be conceived upon the very apprehension upon the imprisonment, if nothing at all were expressed.

And as for the bailing of the Party committed, it hath ever been the discretion of the Judges, to give so much respect to a Commitment, by the Command of the King or Privy-Council, which are ever intended to be done in just and weighty Cases, that they will not suddenly set them them free, but bail them to answer what shall be objected against them, on the King's behalf; but if any other inferior Officer do commit a man without shewing cause, they do instantly deliver him, as having no cause to expect their leisure; so that Delivery is applied to the imprisoned, by command of some mean Minister of Justice: Bailing, when it is done by command of the King, or his Council; and though Bailing is a grace and favour of the Court, in case of Felony and other Crimes, for that there is another way to discharge them in convenient time by their trial, but where no cause of imprisonment is returned, but the command of the King, there is no way to deliver such persons by trial or otherwise, but that of the Habeas Corpus; and if they should be then remanded, they might be perpetually imprisoned without any remedy at all, and consequently a man that had committed no offence, might be in a worse case than a greater Offender; for the latter should have an ordinary trial to discharge him, the other should never be delivered.

Mr. Selden.

MR. Selden of the Inner Temple argued next, first making this Introduction, 'Your Lordships have heard from the Gentleman that last spake, a great part of the grounds upon which the House of Commons, upon mature deliberation, proceeded to that clear resolution touching the right of the liberty of their persons: The many Acts of Parliament, which are the written Laws of the Land, and are expressly in the point, have been read and opened, and such Objections as have been by some made unto them; and Objections also made out of another Act of Parliament, have been cleared and answered: It may seem now perhaps (my Lords) that little remains needful to be further added, for the enforcement and maintenance of so fundamental and established a Right and Liberty belonging to every Freeman of the Kingdom.

The House of Commons taking into consideration, that in this Question, being of so high a nature, that never any exceeded it in any Court of Justice whatsoever, all the several ways of just examination of the Truth should be used, have also most carefully informed themselves of all former Judgments or Presidents concerning this great point either way; and have been no less careful of the due preservation of his Majesties just Prerogative, than of their own Rights. The Presidents here are of two kinds, either merely matter of Record, or else the former resolutions of the Judges, after solemn debate in the point.

This point that concerns Presidents, the House of Commons have commanded me to present to your Lordships, which I shall as briefly as I may, so I do it faithfully and perspicuously: to that end, my Lords, before I come to the particulars of any of those Presidents, I shall first remember to your Lordships; that which will seem as a general Key for the opening and true apprehension of all them of Record; without which Key, no man, unless he be vers'd in the Entries and Course of the King's Bench, can possibly understand.

In all Cases, my Lords, where any Right or Liberty belongs to the Subjects by any positive Law, written or unwritten, if there were not also a Remedy by Law, for enjoying or regaining of this Right or Liberty, when it is violated, or taken from him, the positive Law were most vain, and to no purpose; and it were to no purpose for any man to have any Right in any Land or other Inheritance, if there were not a known Remedy; that is, an Action or Writ, by which in some Court of ordinary Justice, he might recover it. And in this Case of Right of Liberty of Person, if there were not a Remedy in the Law for regaining it when it is restrain'd, it were of no purpose to speak of Laws that ordain it should not be restrained.

The Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum causa, is the highest Remedy in Law for any man that is imprisoned, and the only Remedy for him that is imprisoned by the special command of the King, or the Lords of the Privy Council, without shewing cause of the Commitment; and if any man be so imprisoned by any such Command, or otherwise whatsoever through England, and desire, by himself, or any other in his behalf, this Writ of Habeas Corpus for the purpose in the Court of King's Bench, that Writ is to be granted to him, and ought not to be denied, and is directed to the Keeper of the Prison, in whose custody the Prisoner remains, commanding him, That after a certain day he bring in the Body of the Prisoner, cum causa detentionis; and sometimes cum causa captionis; and he, with his Return, filed to the Writ, bringeth the Prisoner to the Bar at the time appointed, and the Court judgeth of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the Return; and if they find him bailable, committitur Marefcallo, the proper Prison belonging to the Court; and then afterward, traditur in ball. but if upon the return of the Habeas Corpus it appear to the Court, that the Prisoner ought not to be bailed, nor discharged from the Prison whence he is brought, then he is remanded and sent back again, to continue, till by due course of Law he may be delivered; and the Entry of this is, Remittitur quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit; or, Remittitur quousque, &c. which is all one, and the highest award of Judgment that ever was or can be given upon a Habeas Corpus.

Your Lordships have heard the Resolution of the House of Commons, touching the enlargement of a man committed by the command of the King, or the Privy Council, or any other, without cause shewed of such Commitment; which resolution, as it is grounded upon Acts of Parliament already shewn (the reason of the Law of the Land being committed to the charge of another to open unto you) so it is strengthened by many Presidents of Records.

He then produced twelve Presidents, full and direct in the point, to prove that persons so committed, ought to be delivered upon Bail, which were distinctly opened and read to their Lordships; then he also offered to their consideration other kind of Presidents, which were solemn Resolutions of Judges, things not of Record, but yet remain in Authentick Copies; which Presidents and Authorities hereafter follow at page 271.

He then proceeded, and said, 'The House of Commons desiring with all care to inform themselves fully of the truth of the resolution of the Judges in the 34 year of the Queen, cited in this Case of Sir John Heveningham; by the King's Council, as Arguments against his not being bailed, have got into their hands a Book of Select Cases,

Car. 4.

Cases, collected by the Reverend and Learned Judge, Chief Justice Anderson, all written with his own hand; which he caused to be read, being the same which hath been already mentioned in the Collections of this Parliament; which Precedents, saith he, do fully resolve enough for the maintenance of the Ancient and Fundamental Point of Liberty of the Person, to be regained by Habeas Corpus, when any is imprisoned.

Then he concluding, 'That having thus gone through the Charge committed to him by the House of Commons, he should now, as he had leave and direction given him, lest their Lordships should be put to much trouble and expence of time, in finding and getting Copies at large of those things which he had cited, offer also to their Lordships, Authentick Copies of them all, and so left them, and whatsoever else he had said,
 to their Lordships further consideration.

Sir Edward Cooke.

At of all, Sir Edward Cooke took up the Argument, as to the Rational part of the Law, and began with this Introduction; 'Your Lordships have heard seven Acts of Parliament in point, and Thirty one Precedents summarily collected, and with great understanding delivered, which I have perused, and understand them all throughly; Twelve of the Presidents are in terminis terminantibus, a whole Jury of Presidents, and all in the point: I am much transported with joy, because of the hope of good success in this weighty business, your Lordships being so full of Justice, and the very Theme and Subject doth promise success, which was, Corpus cum causa, the freedom of an English man, not to be imprisoned without cause shewn, which is my part to shew, and the reason and the cause why it should be so, wherein I will not be prolix nor copious; for to gild Gold were idle and superfluous. And after he had cleared some doubts made of the Statute of Westminster, which saith, That the Sheriffs and others, in some cases, may not replevin men in Prison; he proceeded further and said, 'That all those Arguments offered unto your Lordships in this last Conference, are of a double nature:
 1. Acts of Parliament; 2. Judicial Presidents.
 For the first, I hold it a proper Argument for your Lordships, because you my Lords Temporal, and you my Lords Spiritual, gave your assent unto those Acts of Parliament; and therefore if these cannot persuade you, nothing can. For the second, which are Judicial Presidents, it is Ar-gumentum ab Autoritate, and Argumentum ab Authoritate velut affirmativè; that is, I conceive, though it be no good Argument to say negatively, the Judges have no opinion in the point. 3. It is good Law, which I fortifie with a strong Axiom, Neminem oportet sapientiores esse legibus. Now these two Arguments being so well pressed to your Lordships by my Colleagues, I think your Lordships may wonder what my part may be; it is short, but sweet; it is the Reason of all those Laws and Presidents; and Reason must needs be welcome to all men; for all men are not capable of the understanding of the Law, but every man is capable of Reason; and those Reasons I offer to your Lordships, in affirmance of the ancient Laws and Presidents made for the Liberty of the Subject, against Imprisonment without cause expressed.

1. Are ipsa.

2. A minori ad majus.

3. From the remedies provided.

4. From the extent and universality of the same.

5. From the infiniteness of the time.

7. A fine.

The first general Reason is, Are ipsa, even from the nature of imprisonment, ex visceribus cause, for I will speak nothing but ad idem, be it close or other imprisonment; and this Argument is threefold, because an imprisoned man upon will and pleasure is,

1. A Bond-man.

2. Worse than a Bond-man.

3. Not so much as a Man; for mortuus homo non est homo, a Prisoner is a dead man.

1. No man can be imprisoned upon will and pleasure of any, but he that is a Bond-man and Villain, for that imprisonment and bondage are Propria quarto modo to Villains; now propria quarto modo, and the species, are convertible; who soever is a Bond-man, may be imprisoned upon will and pleasure; and whosoever may be imprisoned upon will and pleasure, is a Bond-man.

2. If Freeman of England might be imprisoned at the will and pleasure of the King or his Commandment, then were they in worse case than Bond-men or Villains; for the Lord of a Villain cannot command another to imprison his Villain without cause, as of disobedience, or refusing to serve, as is agreed in the Year-Books.
 And here he said, 'That no man should reprehend any thing that he said out of the Books or Records; he said, he would prove a Freeman im-prisonable upon command or pleasure, without cause expressed, to be absolutely in worse case than a Villain: And if he did not make this plain, he desired their Lordships not to believe him in any thing else. And then produced two Bookcases, 7 E. 3. fol. 50. in the new print, 348 old print. A Prior had commanded one to imprison his Villain, the Judges were ready to bail him, till the Prior gave his reason, that he refused to be Bailiff of his Mannor; and that satisfied the Judges. Second Case, 33 Ed. 3. Title Tresp. 253.
 in Faux imprisonment, it was of an Abbot, who commanded one to take and detain his Villain, but demanded his cause; he gives it, because he refused, being thereunto required, to drive his Cattle.

Ergo, Freeman imprisoned without cause shewn, are in worse case than Villains, that must have a cause shewn them why they are imprisoned.

3. A Freeman imprisoned without cause, is so far from being a Bondman, that he is not so much as a man, but is indeed a dead man, and so no man: Imprisonment is in Law a Civil death, perdis domum, familiam, vicinos, patriam, and is to live amongst wretched and wicked men, Male-factors, and the like. And that death and imprisonment was the same, he proved by an Argument ab effectis, because they both produce the like immediate effects; he quoted a Book for this:
 If a man be threatned to be killed, he may avoid Feoffment of Lands, Gifts of Goods, &c. so it is if he be threatned to be imprisoned; the one is an actual, the other is a civil death. And this is the first general Argument, drawn Are ipsa, from the nature of imprisonment, to which res ipsa consili-um dedit.

1628.

The second general Reason he took also from his Books, for he said he hath no Law, but what by great pains and industry he learnt at his Book, for at ten years of age he had no more Law than other men of like age; and this second reason is, A minori ad majus; he takes it from Bracton, minus pena corporalis, est major qualibet pecuniaria.

But the King himself cannot impose a Fine upon any man, but it must be done judicially by his Judges, per Justitiales in Curia, non per Regem in Camera; and so it hath been resolved by all the Judges of England: he quoted 3 R. 2. fo. 11.

The third general Reason is taken from the number and diversity of remedies which the Laws give against Imprisonment, viz.

Brevé de homine replegiando.

De odio & mala.

De Habeas Corpus.

An Appeal of Imprisonment.

Brevé de mandamur.

The latter two of these are antiquated, but the Writ, De odio & mala, is revived, for that was given by the Statute of Magna Charta, chap. 26, and therefore though it were repealed by Statute of 42 E. 3. by which it is provided, that all Statutes made against Magna Charta are void; now the Law would never have given so many remedies, if the Freeman of England might have been imprisoned at free will and pleasure.

The fourth general Reason is from the extent and universality of the pretended power to imprison; for it should extend not only to the Commons of this Realm, and their Posterities, but to the Nobles of the Land, and their Progenies, to the Bishops and Clergy of the Realm, and their Successors. And he gave a cause why the Commons came to their Lordships, Communis periculum commune requirit auxilium. Nay, it reacheth to all persons, of what condition, or sex, or age soever; to all Judges and Officers, whose attendance is necessary, &c. without exception, and therefore an imprisonment of such an extent, without reason, is against reason.

The fifth general Reason is drawn from the indefiniteness of time, the pretended power being limited to no time, it may be perpetual during life; and this is very hard: to cast an old man into prison, nay, to close prison, and no time allotted for his coming forth, is a hard case, as any man could think that had been so used. And here he held it an unreasonable thing, that a Man had a remedy for his Horse or Cattle, if detained, and none for his Body thus indefinitely imprisoned; for a Prison without a prefixed time, is a kind of Hell.

The sixth and last Argument is a Fine; and sapiens incipit a Fine, and he wist he had begun there also; and this Argument he made threefold.

- Ab honesto.* This being less honourable.
- Ab utili.* This being less profitable.
- A tuto.* This Imprisonment by will and pleasure, being very dangerous for the King & Kingdom.

1. Ab honesto. It would be no honour to a King or Kingdom, to be a King of Bondmen or Slaves, the end of this would be both Deditus & Dominum, both to King and Kingdom, that in former times have been so renowned.

2. Ab utili. It would be against the profit of the King and Kingdom, for the execution of those Laws before remembered, Magna Charta,

5 Edw. 3. 24 Edw. 3. 28 Edw. 3. whereby the King was inhibited to imprison upon pleasure: Cura.

You see (quoth he) that this was Magna Charta, an old question, and now brought in again, after seven Acts of Parliament; I say, the execution of all these Laws are adjudged in Parliament to be for the common profit of the King and People; and he quoted the Roll, this pretended power being against the profit of the King, can be no part of his Prerogative.

He was pleased to call this a binding Reason, and to say, that the wit of man could not answer it, that great men kept this Roll from being printed, but that it was equivalent in force to the printed Rolls.

3. A Reason a iure. It is dangerous to the King for two respects; first, of loss; secondly, of destroying the endeavours of men. First, if he be committed without the expression of the cause, though he escape, albeit in truth he were for Treason or Felony, yet this escape is neither Felony nor Treason, but if the cause be expressed for suspicion of Treason or Felony, then the escape, though it be innocent, is Treason or Felony. He quoted a Cause in print like a Reason of the Law, not like Remittitur at the rising of the Court, for the Prisoner, traditur in Bullam quod brevis non fuit sufficientis causa. The Kings command. He quoted another famous Cause, The Commons in Parliament interdicted against the Duke of Suffolk, desire he should be committed: The Lords and all the Judges, whereof those great Worthies, Prescor and Forscok, were two, delivered a flat opinion, That he ought not to be committed without an especial cause. He questioned also the name and etymology of the Writ in question, Corpus cum causa; Ergo, The Cause must be brought before the Judge, else how can he take notice hereof?

Lastly, He pressed a place in the Gospel, Mat. 23. last verse, which Festus conceives is an absurd and unreasonable thing, to send a Prisoner to a Roman Emperor, and not to write along with him the Cause alledged against him: Send therefore no man a Prisoner, without his Causes along with him, hoc fac & vivet. And that was the first Reason, A iure, that it was not safe for the King, in regard of Loss, to commit men without a Cause.

The second Reason is, That such Commitments will destroy the endeavours of all men, who will endeavour to employ himself in any Profession, either of War, Merchandise, or of any Liberal Knowledge, if he be but Tenant at Will of his Liberty; for no Tenant at Will will support or improve any thing, because he hath no certain Estate; Ergo, to make men Tenants at Will of their Liberties, destroys all industry and endeavours whatsoever. And so much for these six principal Reasons:

- A iure.*
- A minori ad majus.*
- A remediis.*
- From the extent and universality.
- From the indefiniteness of the time.
- A fine.*

Honour.
Profit.
Security.
Industry.

These were his Reasons.

Here

Here he made another Protestation, 'That if remedy had been given in this Case, they would not have meddled therewith by no means; but now that remedy being not obtain'd in the King's Bench, without looking back upon any thing that hath been done or omitted, they desire some provision for the future only. And here he took occasion to add four Book Cases and Authorities, all in the point, saying, That if the Learned Council on the other side could produce but one against the Liberties, so pat and pertinent, Oh! how they could hug and cull it. 16 H. 6. in memoranda de factis 82. by the whole Court, the King in his presence cannot command a man to be arrested, but an action of false imprisonment lieth against him that arresteth: If not the King in his Royal Presence, then none others can do it. Non per quod ad alia. 1 Hen. 7. 4. Hully reports the opinion of Marham, Chief Justice to Edw. 4. that he could not imprison by word of mouth; and the reason, because the Party hath no remedy, for the Law leaves every man a remedy of cruell imprisonment. He added, that Marham was a worthy Judge, though he fell into adversities at last by the Lord Rivers his means. Forsyth, chap. 8. Proprio ore nullus Regem ulu est, to imprison any man, &c. 4 Eliz. Times blessed and approved for Justice and Religion, in Pl. 135. the Common Law hath so admeasured the King's Prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance; and the greatest inheritance a man hath, is the liberty of his person, for all others are accessory to it; for thus he quoteth the Orator, Major hereditas venit unicuique nostrum a Jure legibus quam a parentibus.

And these are the four Authorities he cited in this point: Now he propounded and answered two Objections; First, in point of State; Secondly, in the Course held by the House of Commons.

Object. 1. 'May not the Privy Council commit, without cause shewed, in no matter of State where secrecy is required? would not this be an hinderance to his Majesties Service?

Ans. 'It can be no prejudice to the King by reason of matter of State, for the cause must be of higher or lower nature. If it be for suspicion of Treason, misprision of Treason or Felony, it may be by general words couched; if it be for any other thing of smaller nature, as contempt, and the like, the particular cause must be shewed, and no individuum vagum, or uncertam cause to be admitted.

Object. 2. 'Again, If the Law be so clear as you make it, why needs the Declaration and Remonstrance in Parliament?

Ans. 'The Subject hath in this Case sued for Remedy in the King's Bench by Habeas Corpus, and found none; therefore it is necessary to be cleared in Parliament. And here ends his Discourse: And then he made a recapitulation of all that had been offered unto their Lordships, that generally their Lordships had been advised by the most faithful Counsellors that can be; dead men, these can't be daunted by fear, nor muzzled by affection, reward or hope of preferment, and therefore your Lordships might safely believe them; particularly their Lordships had three several kinds of proofs.

1. Acts of Parliament, Judicial Precedents, good Reasons. First, you have had many ancient Acts of Parliament in the Point, besides Magna Charta, that is, seven Acts of Parliament, which indeed are thirty seven, Magna Charta being confirmed thirty times, for so often have the Kings of England given their Royal Assents thereunto.

2. Judicial Precedents of grave and reverend Judges, in terminis terminantibus, that long since departed the World, and they were many in number. Precedents being twelve, and the Judges four of a Bench, made four times twelve, and that is forty eight Judges.

3. You have, as he termed them, viduae rationes, manifest and apparent Reasons: Towards the conclusion he declareth to their Lordships, That they of the House of Commons have, upon great study and serious consideration, made a great manifestation unanimously, Nullo contradicere, concerning this great Liberty of the Subject, and have vindicated and recovered the Body of this fundamental Liberty, both of their Lordships and themselves, from shadows, which sometimes of the day are long, sometimes short, and sometimes long again; and therefore we must not be guided by shadows: and they have transmitted to their Lordships, not capitulum rerum, Heads or Briefs, for these compendia are dispendia; but the Records at large, in terminis terminantibus: and so he concluded, that their Lordships are involved in the same danger, and therefore ex congrua & condigna they desired a Conference, to the end their Lordships might make the like Declaration as they had done, Commune periculum, commune requirit auxilium; and thereupon take such further course, as may secure their Lordships and them, and all their Posterity, in enjoying of their ancient, undoubted, and fundamental Liberties.

The Argument which by command of the House of Commons was made at their first Conference with the Lords, touching the Liberty of the Person of every Freeman, out of Presedents of Records, and Resolutions of Judges in former times.

My Lords,

Your Lordships have heard from the Gentlemen that last spake, a great part of the grounds upon which the House of Commons, after mature deliberation, proceeded to that clear resolution touching the right of Liberty of their Persons: The many Acts of Parliament (which are the written Laws of the Land) and are expressly in the point, have been read and opened; and such Objections as have been by some made unto them, and some other Objections also made out of another Act of Parliament, have been cleared and answered: it may seem now perhaps (my Lords) that little remains needful to be further added, for the enforcement and maintenance of so fundamental and established a Right and Liberty belonging to every Freeman of the Kingdom; but in the examinations of Questions of Law or Right, besides the Laws or Acts of Parliament that ought chiefly to regulate and direct, every man's Judgment (whatsoever hath been put in practise to the contrary) there are commonly used also former Judgments or Presedents, and indeed have been so used sometimes, that the weight and reason of Law, and of Acts of Parliament, have been laid by, and Resolutions have been made, and that in this very point, only upon the interpretation and apprehension of the Presidents. But Presidents (my Lords) are good media or proofs of illustration or confirmation, when they agree with the express Law, but they can never be proof enough to overthrow any one Law, much less seven several Acts of Parliament, as the number of them is for this point: The House of Commons therefore taking into consideration, that in this Question (being of so high a nature) that never any exceeded in any Court of Justice whatsoever, all the several ways of just examination of the truth should be used, have also most carefully informed themselves of all former Judgments or Presidents concerning this great point, either way, and have been no less careful of his Majesties Prerogatives than of their own Rights.

The Presidents here are of two kinds, either merely matter of Record, or else the former Resolutions of the Judges after solemn debate in the point.

This part that concerns Presidents; the House of Commons hath commanded me to present to your Lordships, which I shall as briefly as I may, so I do it also faithfully and perspicuously.

To that end (my Lords) before I come to the particulars of any of these Presidents; I shall first remember to your Lordships that which will serve as a general Key for the opening and true apprehension of all them of Record, without which Key no man, unless he be versed in the Entries and course of the King's Bench, can possibly understand them.

In all cases (my Lords) where any Right or Liberty belongs to the Subject, by any positive Law written or unwritten, if there were not also a remedy by Law, for the enjoying or regaining of this Right or Liberty, when it was violated or taken from him, the positive were most vain; and it were to no purpose for any man to have Right in any Land, or other Inheritance, if there were not a known remedy, that is an Action or Writ, by which in some ordinary Court of Justice he might recover it. And in this Case of Right of Liberty of the Person, if there were not a remedy in the Law for regaining it when it is restrained, it were to no purpose to speak of Laws, that ordain it should not be restrained. Therefore in this Case, I shall first observe the remedy that every Freeman is to use for the regaining of his liberty, when he is against Law imprisoned, that so upon the legal course and form to be held in using that remedy, the Presidents or Judgments upon it; (for all Presidents of Record arise out of this remedy) may be easily understood. There are in Law divers remedies for enlargement of a Freeman imprisoned, as the Writs of Odio & Asia, and of Homine replegiando, besides the common and most known Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum Causa, as it is called also.

The first two Writs are to be directed to the Sheriff of the County, and lye only in some particular Cases, with which it would be untimely for me to trouble your Lordships, because they concern not that which is committed to my charge; but that Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum Causa, is the highest remedy in Law for any man that is imprisoned by the special command of the King, or of the Lords of the Privy Council, without shewing cause of the Commitment; neither is there in the Law any such thing, nor ever was there mention of any such thing in the Laws of this Land, as a Petition of Right to be used in such Cases for Liberty of the Person; nor is there any other legal Course to be used for enlargement in such Cases, howsoever the contrary hath upon no ground or colour of Law been pretended.

Now (my Lords) if any man be imprisoned by any such Command, or otherwise in any Prison whatsoever through England, and desire either by himself, or any other in his behalf, this Writ of Habeas Corpus (for the purpose in the Court of the King's Bench) the Writ is to be granted to him, and ought not to be denied him, no more than any ordinary Original Writ in the Chancery, or other common Process of Law may be denied, which (among other things) the House of Commons hath resolved also upon mature deliberation, and I was commanded to let your Lordships know so much. This Writ is directed to the Keeper of the Prison, in whose custody the Prisoner remains, commanding him, That at a certain day he bring the Body of the Prisoner, ad subjiciendum & recipiendum quod curia consideraverit, &c. una cum causa captionis & detentionis, only captionis being omitted.

The Keeper of the Prison thereupon returns by what Warrant he detains the Prisoner, and with his Return filed to his Writ, brings the Prisoner to the Barr at the time appointed. When the return is thus made, the Court judgeth of the sufficiency or insufficiency of it, only out of the Body of it, without having respect to any other thing whatsoever; that is, they are to suppose the Return to be true whatsoever it be: if it be false, the party may have his remedy by Action on the Case against the Goaler that brought him. Now (my Lords) when the Prisoner comes thus to the Barr, if he desire to be bailed, and that the Court upon view of the Return think him in Law to be bailed, then he is always first taken from the Keeper of the Prison that brings him, and committed to the Marshal of the King's Bench, and afterwards bailed, and the Entry is Committitur Marr' & postea tradit' in ballium, for the Court never bails any man until he first become their own Prisoner, and be in custody of the Marr' of that Court.

But if upon Return of the Habeas Corpus it appear to the Court that the Prisoner ought not to be bailed, nor discharged from the Prison whence he is brought, then he is remanded or sent back again, there to continue until by due Course of Law he may be delivered; and the Entry in such Case is, Remittitur quousque secundum Legem deliberatus fuerit, or Remittitur quousque, &c. which is all one, and is the highest Award or Judgment that ever was, or can be given upon a Habeas Corpus. But if the Judges doubt only, whether in Law, they ought to take him from the Prison whence he came, or give a day to the Sheriff to amend his Return, (as they often do) then they remand him only during the time of their Debate, or until the Sheriff hath amended his Return; and the Entry upon that is, Remittitur prisona predicta without any more.

And so Remittitur generally is of far less moment in the Award upon the Habeas Corpus, than Remittitur quousque, &c. however vulgar opinions raised out of the Fame of the late Judgment be to the contrary. All these things are of most known and constant use in the Court of King's Bench, as it cannot be doubted but your Lordships will easily know from the grave and learned, my Lords the Judges.

Anno 1628. These two Courses, the one of the Entry of Committitur Marefc' postea traditur in ballium, and the other Remittitur quousque, and Remittitur generally, or Remittitur prisona predict', together with the Nature of the Habeas Corpus, being thus stated, it will be easier for me to open, and your Lordships to observe whatsoever shall occur to this purpose in the Presidents of Record, to which I shall now come in the particular. But before I come to the Presidents, I am to let your Lordships understand the resolution of the House of Commons touching the enlargement of any man committed by the command of the King, or the Privy Council, or any other, without cause shewed of such Commitment, it is thus:

That if a Freeman be committed or detained in Prison, or otherwise detained, by the Command of the King, or any other, and no cause of such commitment expressed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus granted for the Party, that then he ought to be delivered or bailed. This resolution, as it is grounded upon these Acts of Parliament already shewed, and reason of the Law of the Land which is committed to the charge of another, and anon to be also opened to you, is strengthened also by many Presidents of Record.

But the Presidents of Record that concern this point are of two kinds, for the House of Commons hath informed it self of such as concern either kind. The first that shew expressly that Persons committed by the command of the King, or of the Privy Council, without other cause shewed, have been enlarged upon bail when they prayed it; whence it appeareth clearly that by Law they were bailable, and so by Habeas Corpus to be set at liberty: for though they ought not to have been committed without cause shewed of their Commitment, yet it is true that the Reverend Judges of this Land in former Ages did give such respect to such Commitments by Command of the King, or of the Lords of the Council, (as also to the Commitments sometimes of inferiour persons) that upon the Habeas Corpus they rarely used absolutely to discharge the persons instantly, but to enlarge them only upon bail, which sufficiently secures and preserves the liberty of the Subject, according to the Laws that your Lordships have already heard; nor in any of these Cases is there any difference between such Commitments by the King, or by the Lords of the Council that are incorporated with him.

The second kind of Presidents of Record are such as have been pretended to prove the Law to be contrary, and that persons so committed ought not to be set at liberty upon bail, and are in the nature of Objections out of Record.

I shall deliver them summarily to your Lordships with all faith, and also the true Copies of them, out of which it shall appear clearly to your Lordships, that of those of the first kind there are no less than twelve most full and directly in the point, to prove that persons so committed are to be delivered upon bail; and among those of the other kind, there is not so much as one, not one that proves at all any thing to the contrary. I shall first (my Lords) go through them of the first kind, and so observe them to your Lordships, that such scruples as have been made upon them (by some that have excepted against them) shall be cleared also according as I shall open them severally.

The first of this first kind is of Edw. 3. time: It is in Pasch. 18 E. 3. rot. 33. Rex; the Case was thus:

King Edw. 3. had committed by Writ, and that under the Great Seal (as most of the King's Commands in those times were) one John de Bildestone, a Clergy man, to prison to the Tower, without any cause shewed of the Commitment. The Lieutenant of the Tower is commanded to bring him into the King's Bench, where he is committed to the Marshal. But the Court asks the Lieutenant if there were any cause to keep this Bildeston in prison besides the Commitment of the King; he answered No: whereupon (as the Roll says) quid videtur curia breve predict' (that is the King's Command, sufficientem non esse causam, predictum Johannem de Bildestone in prisona Marr' Regis hic detinentum, idem Johannes dimittetur per manucaptionem Willelmi de Wakefeld, and some others, where the Judgment of the Court is fully declared in the point.

The second of the first kind of Presidents of Record is, in the time of H. 8. one John Parker was committed to the Sheriffs of London, pro securitate pacis, at the Suit of one Brimon, Ac pro suspicionem feloniam, committed by him at Cromwell in Glocestershire, ac per mandatu' Domini Regis, he is committed to the Marshal of the King's Bench, & postea isto eodem Termino traditur in Ball'. Here were other causes of the Commitment, but certainly one was a Command of the King, signified to the Sheriffs of London, of which they took notice. But some have interpreted this as if the Commitment here had been upon suspicion of Felony by command of the King, in which Case it is agreed of all hands that the Prisoner is bailable. But no man can think so of this President that observes the Context, and observes the Grammar of it, wherein most plainly ac per mandatum Domini Regis hath no reference to any other cause whatsoever enumerated in the Return by it self, as the Record sheweth it is in 22 H. 8. rot. 37.

The third is of the same King's time; it is 35 H. 8. rot. 33. John Binck's Case, he was committed by the Lords of the Council, pro suspicionem Feloniam, ac pro aliis causis illos moventibus, qui committitur Marr', &c. & immediat ex grac' Cur' special' tradit' in Ball': They committed him for suspicion of Felony and other causes them thereunto moving, wherein there might be matter of State or whatever else can be supposed, and plainly the cause of their Commitment is not expressed; yet the Court bailed him without having regard to any other of those unknown causes that moved the Lords of the Council; but it is indeed somewhat different from either of these other two that precede, and from the other nine also that follow: for it is agreed, that if a cause be expressed in the Return, inasmuch that the Court can know why he is committed, that then he may be bailed, but not if they know the cause. Now a man is committed for a cause expressed, & pro aliis causis Dominos de Consilio moventibus: certainly the Court can no more know in such a Case what the cause is than any other.

The fourth of these is in the time of Queen Mary, it is Pasch. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. rot. 58. Overton's Case. Richard Overton was returned upon a Habeas Corpus directed to the Sheriffs of London, to have been committed and detained ad mandatum pranobilium duorum honorabilium Consilij Domini

Anno 1628. minorum Regis & Regina qui committitur Marr' &c. & immediate traditur in Ball. In answer to this Presedent, or by way of Objection, against the force of it, it hath been said, That this Overton stood at that time Indicted of Treason; it is true, he was so Indicted, but that appears in another Roll; yet they that object this against the force of this Presedent, say, That because he was Indicted of Treason, therefore though he were committed by command of the Lords of the Council, without cause shewed, yet he wasailable for the Treason, and upon that was here bailed; than which Objection nothing is more contrary, either to Law or common Reason. It is most contrary to Law; for that clearly every Return is to be adjudged by the Court, out of the Body it self, and not by any other collateral or forreign Record whatsoever; therefore the matter of Indictment here, cannot in Law, because of the bailing the Petitioner, and it is so adverse to all common Reason, that if the Objection be admitted, it must of necessity follow, That whosoever shall be committed by the King, or Privy Council, without cause shewed, and be not Indicted of Treason, or some other Offence, may not be enlarged by the reason of the suspicion of matter of State, but that whosoever is so committed, and stands so Indicted, (though in another Record) may be enlarged, whatsoever the matter of State be for which he was committed. The absurdity of which Assertion needs not a word for further confutation; as if any of the Judgment in the last Judgment ought to have been the sooner delivered if he had been also Indicted of Treason; certainly if so, Traytors and Felons have the highest priviledge of personal Liberty, and that above all other Subjects of the Kingdom.

The fifth of the first kind is of Queen Maries time also; it is Pasch. 4 & 5 P. & M. rot. 45. the Case of Edward Newport, he was brought into the King's Bench by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower of London, cum causa (viz.) quod Commiss' fuit per mandat' Consilij Domine Regine qui committitur Marr', &c. & immediate traditur in ball.

To this the like kind of Answer hath been made, as to that other of Overton's next before cited; they say, That in another Roll of the same year it appears he was in question for suspicion of Coinage: and it is true, he was so; but the Return and this Return mentioned in it, have no reference to any such Offence, nor hath the bailment of him relation to any thing, but to the absolute Commitment of the Privy Council, so that the Answer to the like Objection made against Overton's Case, satisfies this also.

The sixth of these is of Queen Elizabeths time, rot. 35. the Case of Thomas Lawrence. This Lawrence came in by Habeas Corpus, returned by the Sheriffs of London, to be detained in prison, per mandat' Consilij Domine Regine qui committitur Marr', &c. & super hoc traditur in ballium.

An Objection hath been invented against this also: It hath been said, That this man was pardoned; and indeed it appears so in the Margin of the Roll, where the word pardonatur is entered; but clearly his enlargement by bail was upon the body of the Return, unto which that note of pardon, in the Margin of the Roll, hath no relation at all. And can a man think that a man pardoned (for what offence so ever it be) might not as well be committed for some Arcanum or matter of State, as one that is not pardoned, or out of his Innocency wants no pardon?

The Seventh of these is of the same year, and of Easter Term following; it is Pasch. 9 Eliz. Rotl' 68. Robert Constables Case, he was brought by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower; and by the Return it appeared, he was committed there per mandat' privati Consilii dicta Domina Regine qui committitur Marr', &c. Et postea isto eodem Termino traditur in ballium. The like Objection hath been made to this, as to that before of Lawrence, but the self same answer clearly answers for both of them.

The Eighth is of the same Queens time in Pasch. 20 Eliz. Rotl' 72. John Browning's Case; this Browning came by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower, whither he had been Committed, and was Returned to have been Committed per privati Consilium Domina Regine qui committitur Marr' & postea isto eodem Termino traditur in Ballium. To this it hath been said, that it was in my Lord Chief Justice Wray's Chamber, and not in Court. And thus the Authority of the President hath been lessened, or slighted; if it had been done at the Chamber, it would have proved at least thus much, That Sir Christopher Wray, then Chief Justice of the King's Bench (being a grave learned and upright Judge) knowing the Law to be so, did Bail this Browning, and so enlarged him, and even so far the Presidents were of value enough, but it is plain though the Habeas Corpus were Returnable indeed (as appears by the Record it self) at his Chamber in Serjeants-Inn; yet, he only Committed him to the King's Bench presently, and referred the consideration of enlarging him to the Court, who afterward did it, for the Record saies, Et postea isto eodem Termino traditur in ballium, which cannot be of an enlargement at the Chief Justices Chamber.

The Ninth of this first kind, is in Hill' 40. Eliz. Rotl' 62. Edward Hartcourt's Case, he was imprisoned in the Gate-house, and that per Dominos de prefat' Consilio Domina Regine pro certis causis eos moventibus & ei ignotis, and upon his Habeas Corpus was returned to be therefore detained, Qui committitur Marr', &c. & postea isto eodem Termino traditur in ballium.

To this not any colour of answer hath been yet offered.

The Tenth is Catesbies Case, in the Vacation after Hillary Term, 43 Eliz. Rotl' Robert Catesby was Committed to the Fleet per Warrant diversorum pre nobilium virorum de privati Consilij Domine Regine, he was brought before Justice Fenner, one of the then Judges of the King's Bench by Habeas Corpus at Winchester House in Southwark; & Commissus fuit per prefat' Edw. Fenner, & statim traditur in ballium.

The Eleventh is Richard Beckwithes Case, which was in Hillar' 12 Jac. rot. 153. he was returned upon his Habeas Corpus, to have been committed to the Gate-house by divers Lords of the Privy Council, qui committitur Marr', &c. & postea isto eodem Termino traditur in ballium.

To this it hath been said by some, That Beckwith was bailed upon a Letter written by the Lords of the Council to that purpose to the Judges, which though it had been, would have proved nothing against the Record; for it was never before heard of, that Judges were to be directed in point of Law by Letters from the Lords of the Council;

Anno 1628. although it cannot be doubted, that by such Letters sometimes they have been moved to bail men that would not, or did not ask their enlargement without such Letters, as some examples do manifest, which I shall shew your Lordships among the Presedents of the second kind.

The Twelfth and last of these is of Sir Thomas Mounson's Case, it is Mich. 14 Jac. rot. 147. he was committed to the Tower per Warrant à diversis Dominis de prefato Consilio Domini Regis locum tenen' direct' ; and was returned by the Lieutenant to be therefore detained in prison, Qui committitur Mar', &c. & super hoc traditur in ballium.

To this it hath been answered, That every one knows by common Fame, that this Gentleman was committed for suspicion of the death of Sir Thomas Overblow, and that he was therefore bailable; a most strange interpretation: as if the Body of the Return, and the Warrant of the Privy Council should be understood and adjudged out of the Fame only. Was not there cause why the Gentlemen that were remanded in the late Judgment were committed, and might not the self same kind of reason have served to enlarge them, their offence (if any were) being, I think, much less than that for which this Gentleman was suspected?

And thus I have faithfully opened the number of Twelve Presedents most expresse in the point in question, and cleared the Objections that have been made against them.

And of such Presedents as are of Record of the first kind, and prove plainly the practise of former Ages, and Judgment of the Court of King's Bench, in the very point, in behalf of the Subject (my Lords) hitherto.

I come next to those of the second kind, or such as have been pretended to prove, that persons so committed are not to be enlarged by the Judges upon the Habeas Corpus, but ought to remain in prison still, at the pleasure of the King or of the Privy Council.

These are of two natures: the first of these is where some assent of the King, or of the Privy Council, appears upon the enlargement of a prisoner so committed, as if, because such assent appears, therefore the enlargement could not have been without such assent.

The second of this kind, are those which have been used, as expresse Testimonies of the Judges denying bail, and in such Cases I shall open these also to your Lordships, which being done, it will most clearly appear, there is nothing at all in any of these that make any thing against the Resolution of the House of Commons touching this point; nay, it is so far from their making against it, that some of them add good weight also to the proof of that Resolution.

For those of the first nature of this second kind of Presedents, they begun in the time of Hen. 7. Thomas Bragg and divers others were imprisoned in the King's Bench, ad mandat. Domini Regis, they never sought remedy by Habeas Corpus, or otherwise for ought appears. But the Roll says, That Dominus Rex relaxavit mandat. and so they were bailed: but can any man think that this is an Argument, either in Law or common Reason, that therefore they could not be bailed without such assent? It is common in Cases of common persons, that one being in prison for Surety of the Peace, or the like, at the Suit of another, is bailed upon the release of the party Plaintiff; can it follow that therefore he could not have been bailed without such release? Nothing is more plain than the contrary; it were the same thing to say, that if it appear that a Plaintiff be Nonfuit, therefore unless he had been Nonfuit, he could not have been bailed in the Suit. The Cause last cited is M. 7. H. 7. rot. 6.

The very like is in the same year, Hill. 7. H. 7. rot. 13. the Cause of William Bartholomew, William Chace, and divers others, and the self same Answer that is given to the other, clears this.

So in the same year, P. 7. H. 7. rot. 18. John Beamond's Case is the same in substance with these other two, and therefore the self same answer also satisfies that, clears them.

The next is Mich. 12. H. 7. rot. 8. Thomas Tew's Case, he was committed ad sectam pacis, for surety of the Peace, at the Suit of one Freeman, and besides ad mandat. Domini Regis, and first Freeman relaxavit sectam pacis, and then Sir James Hubbard, the then King's Attorney General, relaxavit mandat. Domini Regis, and hereupon he is bailed. The release of the Kings Attorney no more proves here, that he could not have been enlarged without such release or assent, than he could not have been bailed without the release of the surety of the Peace by Freeman.

The very like is in Hillary Term, 9 H. 7. rot. 14. the Case of Humphrey Bloch, which proves no more here than the rest of this kind already cited.

Then for this part also Browns Case of Queen Elizabeths time, hath been cited. The Case is Trinitat. Eliz. 6. rot. 118. Lawrence Brown was committed to the Gate-house per mandat. Dominorum Consilij Domina Regina, and being returned so upon the Habeas Corpus, is first committed to the Marshalsey (as the course is) and he bailed by the Court, which indeed is an expresse Presedent that perhaps might well have been added to the number of the first Twelve, which so plainly shew the practise of enlarging persons in the Case by Judgment of the Court upon the Habeas Corpus: but it is true, that in the Scrowls of that year, where the Bails are entered (but not in the Record of the Habeas Corpus) there is a Note that this Brown was bailed per mandat. prefat. Consilij super Habeas Corpus. But plainly, this is not any kind of Argument, that therefore in Law he might not otherwise have been bailed.

The self same is to be said to another of this kind, in Mich. 40 Eliz. rot. 37. Windens Case. Thomas Winden was committed to the Gate-house by the Queen and Lords of the Council, pro certis causis, generally he is brought by Habeas Corpus into the Kings Bench, and bailed by the Court: But it is said that in the Scrowls of that year it appears that his enlargement was per consensum Dominorum privati Consilij. And it is true that the Queens Attorney did tell the Court that the Lords of the Council did assent to it; follows it therefore that it could not have been without such assent?

Next in Hill. 4. 43 Eliz. rot. 89. when divers Gentlemen of special quality were imprisoned by the command of the Privy Council, the Queen being graciously pleased to enlarge them, sends a Commandment to the Judges of the Kings Bench, that they should take such course for delivering them upon bail, as they should think fit; and they did so, and enlarged them upon Writs of Habeas Corpus: Follows it therefore that this might not have been done by Law, if the parties themselves had Anno 1628. had desired it? So in Trin. 1 Jac. rot. 30. Sir John Brockett being committed to the Gew-house, is by Habeas Corpus returned to stand committed per mandat. privati Consilij, and he is enlarged virtute Warrant. a Consilio praelati. But the same answer that satisfies for the rest before cited, serves for this also.

The last of these is Reyners Case, in M. 11 Jac. rot. 119. he was committed to the Gew-house by the Lords of the Council, and being brought into the Kings Bench by Habeas Corpus, is enlarged upon bail. But this they say was upon a Letter written from the Lords of the Council to the Judges. It is true that such a Letter was written, but the answer to the former Prefedents of this nature, are sufficient to clear this also.

And in all these observe,

1. That it appears not that the party ever desired to be enlarged, or was denied it.
2. Letters, either of the Council, or from the King, cannot alter the Law in any case.

So that hitherto nothing that can be brought on the contrary part, hath any force or colour of reason in it.

We come now (my Lords) to those Prefedents of the other nature, cited against this Liberty of the Subject, that is, such as have been used to justify, that persons so committed may not be enlarged by the Court. They are in number eight, but there is not any one of them at all that proves any such thing as your Lordships will plainly see upon the opening them.

The first three of them are exactly in the same words, saving that the names of the persons, and of the prisons, do differ: I shall therefore cite them all one after another, and then clear them together.

The first is Richard Everards Case, Hen. 7. rot. 18. he and others were committed to the Marshalsey of the Household per mandat. Domini Regis, and so returned upon a Habeas Corpus into the Kings Bench, whereupon the Entry is only Qui committitur Marr. &c.

The second is H. 8. H. 7. rot. 12. Richard Cheries Case, he was committed to the Mayor of Windsor per mandat. Domini Regis, and so returned upon Habeas Corpus, and the Entry is only committitur Marr. &c.

The third is H. 9. H. 7. rot. 14. Christopher Burions Case, who was committed to the Marshalsey of the Household per mandat. Domini Regis, and so returned upon his Habeas Corpus, and the Entry is likewise, Qui committitur Marr. &c.

These three have been used principally as express Prefedents, to prove that a prisoner so committed cannot be enlarged. And perhaps at the first sight, to men that know not or observe not the Course and Entries of the Court of Kings Bench, they may be apprehended to prove as much, but in truth they rather prove the contrary, at least there is no colour in them of any such matter as they have been used for. To which purpose I beseech your Lordships to call to your memories that which I first observed to you, touching the course of that Court, where a prisoner is brought in by Habeas Corpus, he is (if not to be remanded) first to be committed to the Marshal of that Court, and then bailed, as his Case requires: this is so certain, as it can never be otherwise. Now these men being thus committed by the express command of the King, are first (you see) taken from the Prisons Car. 4. whither they were committed; wherein you may observe by the way (my Lords) that if a general Supposition of matter of State were of force in such a Case, it were as needful in point of State to have the prisoner remain in the Prison, where the King by such an absolute command committed him, as to have at all committed; when then they have taken them from the Prisons where before they were, they commit them to the Marshal of their own Court, which is but the first step to bailing of them. Now it appears not indeed that they were bailed, for then traditur in ballium had followed; but nothing at all appears that they were denied; perhaps they never asked it, perhaps they could not find such as were sufficient to bail them. And in truth whensoever any man that is bailed (but removed from any Prison in England) though it be for Debt or Trespas only, into that Court, the Entry is but in the self same syllables, as in these three Cases.

And in truth, if these proceedings did prove that any of the prisoners named in them were not bailable, or had been thought by the Court to have been not bailable; it will necessarily follow, That no man living, that is ordinarily removed from any other Prison into the Kings Bench, or that is there upon any ordinary Action of Debt, or Action of Trespas, could be bailed; for every man that is brought thither, and not remanded, and every man that is Arrested, but for Debt or Trespas, is likewise committed to the Marshal of that Court, and by the self same Entry, and not otherwise. Yet these three have been much stood on, and have strangely missed the Judgment of some that either did not, or would seem not, to understand the course of that Court.

The fourth of this nature is Edward Pages, it is Trin. 7. Hen. 8. rot. 33. this might well have been reckoned with the former three, had not the Misentry only of the Clerk made it very far from them. Edward Page was committed to the Marshalsey of the Household, and that per mandat. Domini Regis, and returned to be therefore detained, and the Entry qui committitur Marr. Hospitij Domini Regis. And this word Marr. is written in the Margin of the Roll; this hath been used also to prove, that the Judges did remand this prisoner: if they had done so, the remanding had been only while they advised, and not any such Award which is given, when they adjudge him not bailable. But in truth; the very word Committatur shews, that it was not any remanding of him; nor doth that Court ever commit any man to the Marshalsey of the Household. And besides the word Marr. for Marrescallo, shews plainly that he was committed to the Marshal of the Kings Bench; and not remanded to the Marshalsey of the Household; for such Entry of that word in the Margin is perpetually in Cases of that nature; when they commit a man to their own Prison, and so gives him the first step to bailment, which he may have if he ask it, and can find bail: And doubtless these words of hospitij were added by the error of the Clerk, for want perhaps of instruction in his understanding of the name of the Kings Bench from the Marshal of the Household.

The fifth of these is Thomas Casars Case, in 8 Jac. Regis rot. 99. Thomas Casar was committed to the Marshalsey of the Household, per mandat. Domini Regis, and returned to be therefore detained; and indeed a Remittitur is in the Roll, but not a Remittitur

Remittitur quousque, but only that kind of Remittitur which is used only whiles the Court advises; and in truth, this is far from proving any thing against the Resolution of the House of Commons, that it appears that the Opinion of the Reverend Judges of that time was, That the Return was insufficient, and that if it were not amended, the prisoner should be discharged; for in the Book of Rolls, of that Court, of Michaelmas Term, (when Cesar's Case was in question) they expressly ordered, that if the Steward and Marshal did not amend their Return, the prisoner should be absolutely discharged. The words of the Roll are,

Nisi Senescallus & Marrescallus hospitij Domini Regis sufficient, retournaverint breve de Habeas Corpus Tho. Cesar die Mercurij proximo post quindenam Sancti Martini Defendens exonerabitur.

And this is also the force of that Presedent, but yet there hath been an interpretation used upon this Rule. It hath been said, that the Judges gave this Rule, because the truth was, that the return was false, and that it was well known, that the prisoner was not committed by the immediate command of the King, but by the command of the Lord Chamberlain, and therefore (as it was said) they made this Rule: But this kind of Interpretation is the first that ever supposed that Judges should take any notice of the truth or falshood of any Return, otherwise than the body of the Return could inform them. And the Rule it self speaks plainly of the insufficiency only, and not of the truth or falshood of it.

The sixth of these is the Case of James Demetrius and some others that were Brewers, and were committed to the Marshalsey of the Household, per mandat. Domini Regis, and so returned upon Habeas Corpus. And it is that the Roll shews that they were remanded, but the remanding was only upon advisement. And indeed the grave and upright Judges of that time were so careful (least upon the entring of the remanding any such mistake might be, as might perhaps mislead Posterity in so great a point) that they would have the word immediate added to remittitur, that so all men that should meet with the Roll, might see that it was done for the present only, and not upon any debate of the question; and besides, there is no quousque to it, which is usually added, when the highest Award upon debate or resolution of this kind is given by them.

The seventh of these is the Case of Saltenstall, it is H. 12 Jac. Sir Samuel Saltenstall was committed to the Fleet per mandat. Domini Regis, and besides by the Court of Chancery for disobeying an Order of that Court, and is returned upon Habeas Corpus, to be therefore detained: and it is true, that a remittitur is entred in the Roll, but it is only a remittitur, in the nature of a remittitur prison. predict. without quousque secundum Legem deliberatus fueris; and indeed it appears in the Record, that the Court gave the Warden of the Fleet three several days, at several times, to amend his Return, and in the interim, Remittitur prisona predict. still, certainly if the Court had thought that the return had been good, they would not have given so many several days to have amended it; for if that mandat. Domini Regis, had been sufficient in the Case, why needed it to have been amended?

The eighth and last of these is T. 13 Jac. rot. 71.

The Case of the same Sir Samuel Saltenstall, he is returned by the Warden of the Fleet, as in the Case before, and generally remittitur is in the Roll, which proves nothing at all, that therefore the Court thought he might not by Law be enlarged. And besides in both Cases, he stood committed also for disobeying an Order in the Chancery.

These are all that have been pretended to the contrary in this great point, and upon the view of them, thus opened to your Lordships, it is plain that there is not one, not so much as one at all, that proveth any such thing, as that persons committed by the command of the King, or of the Lords of the Council, without cause shewed, might not be enlarged, but indeed the most of them expressly prove rather the contrary.

Now, my Lords, having thus gone through the Presedents of Record that concern this point on either side, before I come to the other kind of Presedents, which are the solemn resolutions of Judges of the former times, I shall (as I am also commanded by the House of Commons) represent unto your Lordships somewhat else, that they have thought very considerable, with which they have met, while they were in a most careful enquiry of whatsoever concerned them in this great question. It is (my good Lords) a draught of an Entry of a Judgment in that great Case lately adjudged in the Court of Kings Bench, when divers Gentlemen imprisoned per mandat. special. Domini Regis, were by the Award and Judgment of the Court, after solemn debate, sent back to Prison, because it was expressly said, they could not in Justice deliver them, though they prayed to be bailed. The Case is famous and well known to your Lordships, therefore I need not further mention it; as yet, indeed, there is no Judgment entred upon the Roll, but there is room enough for any kind of Judgment to be entred: But, my Lords, there is a form of a Judgment, a most unusual one, such a one, as never was in any such case used, (for indeed there was never before any Case so judged) and this drawn up by a chief Clerk of that Court, by direction of Mr. Attorney General (as the House was informed by the Clerk) in which the reason of the Judgment, and remanding of these Gentlemen, is expressed in such sort, as if it should be declared upon Record for ever, that the Laws were that no man could ever be enlarged from imprisonment that stood committed by any such absolute command. The draught is only in Sir John Heveninghams Case, being one of the Gentlemen that was remanded, and it was made for a form of all the rest; The words of it are after a usual Entry of in Curia advisari vult for a time, visor. retorn. predict., non diversis Antiquis Recordis in Curia hic remanentibus, consimiles causas concernentibus, maturaque deliberatione inde prius habita, eo quod nulla specialis causa captionis sive detentionis predict. Johannis exprimitur, sed generaliter, quod detentus est in prisona predict. per speciale mandatum Domini Regis, Ideo predict. Johannes remittitur prae. Custod. Marr. hospitij prae. salu. custodiend. quousque, &c. that is, quousque secundum Legem deliberatus fueris. And if that Court, which is the highest for ordinary Justice, cannot deliver him secundum Legem, what Law is there, I beseech you my Lords, that can be sought for in any inferior Court to deliver him?

Now (my Lords) because this draught if it were entred in the Roll (as it was prepared for no other purpose) would be as great a declaration against the many Acts of Parliament already cited, contrary to all Presedents of former times, and Anno 1628. and to all reason of Law, to the utter subversion of the greatest Liberty and Right belonging to every Freeman of the Kingdom. And for that especially also, it supposed that divers antient Records had been looked into by the Court, in like Cases, by which Records, their Judgment was directed, whereas in truth, there is not one Record at all extant, nor so much indeed as with any colour, warrants the Judgment. Therefore the House of Commons thought fit also, that I should (with the rest that hath been said) shew his draught also to your Lordships. I come now to the other kind of Precedents, that is solemn resolutions of Judges, which being not of Record, remain only in Authentick Copies, but of this kind, there is but one Case, that is a resolution of all the Judges of England, in the time of Queen Elizabeth: It was in the 34 of her Reign, when divers persons had been Committed by absolute Command, and delivered by the Justices of the one Bench or the other; whereupon it was desired, that the Judges would declare in what Cases persons Committed by such Command were to be enlarged by them. The resolution hath been variously cited, and variously apprehended.

The House of Commons therefore desiring with all care to inform themselves, as fully of the truth of it, as possibly they might, got into their hands from a Member of the House a Book of selected Cases, by a Learned and Reverend Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, that was one of them that gave the Resolution, which is entered at large, I mean the Lord Chief Justice Anderson; it is written in that Book with his own hand, as the rest of the Book is, and however it hath been cited in that great Judgment given upon the Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, as if it had been that upon such Commitments the Judges might not Bail the Prisoners; yet it is most plain that in the resolution it self, no such thing is contained, but rather expressly the contrary; I shall better represent it by reading it to your Lordships, then by opening it.

Then it was Read, (viz.)

Divers persons furent Commis a several temps a several Prisons ameson en Bank le Roy, & paria en le Common Bank accordant a le Roy de terre, nisi alarge & discharga de le Imprisonment, par & ascuns grand offence & procure un Commandement a les Judges & ils ne ferraissent apres ceo ment mens les Judges, ne surceale mes, par advice enter eux ils fesaient certains Articles le tenour, de quoy manifeste & deliver ent al Seigneurs Chancellor, & Tresorier, & eux subscribe tous leur mains, &c.

If this Resolution doth resolve any thing, it doth indeed upon the matter resolve fully the contrary to that which hath been pretended, and enough for the maintenance of this ancient and fundamental point of Liberty of the Person, to be regained by Habeas Corpus when any man is imprisoned: and I rather thought it fit now to read it to your Lordships, that it might be at large heard; because in the great Judgment in the Kings Bench, though it were cited at the Bar, as against this personal Liberty, as also at the Bench, yet though every thing else of Record that was used, were at large read openly: this was not read either at Bar or Bench; for indeed if it had, every hearer would easily have known the form of it to have been indeed contrary to the Judgment.

My Lords, having thus gone through the Charge committed to me by the House of Commons, and having thus mentioned to your Lordships, and opened the many Precedents of Records, and that draught of the Judgment in the like Case, as also this Resolution, I shall now (as I had leave and direction given me) least your Lordships should be put to much trouble and expence of time in the finding or getting Copies at large of these things, offer also to your Lordships authentick Copies of them all, and so leave them, and whatsoever else I have said, to your Lordships further consideration.

The true Copies of the Precedents of Record in one of the Arguments made at the first Conference with the Lords touching the Liberties of the Person of every Freeman.

HEREUPON the Priviledge and Power of the House to Adjourn it self is took upon to be infringed by Sir Robert Phillips, who said, 'That in 12 and 18 Jac. upon the like intimation, the House resolved it was in their power to adjourn or sit: Hereafter, said he, this may be put upon us by Princes of less Piety. Let a Committee consider hereof, and of our right herein, and to make a Declaration. And accordingly this matter touching his Majesties pleasure about the recess, was referred to a Committee, and to consider the power of the House to adjourn it self; to the end, that it being now yielded unto in obedience to his Majesty, it might not turn to prejudice in time to come.

Sir Edward Cook.

SIR Edward Cook spoke to the same purpose, and said, I am as tender of the Priviledges of this House, as of my life, and they are the Heart-strings of the Common-wealth. The King makes a Prorogation, but this House adjourns it self. The Commission of Adjournment we never read, but say, This House adjourns it self. If the King write to an Abbot for a Corody, for a Valler, if it be ex rogatu, though the Abbot yields to it, it binds not. Therefore I desire that it be entred, that this is done ex rogatu Regis.

Hereupon a Message was sent to the King, That the House would give all expedition to his Majesties Service, notwithstanding their purpose of recess. To which Message, his Majesty returned this Answer, That the motion proceeded from himself, in regard of his engagement in the Affairs of Christendom, wished them all alacrity in their proceedings, and that there be no recess at all.

Secretary Cook to expedite Subsidies.

FRIDAY the 11 of April, Secretary Cook moved the Expedition of Subsidies, and turning of the Votes into an Act: 'We have many Petitions to the King, said he, and they are Petitions of Right. We have freely and bountifully given five Subsidies, but no time is appointed, and Subsidy without time is no Subsidy: Let us appoint a time.

Sir Dudley Diggs.

SIR Dudley Diggs quickened his motion, and spoke roundly: 'We have (said he) freely concluded our Liberties, we have offered five Subsidies, his Majesty hath given us gracious Answers, we have had good by our beginnings, What have we hitherto done for the King? Nothing is done that the King can take notice of. The World thinks that this Parliament hath not expressed that resolution that it did at the first, how much doth it concern the King, that the 'World be satisfied with his Honour? Our success and Honour is the Kings. Princes want not those that may ingratiate themselves with them, by doing ill Offices: There is a stop, and never did a Parliament propound any thing, but it hath been perfected sooner than this is. May not the King say, What have I done? they grow cold. Have I not told them, I will proceed with as much grace as ever King did? He will settle our Proprieties and Goods. Have we not had a gracious Answer? are we hand in hand for his Supply? shall it be said that this day it was moved, but denied? it may put our whole business back; wherein can this disadvantage us? this binds us not, I dare say confidently, we shall have as much as ever any Subjects had from their King.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

SIR Thomas Wentworth proposed a middle way, viz. 'That when we set down the time, we be sure the Subjects Liberties go hand in hand together; then to resolve of the time, but not report it to the House, till we have a Ground, and a Bill for our Liberties: this is the way to come off fairly, and prevent Jealousies.

Hereupon the House resolved, That Grievances and Supply go hand in hand.

Saturday 12 of April.

MR. Secretary Cook delivered another Message from the King, (viz.) 'His Majesty having given timely notice to this House, as well of the pressure of the time, as of the necessity of Supply, hath long since expected some fruit of that which was so happily begun; but finding a stop beyond all expectation after so good beginning, he hath commanded me to tell you, That without any further or unnecessary delay, he would have you to proceed in this business; for however he hath been willing and consenting, his affairs and ours should concur and proceed together; yet his meaning was not, that the one should give interruption to the other, nor the time to be spun out upon any pretence, upon which the common cause of Christendom doth so much depend: he bids us therefore take heed, that we force not him to make an unpleasing end of that which was so well begun.

I will discharge my duty, I shall humbly desire this Honourable House not to undervalue or overstrain this Message; if we conceive any thing in it to tend, as if his Majesty threatened to dissolve this Parliament, we are deceived; his Majesty intends the contrary, and to put us in such a way, that our business may have speedy success. His Majesty takes notice of a peremptory order, whereby he conceived, that his business was excluded, at least for a time, that which doth most press his Majesty is Time, believe that the affairs now in hand press his Majesties heart more than us. Let us remove delays that are more than necessary, let us awaken our selves, he intends a speedy dispatch. I must with some grief tell you, that notice is taken, as if this House pressed not upon the abuses of Power, but only upon Power it self; this toucheth the King and us, who are supported by that Power: Let the King hear of any abuses of Power, he will willingly hear us, and let us not bend our selves against the extension of his Royal Power, but Anno 1628. contain our selves within those bounds, that we meddle only with pressures and abuses of Power, and we shall have the best satisfaction that ever King gave. I beseech you all concur this way, and use that moderation we have had the honor yet to gain.

Being moved to explain what he meant by the word [Power] which (he said) we did oppose, he answered,

'I cannot descend to particulars, or go from that his Majesty gave me warrant or Power to deliver.

Sir Robert Phillips.

SIR Robert Phillips said, he hoped their moderation would have given a right understanding to his Majesty of their Loyalty.

*O*thers proposed to find out a way, by God's Providence, to make this Message happy to King and People; it concerns the King's Honour abroad, and our safety at home, that this Parliament be happy, let us prevent (say they) these mischiefs, which by frequent Messages thus obstruct us: let those Gentlemen near the Chair see, that we have endeavoured to apply our selves to his Majesties service, notwithstanding this Message. In 12 Jac. a Message of this nature produced no good; nothing so endangers us with his Majesty, as that opinion that we are Antimonarchically affected, whereas such is, and ever hath been our Loyalty, if we were to chuse a Government, we would chuse this Monarchy of England above all Governments in the World.

Secretary Cook.

*A*Bout two daies after, Mr. Secretary Cook again did quicken the business of Supply, alledging, 'That all Negotiations of Embassadors are at a stop while the House sits, and that this stop is as a Frost upon the Earth; that hinders the sweet vapours between his Majesty and his Subjects; and that as matters stand, the Souldiers can neither be disbanded, nor put in Service.

Mr. Wandesford.

*T*his motion comes unexpectedly, but it is fit to receive some satisfaction, the proceeding now with our Grievances shall open the stop that hinders his Majesties Affairs.

Sir Humphrey May.

SIR Humphrey May added, 'That sweetness, trust, and confidence are the only Weapons for us to deal with our King; and that coldness, inforcement, and constraint will never work our ends: If we compass all we desire, and have not his Majesties heart, what will a Law or any thing else do us good?

*H*ereupon it was ordered, 'That a special Committee of eight persons shall presently withdraw themselves, and consult together upon some Heads, and upon the substance of a fair representation to his Majesty, which the Speaker shall deliver in his Speech to his Majesty, on Monday next, (if the King please to give access) and at the same time to deliver the Petition against Billenting of Souldiers.

Mr. Speakers Speech to the King on Easter Monday.

Most Gracious and Dread Sovereign,

*Y*our dutiful and loyal Commons here assembled, were lately humble Suitors to your Majesty for access to your Royal presence; the occasion that moved their desires herein, was a particular of importance, worthy your Princely consideration; which as it well deserves, should have been the only Subject of my Speech at this time.

Mr. Speakers Speech to the King at the delivery of the Petition for Billenting of Souldiers.

'But since your gracious Answer for this access, obtained by a Message from your Majesty, they they have had some cause to doubt, that your Majesty is not so well satisfied with the manner of their proceedings, as their hearty desire is you should be, especially in that part which concerns your Majesties present Supply, as if in the prosecution thereof, they had of late used some slackness or delay.

'And because no unhappiness of theirs can parallel with that which may proceed from a misunderstanding in your Majesty of their clear and loyal intentions, they have commanded me to attend your Majesty with an humble and summary Declaration of their proceedings since this short time of their sitting, which they hope will give your Majesty abundant satisfaction, that never people did more truly desire to be endeared in the favour and gracious opinion of their Sovereign; and wishal to let you see, that as you can have no where more faithful Counsel, so your great designs and occasions can no way be so speedily or heartily supported, as in this old and antient way of Parliament.

'For this purpose they humbly beseech your Majesty to take into your Royal consideration, that although by antient Right of Parliament, the matters there debated are to be disposed in their true method and order, and that their constant custom hath been to take into their considerations the common Grievances of the Kingdom, before they enter upon the matter of Supply; yet to make a full expression of that zeal and affection which they bear to your Royal Majesty, equalling at least, if not exceeding the best affections of their Predecessors, to the best of your Progenitors; they have in this Assembly, contrary to the ordinary proceedings of Parliament, given your Majesties Supply precedence before the common Grievance of the Subject, how pressing so ever, joyning with it only those fundamental and vital Liberties of the Kingdom, which give subsistence and ability to your Subjects.

'This was their original order and resolution, and was grounded upon a true discerning, that these two considerations could not be severed, but did both of them entirely concern your Majesties Service, consisting no less in enabling and encouraging the Subject, than in proportioning a Present suiting to your Majesties occasions and their abilities; nay, so far have they been from using any unnecessary delays, as though, of the two, that of Supply were the later proposition amongst them, the Grand Committee to which both were referred, hath made that of your Majesties Supply first ready for conclusion.

'And

1678.

And to be sure your Majesties supply might receive no interruption by the other, differing from usage and custom (in cases in this nature) sent up of those that concern the Subjects by parcels, some to your Majesty, and some to the Lords, to the end your Majesty might receive such speedy content, as suited with the largest and best extent of their first order.

Sir, You are the breath of our nostrils, and the light of our eyes, and besides those many comforts, which under you and your Royal Progenitors, in this frame of Government, this Nation hath enjoyed, the Religion we profess hath taught us whose Image we are; and we do all most humbly beseech your Majesty to believe, that nothing is or can be more dear unto us than the Sacred Rights and Prerogatives of your Crown: no person or Council can be greater lovers of you, nor be more truly careful to maintain them; and the preserving of those fundamental Liberties which concern the freedom of our persons, and propriety of Goods and Estates, is an essential means to establish the true glory of a Monarchy.

For rich and free Subjects, as they are best governed, so they are most able to do your Majesty service, either in Peace or War, which next under God hath been the cause of the happy and famous Victories of this Nation, beyond other Kingdoms of larger Territories and greater number of People.

What information soever contrary to this shall be brought unto your Majesty, can come from no other than such as for their own ends under colour of advancing the Prerogative, do indeed undermine and weaken Royal Power by impoverishing the Subjects, render this Monarchy less glorious, and the People less able to serve your Majesty.

Having (by this that hath been said) cleared our hearts and proceedings to your Majesty, our trust is, that in your Royal Judgment we shall be free from the least opinion of giving any necessary stop to our proceedings in the matter of your supply, and that your Majesty will be pleased to entertain belief of our alacrity and cheerfulness in your service, and that hereafter no such misfortune shall befall us to be misunderstood by your Majesty in any thing.

We all most humbly beseech your Majesty to receive no information in this or any other business from private relations, but to weigh and judge of our proceedings by those resolutions of the House that shall be represented from our selves.

This rightly and graciously understood, we are confident from the knowledge of your goodness and our own hearts, that the end of this Parliament shall be much more happy than the beginning, and be to all Ages styled the Blessed Parliament, for making perfect union between the best King and the best People, that your Majesty may ever delight in calling us together, and we in the comforts of your gracious favour towards us.

In this hope I return to my first Errand, which will best appear by that which I shall humbly desire you to hear, it being an humble Petition for the House of Commons for redressing of those many inconveniencies and distractions that have befallen your Subject by the Billenting of Souldiers in private mens Houses against their wills.

Your Royal Progenitors have ever held your Subjects hearts the best Garrison of this Kingdom, and our humble Suit to your Majesty is, that our faith and loyalty may have such place in your Royal thoughts, as to rest assured that all your Subjects will be ready to lay down their lives for the defence of your Sacred Person and this Kingdom.

Not going our selves into our Countries this Easter, we should think it a great happiness to us, as we know it would be a singular comfort and encouragement to them that sent us hither, if we might but send them the news of a gracious Answer from your Majesty in this particular, which the reason of the Petition we hope will move your most excellent Majesty graciously to vouchsafe us.

The Petition concerning the Billenting of Souldiers presented to the King's most Excellent Majesty.

I All humility complaining, sheweth unto your most excellent Majesty your loyal and duriful Commons now in Parliament assembled, That whereas by the fundamental Laws of this Realm every Freeman hath, and of right ought to have, a full and absolute propriety in his Goods and Estate, and that therefore the Billenting and placing the Souldiers in the house of any such Freeman against his will, is directly contrary to the said Laws under which we and our Ancestors have ben so long and happily governed; yet in apparent violation of the said ancient and undoubted right of all your Majesties Loyal Subjects of this your Kingdom in general, and to the grievous and insupportable vexation and detriment of many Counties and persons in particular, a new and almost unheard of way hath ben invented and put in practice, to lay Souldiers upon them, scattered in Companies here and there, even in the heart and bowels of this Kingdom; and to compel many of your Majesties Subjects to receive and lodge them in their own Houses, and both themselves and others to contribute toward the maintenance of them, to the exceeding great disservice of your Majesty, the general terror of all, and utter undoing of many of your People; inasmuch as we cannot sufficiently recount, nor in any way proportionable to the liberty lence that we have of our Miserics herein, are we able to represent unto your Majesty the innumerable mischiefs and most grievous vexations, that by this means alone we do now suffer, whereof we will not presume to trouble your sacred ears with particular instances, only most gracious Sovereign, we beg leave to offer to your most gracious view a compassionate consideration of a view of them in particular.

1. The service of Almighty God is hereby greatly hindered, the people in many places not daring to repair to the Church, lest in the mean time the Souldiers should rife their Houses.

2. The antient and good Government of the Country is hereby neglected, and almost contemned.

Anno 1628. 3. Your Officers of Justice in performance of their duties have been resisted and endangered.

4. The Rents and Revenues of your Country greatly and generally diminished; Farmers to secure themselves from the Soldiers insolence being by the Clamor and Solicitation of their fearful and injured Wives and Children, enforced to give up their wonted dwellings, and to retire themselves into places of more secure habitation.

5. Husbandmen, that are as it were the hands of the Country corrupted, by ill example of the Soldiers, and encouraged to idle life, give over work, and rather seek to live idly at another mans charges, than by their own labours.

6. Tradesmen and Artificers almost discouraged, and being enforced to leave their Trades, and to imploy their time in preserving themselves and their families from cruelty.

7. Markets unfrequented, and our waies grown so dangerous, that the people dare not pass to and fro upon their usual occasions.

8. Frequent Robberies, Assaults, Battering, Burglaries, Rapes, Rapines, Murders, Barbarous Cruelties, and other most abominable vices and outrages are generally complained of them from all parts where these Companies have been and had their abode, few of which insolencies have been so much as questioned, and fewer according to their demerit punished.

These and many other lamentable effects (most Dread and Dear Sovereign) have by the Billering of Soldiers already fallen upon us your loyal Subjects, tending no less to the disservice of your Majesty, than to their impoverishing and destruction, so that thereby they are exceedingly disabled to yield your Majesty those Supplies for your urgent occasions, which they heartily desire; and yet they are further perplexed with apprehension of more approaching danger, one in regard of your Subjects at home, the other of enemies from abroad; in both which respects it seems to threaten no small Calamity to the meaner sort of your People, being exceeding poor whereof in many places are great Multitudes, and therefore in times of more settled and more constant administration of Justice, not easily ruled, are most apt upon this occasion to cast off the Reins of Government, and by joining themselves with those disordered Soldiers are very like to fall into Mutiny and Rebellion; which in faithful discharge of our duties we cannot forbear most humbly to present to your high and excellent Wisdom, being pressed with probable fears that some such mischief will shortly ensue, if an effectual and speedy course be not taken to remove out of the Land, or otherwise to disband those unruly Companies.

For the second, we do most humbly beseech your Majesty to take into your Princely consideration, that many of those Companies, besides their dissolute dispositions and carriages, are such as do openly profess themselves Papists, and therefore to be suspected, that if occasion serve, they will rather adhere to a foreign Enemy of that Religion, than to your Majesty, their Liege Lord and Sovereign, especially some of their Captains and Commanders, being as Popishly affected as themselves, and having served in the Wars on the part of the King of Spain, and Arch-Dutchess against your Majesties Allies; which of what pernicious consequence it may prove, and how prejudicial to the safety of your Kingdom, we leave to your Majesties high and Princely wisdom.

And now upon these, and many more which might be alledged, most weighty and important Reasons grounded on the maintenance of the Worship and Service of Almighty God, the continuance and advancement of your Majesties high honor and profit, the preservation of the ancient and undoubted Liberties of your People, and therein of Justice, Industry, Valour, which nearly concern the glory and happiness of your Majesty, and all your Subjects, and the preventing of calamity and ruin both of Church and Commonwealth:

We your Majesties most humble and loyal Subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses of your House of Commons, in the name of the Commonalty of your Kingdom, who are upon this occasion most miserably disconsolate and afflicted, prostrate at the Throne of your Grace and Justice do most ardently beg a present remove of this insupportable Burden, and that your Majesty would be graciously pleased to secure us from the like pressure in the time to come.

To the Speakers Speech and this Petition on his Majesty made this Reply.

MR. Speaker and Gentlemen, When I sent you my last Message, I did not expect a Reply, for I intended it to hasten you, I told you at your first Meeting this time was not to be spent in words, and I am sure it is less fit for disputes, which if I had a desire to entertain, Mr. Speakers Preamble might have given me ground enough: The question is not now, what liberty you have in disposing of matters handled in your House, but rather at this time what is fit to be done.

Wherefore I hope you will follow my example, in eschewing Disputations, and fall to your important business. You make a Protestation of your affection and Zeal to my Prerogative, grounded upon such good and just Reasons, that I must believe you: But I look that you use me with the like charity, to believe what I have declared more than once since your meeting with us, that I am as forward as you for the necessary preservation of your true Liberties. Let us not spend so much time in this that may hazard both my Prerogative and your Liberties to our Enemies.

To be short, go on speedily with your business without any more Apologies, for time calls fast on you, which will neither stay for you nor me: Wherefore it is my duty to hasten, as knowing the weight of it, and yours to give credit to what I say, as to him that sits at the Helm.

For what concerns your Petition, I shall make Answer in a convenient time.

Anno
1628.

At a Debate between the Houses, Sir Robert Heath, and Serjeant Ashley, were questioned for some words spoken, but they being recanted by the latter, the two Houses proceeded in the Conference, Friday 25 of April.

The Lords had a Conference with the Commons, where the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury spake as followeth.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

Archbishop's Speech at a Conference concerning
of Right.

THE service of the King and safety of the Kingdom, do call on my Lords to give all speedy expedition, to dispatch some of these great and weighty Businesses before us. For the better effecting whereof my Lords have thought fit to let you know, that they do in general agree with you, and doubt not but you will agree with us, to the best of your powers to maintain and support the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and the fundamental Liberties of the Subject: For the particulars which may hereafter fall into Debate, they have given me in charge to let you know, That what hath been presented by you unto their Lordships, they have laid nothing of it by, they are not out of love with any thing that you have tendred unto them; They have Voted nothing, neither are they in love with any thing proceeding from themselves: For that which we shall say and propose, is out of an intendment to invite you to a mutual and free Conference, that you with a confidence may come to us, and we with confidence may speak with you; so that we may come to a conclusion of those things which we both unanimously desire.

We have resolved of nothing, designed or determined of nothing, but desire to take you with us, praying help from you, as you have done from us.

My Lords have thought of some Propositions, which they have ordered to be read here, and then left with you in Writing, That if it seem good to you, we may uniformly concur for the substance; and if you differ, that you would be pleased to put out, add, alter, or diminish, as you shall think fit, that so we may come the better to the end, that we do both so desirously embrace.

Then the Propositions following were read by the Clerk of the Upper House.

Propositions tendred to the Commons by the Lords, touching the Petition of Right.

THat his Majesty would be pleased graciously to Declare, That the good old Law called Magna Charta, and the six Statutes conceived to be Declarations and Explanations of that Law, do still stand in force to all intents and purposes.

2. That his Majesty would be pleased graciously to Declare, That according to Magna Charta, and the Statutes before named, as also according to the most antient Customs and Laws of this Land, every free Subject of this Realm hath a fundamental Propriety in his Goods, and a fundamental Liberty of his Person.

3. That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to Declare, That it is his Royal pleasure to ratifie and confirm unto all and every his Loyal and faithful Subjects, all their antient, several, just Liberties, Priviledges, and Rights, in as ample and beneficial manner to all intents and purposes, as their Ancestors did enjoy the same under the best of his most noble Progenitors.

4. That his Majesty would be further pleased graciously to Declare, for the good content of his Loyal Subjects, and for the securing them from future fear, That in all Cases within the Cognizances of the Common-Law concerning the Liberties of the Subject, his Majesty would proceed according to the Common-Law of this Land, and according to the Laws established in the Kingdom, and in no other manner or wise.

5. As touching his Majesties Royal Prerogative, intrinsical to his Sovereignty, and betruited him withal from God, Ad communem totius populi salutem, & non ad destructionem, That his Majesty would resolve not to use or divert the same, to the prejudice of any his loyal People in the propriety of their Good, or liberty of their Persons: And in case, for the security of his Majesties Royal Person, the common safety of his People, or the peaceable Government of this Kingdom, his Majesty shall find just cause for reason of State to imprison or restrain any mans Person, his Majesty would graciously Declare, That within a convenient time he shall, and will express the cause of the Commitment or restraint, either General or Special; and upon a cause so expressed, will leave him immediately to be tried according to the common Justice of the Kingdom.

After the reading of the Propositions, the Archbishop said,

THIS is but a Model to be added unto, altered, or diminished, as in your reasons and wisdoms ye shall think fit, after ye have communicated the same to the rest of the Members of the House.

To this Speech Sir Dudley Diggs, it being at a free Conference, made Reply.

MY Lords, it hath pleased God many waies to bless the Knights, Citizens, and Burghesses now assembled in Parliament, with great comfort and strong hopes, that this will prove as happy a Parliament as ever was in England. And in their Consultations for the service of his Majesty, and the safety of this Kingdom, our special comforts and strong hopes have risen from the continued good respect, which your Lordships so nobly from time to time have been pleased to shew unto them, particularly at this present in your so honourable profession to agree with them in general, and desiring to maintain and support the fundamental Laws and Liberties of England.

The Commons have commanded me in like sort to assure your Lordships they have been, are and will be as ready to propugn the just Prerogative of his Majesty, of which in all their Arguments, searches of Records, and Resolutions they have been most careful according to that which formerly was, and now again is protested by them,

Ano-

Anno 1628. Another noble argument of your honourable disposition towards them is expressed in this, That you are pleased to expect no present Answer from them, who are (as your Lordships in your great wisdoms, they doubt not have considered) a great Body that must advise upon all new Propositions, and resolve upon them before they can give answer, according to the antient Order of their House. But it is manifest in general (God be thanked for it) there is a great concurrence of affection to the same end in both Houses, and such good Harmony, that I intreat your Lordships leave to borrow a Comparison from Nature, or natural Philosophy: As two Lutes well strung and tuned brought together, if one be play'd on, little straws and sticks will stir upon the other, though it lie still; so though we have no power to reply, yet these things said and propounded cannot but work in our hearts, and we will faithfully report these Passages to our House, from whence in due time (we hope) your Lordships shall receive a contentful Answer.

The Commons were not satisfied with these Propositions, which were conceived to choak the Petition of Right, then under consideration, but demurred upon them.

Monday, 28 of April.

The Lord Keeper spake to both Houses of Parliament by the King's Command, who was then present.

The Lord Keeper's Speech to both Houses, concerning Supply, by the King's command. MY Lords, and ye the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons, ye cannot but remember the great and important Affairs, concerning the safety both of State and Religion, declared first from his Majesty's own mouth, to be the causes of the assembling of this Parliament; the sense whereof, as it doth daily increase with his Majesty, so it ought to do, and his Majesty doubts not but it doth so with you, since the danger increaseth every day, both by effluxion of time, and preparations of the Enemy.

Yet his Majesty doth well weigh, that this expence of time hath been occasioned by the Debate which hath arisen in both Houses touching the Liberty of the Subject; in which, as his Majesty takes in good part the purpose and intent of the Houses, so clearly and frequently professed, that they would not diminish or blemish his just Prerogative, so he presumes, that ye will all confess it a point of extraordinary Grace and Justice in him, to suffer it to rest so long in dispute without interruption: but now his Majesty, considering the length of time which it hath taken, and fearing nothing so much as any future loss of that, whereof every hour and minute is so precious; and foreseeing, that the ordinary way of Debate, though never so carefully husbanded, in regard of the Form of both Houses, necessarily takes more time than the Affairs of Christendom can permit; his Majesty, out of great Princely care, hath thought of this Expedient to shorten the business, by declaring the clearness of his own heart and intention: And therefore hath commanded me to let you know, That he holdeth the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other Six Statutes insisted upon for the Subjects Liberty, to be all in force, and assures you, that he will maintain all his Subjects in the just Freedom of their Persons, and safety of their Estates; and that he will govern according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and that ye shall find as much security in his Majesty's Royal Word and Promise, as in the strength of any Law ye can make; so that hereafter ye shall never have cause to complain. The conclusion is, That his Majesty prayeth God, who hath hitherto blessed this Kingdom, and put into his heart to come to you this day, to make the success thereof happy, both to King and People: And therefore he desires, that no doubt or distrust may possess any man, but that ye will all proceed unanimously to the business.

The Commons being returned from the Lords House, Mr. Secretary Cook perswaded them to comply with the King.

His Majesty, said he, puts us in mind of the great important Affairs of the State, and of his sense thereof, that by effluxion of time increaseth in him, and he doubts not but that it doth increase in us. Ye see his Majesty's moderation in the interpretation of all our actions; he saith, that he hopes we have the same sense he hath, he is pleased to consider of the occasion of expence of time that grew from the Debates in both Houses. We see how indulgent he is, that however the Affairs of Christendom are great, yet he omits not this, nay, he takes in good part our Proceedings and our Declarations, that will not impeach the Prerogative: Also his Majesty presumes that we will confess, that he hath used extraordinary Grace, in that he hath endured dispute so long, he acknowledgeth it Justice to stand as we have done.

Further, out of a Princely care of the Publick, he is careful no more time be lost; and because he sees some extraordinary course to be taken to satisfy us, he observes, that in the form of Debate, such length is required, as the nature of the business will not endure. It is to be presumed, that his Government will be according to the Law: We cannot but remember what his Father said, He is no King, but a Tyrant, that Governs not by Law; but this Kingdom is to be governed by the Common-Law, and his Majesty assures us so much; the Interpretation is left to the Judges, and to his great Council, and all is to be regulated by the Common-Law; I mean not Magna Charta only, for that Magna Charta was part of the Common-Law, and the antient Law of this Kingdom; all our difference is in the Application of this Law, and how this Law, with difference, is derived into every Court. I conceive there are two Rules, the one of Brasse, that is rigid, and will not bend, and that is the Law of the King's Bench, this Law will not bend: and when it lights on Subjects sitting, if it do not bend, it is unjust: And there comes in the Law of Chancery and Equity; this is application of Law in private mens Causes, when it comes to Menum & Turm. And thus the general government of Cases, with relation to the common State of the Kingdom, is from the Council-Board, and there they are to vary from the Law of the Kingdom: Suppose it be in time of Dearth, Propriety of Goods may in that time be forced, and be brought to the Market: We saw the experience of it in Coals in London, and the Council-Board caused them to be brought forth and sold. In a time of Pestilence men may be restrained: If a Schism be like to grow in a Church, the State will inquire after the Favourers of it: If there be fear of Invasion, and it be encouraged by hope of a Party amongst us, it is in the power of Government to restrain men to their Houses.

1628. In the composition of these things, there is great difference: What differences have been between the Courts of Chancery and King's Bench? It is hard to put true difference between the King's Prerogative and our Liberties. His Majesty saw experience of time would be prejudicial; it pleased God to move his Majesty by a Divine hand to shew us a way to clear all our difficulties, let us attend to all the parts of it; there be five Degrees, and there is more assurance than we could have by any Law whatsoever. His Majesty declares, That Magna Charta and the other Statutes are in force: This is not the first time that the Liberty of the Subject was infringed, or was in debate and confirmed; all times thought it safe, that when they came to a Negative of Power, it was hard to keep Government and Liberty together; but his Majesty stopped not there, but according to the sense of these Laws, That he will govern his Subjects in their just Liberties, he assures us our Liberties are just, they are not of Grace, but of Right; nay, he assures us, he will govern us according to the Laws of the Laws of the Realm, and that we shall find as much security in his Majesties Promise, as in any Law we can make; and whatsoever Law we shall make, it must come to his Majesties allowance; and if his Majesty find Cause in his Government, he may not put life to it: We daily see all Laws are broken, and all Laws will be broke for the Publick Good, and the King may pardon all Offenders; his Majesty did see, that the best way to settle all at unity, is to express his own heart: The King's heart is the best guider of his own promise, his promise is bound with his own heart. What Prince can express more care and wisdom?

Lastly, he saith, That hereafter ye shall never have the like cause to complain: May we not think the breach is made up? is not his Majesty engaged in his Royal word?

The conclusion is full of weight: and he prays God, that as God hath blessed this Kingdom, and put it into his heart to come amongst us, so to make this day successful. The wrath of a King is like the roaring of a Lion, and all Laws with his wrath are to no effect; but the King's favour is like the Dew upon the Grass, there all will prosper: and God made the Instruments to unite all hearts.

His Majesty having thus discharged himself, he prays us to proceed to the business that so much concerns him. As his Majesty hath now shewed himself the best of Kings, let us acknowledge his Majesties goodness, and return to that union which we all desire.

But this motion was not received with general acceptance; and Sir Benjamin Rudyard replied to it in these words,

Sir Ben.
Rudyard's
Speech concerning that motion.

WE are now upon a great business, and the manner of handling it may be as great as the business it self. Liberty is a precious thing, for every man may set his own price upon it, and he that doth not value it, deserves to be valued accordingly: For my own part, I am clear without scruple, that what we have resolved, is according to the Law; and if any Judge in England were of a contrary opinion, I am sure we should have heard of him ere now; out of all question, the very scope and drift of Magna Charta was, to reduce the Regal to a Legal power, in matter of Imprisonment, or else it had not been worthy so much contending for.

It is true, That the King ought to have a trust reposed in him, God forbid but he should, and I hope it is impossible to take it from him; for it lies not in the wit of man to devise such a Law, as shall comprehend all particulars, all accidents, but that extraordinary Causes may happen, which when they come, if they be disposed of for the common good, there will be no Law against them; yet must the Law be general, for otherwise, Admissions and Exceptions will fret and eat out the Law to nothing. God himself hath constituted a general Law of Nature, to govern the ordinary course of things, he hath made no Law for Miracles; yet there is this observation of them, that they are rather præter naturam, than contra naturam, and alwaies propter bonos fines: So the King's Prerogatives are rather besides the Law, than against it; and when they are directly to their ends for the publick good, they are not only concurring Laws, but even Laws in singularity and excellency.

But to come nearer, let us consider where we are now, what steps we have gone and gained; the King's Learned Council have acknowledged all the Laws to be still in force, the Judges have not allowed any Judgment against these Laws; the Lords also have confessed, that the Laws are in full strength; they have retained our resolutions intire, and without prejudice.

All this hitherto is for our advantage; but above all, his Majesty hath this day (himself being publicly present) declared by the mouth of the Lord Keeper, before both the Houses, That Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes, are still in force; That he will maintain his Subjects in the Liberties of their Persons, and Proprieties of their Goods; that he will govern them according to the Laws of this Kingdom; this is a solemn and binding satisfaction, expressing his gracious readiness to comply with his People in their reasonable and just desires. The King is a good man, and it is no diminution to a King to be called so; for whosoever is a good man, shall be greater than a King, that is not so. The King certainly is very tender of his present Honour, and of his Fame hereafter: he will think it hard to have a worse mark set upon him, than upon any of his Ancestors, by extraordinary restraints: His Majesty hath already intimated unto us by a Message, That he doth willingly give way to have the abuse of Power reformed; by which I do verily believe he doth very well understand, what a miserable Power it is, which hath produced so much weakness to himself, and to the Kingdom; and it is one happiness, that he is so ready to redress it.

For mine own part, I shall be very glad to see that old decrepit Law Magna Charta, which hath been kept so long, and lien Bed-ridden, as it were, I shall be glad to see it walk abroad again with new vigour and lustre, attended and followed with the other six Statutes: unquestionably it will be a great heartening to all the People. I doubt not, but upon a debating Conference with the Lords, we may happily fall upon a fair, fit accommodation, concerning the Liberty of our Persons, and Propriety of our Goods. I hope we may have a Bill, to agree in the point, against imprisonment for Loans or Privy Seals: As for intrinsical power and reason of State, they are matters in the Clouds, where I desire we may leave

Anno 1628. leave them, and not meddle with them at all, lest by the way of admittance, we may lose some what of that which is our own already: Yet this by the way I will say of Reason of State, That in the Latitude by which 'tis used, it hath eaten out almost, not only the Law, but all the Religion of Christendom.

Now I will only remember you of one Precept, and that of the wisest man, Be not over wise, be not over just: and he gives his reason, for why wilt thou be desolate?

If Justice and Wisdom may be stretch'd to desolation, let us thereby learn, that Moderation is the Virtue of Virtues, and Wisdom of Wisdoms. Let it be our Master-piece so to carry the business, that we may keep Parliaments on foot: For as long as they be frequent, there will be no irregular Power, which though it cannot be broken at once, yet in short time it will be made and mouldred away; there can be no total or final loss of Liberties, as long as they last; what we cannot get at one time, we shall have at another.

A Committee ordered to draw up a Bill in order to the Petition of Right.

Upon this Debate it was ordered, That a Committee of Lawyers do draw a Bill, containing the substance of Magna Charta, and the other Statutes, that do concern the Liberty of the Subject: which business took up two whole daies.

Thursday, the First of May.

Mr. Secretary Cook brings a Message to rely on the King's word.

Mr. Secretary Cook delivers a Message from his Majesty, viz. to know whether the House will rest on his Royal Word, or no, declared to them by the Lord Keeper; which, if they do, he assures them it shall be Royally performed.

Upon this there was a silence for a good space: Then Mr. Secretary Cook proceeded, 'This silence invites me to a further Speech, and further to address my self: Now we see we must grow towards an issue; for my part, how confident I have been of the good issue of this Parliament, I have certified in this place, and elsewhere, and I am still confident therein; I know his Majesty is resolved to do as much as ever King did for his Subjects: all this Debate hath grown out of a sense of our sufferings, and a desire to make up again those Breaches that have been made.'

'Since this Parliament begun, hath there been any dispencc made of that which hath formerly been done? when means were denied his Majesty, being a young King, and newly come to his Crown, which he found engaged in a War, what could we expect in such Necessities? His Majesty called this Parliament to make up the breach: his Majesty assures us we shall not have the like cause to complain: he assures the Laws shall be established, what can we desire more? all is, that we provide for Posterity, and that we do prevent the like suffering for the future; were not the same means provided by them before us? can we do more? we are come to the Liberty of the Subjects, and the Prerogative of the King, I hope we shall not add any thing to our selves, to depress him. I will not divine, I think we shall find difficulty with the King, or with the Lords, I shall not deliver my opinion as Counsellor to his Majesty, which I will not justify and say here, or at the Council-Board. Will we in this necessity strive to bring our selves into a better condition, and greater Liberty, than our Fathers had, and the Crown into a worse than ever? I dare not advise his Majesty to admit of that: If this that we now desire be no Innovation, it is all contained in those Acts, and Statutes, and whatsoever else we would add more, is a diminution to the King's Power, and an addition to our own. We deal with a wise and prudent Prince, that hath a Sword in his hand for our good, and this good is supported by Power. Do not think, that by Cases of Law and Debate we can make that not to be Law, which in experience we every day find necessary: make what Law you will, if I do not discharge the place I bear, I must commit men, and must not discover the cause to any Jaylor or Judge; if I by this Power commit one without just cause, the burden falls heavy on me, by his Majesties displeasure, and he will remove me from my place. Government is a solid thing, and must be supported for our good.

Sir Robert Phillips hereupon spake thus:

'That if the words of Kings strike impressions in the hearts of Subjects, then do these words upon this occasion strike an impression into the hearts of us all: to speak in a plain language, we are now come to the end of our journey, and the well disposing of an Answer to this Message, will give happiness or misery to this Kingdom. Let us set the Common-wealth of England before the eyes of his Majesty, that we may justify our selves, that we we have demeaned our selves dutifully to his Majesty.'

The House being turned into a grand Committee, the matter of the liberty of the Subject was Debated of.

And Sir Edward Cook said, That that Royal Word had reference to some message formerly sent; his Majesties word was, That they may secure themselves any way, by Bill or otherwise, he promised to give way to it; and to the end that this might not touch his Majesties Honour, it was proposed, that the Bill come not from the House, but from the King: We will and grant for us and our Successors, and that we and our Successors will do thus and thus; and it is the King's Honour, he cannot speak but by Record.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the Debate, saying, 'That never House of Parliament trusted more in the goodness of their King, for their own private, than the present; but we are ambitious that his Majesties goodness may remain to Posterity, and we are accountable to a publick trust: and therefore seeing there hath been a publick violation of the Laws by his Ministers, nothing will satisfy him but a publick amends; and our desires to vindicate the Subjects Right by Bill, are no more than are laid down in former Laws, with some modest Provision for Instruction, Performance and Execution.'

Which was agreed to, and a Message to be delivered by the Speaker is agreed to by the House.

Amidst those deliberations, another Message was delivered from his Majesty by Mr. Secretary Cook; 'That howsoever we proceed in this business we have in hand, which his Majesty will not doubt, but to be according to our constant profession, and so as he may have cause to give us thanks; yet his resolution is, that both his Royal care, and hearty and tender affection

The King gives notice to both Houses, that he intends shortly to end this Session.

Anno
1628. towards all his loving Subjects, shall appear to the whole Kingdom, and all the World, that he will govern us according to the Laws and Customs of this Realm; that he will maintain us in the Liberties of our Persons, and Proprieties of our Goods, so as we may enjoy as much happiness as our Fore-fathers in their best times; and that he will rectifie what hath been, or may be found amiss amongst us, so that hereafter there may be no just cause to complain. Wherein as his Majesty will rank himself amongst the best of Kings, and shew he hath no intention to invade or impeach our lawful Liberties, or Rights; so he will have us to match our selves with the best Subjects, not by incroaching upon that Sovereignty or Prerogative, which God hath put into his hands for our good, but by containing our selves within the Bounds and Laws of our Fore-fathers, without restraining them, or enlarging them by new Explanations, Interpretations, Expositions, or Additions in any sort, which, he telleth us, he will not give way unto.

That the weight of the Affairs of the Kingdom, and Christendom, do press him more, and that the time is now grown to that point of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; so as this Session of Parliament must continue no longer than Tuesday come Seven-night at the furthest: In which time his Majesty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promised; and if the House be not as ready to do that is fit for themselves, it shall be their own faults.

And upon assurance of our good dispatch and correspondence, his Majesty declareth, that his Royal intention is to have another Session of Parliament at Michaelmas next, for the perfecting of such things as cannot now be done.

This Message was Debated the next day, being Saturday, May 30. whereupon Sir John Elliot spake to this effect.

Sir John Elliot.

The King, saith he, will rank himself with the best of Kings, and therefore he would have us to rank our selves with the best Subjects; we will not incroach upon that Sovereignty that God hath put into his hands: This makes me fear his Majesty is mis-informed in what we go about, let us make some enlargement, and put it before him, that we will not make any thing new: As for the time of this Session, it is but short, and look how many Messages we have, so many interruptions, and mis-reports, and mis-representations to his Majesty produce those Messages.

Sir Miles Fleetwood continues the Debate, and said, That this business is of great importance, we are to accommodate this, The breach of this Parliament will be the greatest misery that ever befall us; the eyes of Christendom are upon this Parliament, the state of all our Protestant Friends are ready to be swallowed up by the Emperor's Forces, and our own Kingdom is in a miserable strait, for the defence of our Religion that is invaded by the Romish Catholicks, by the colour of a Commission, which is intolerable; the defence of our Realm by Shipping is decayed, the King's Revenue is sold and gone; where shall the Relief be obtained but in Parliament? Now we are in the way, let us proceed by way of Bill, in pursuance of the King's Message, to establish the Fundamental Laws in Propriety of our Goods, and Liberty of our Persons: It was declared to us, that courses by Loan and Imprisonment were not lawful; let us touch them in our Bill, and that all Precedents and Judgments seeming to the contrary, be void; and that all Commitments against the Law be remedied, and that we be protected against the fear of Commitments.

The Speaker's Speech to the King, in Answer to several Messages.

Most Gracious and Dread Sovereign,

Your Loyal and Obedient Subjects, the Commons now assembled in Parliament, by several Messages from your Majesty, and especially by that your Declaration, delivered by the Lord Keeper before both Houses, have, to their exceeding joy and comfort, received many ample expressions of your Princely care and tender affections towards them, with a gracious promise and assurance, that your Majesty will govern according to the Laws of this Realm, and so maintain all your Subjects in the just freedom of their Persons, and safety of their Estates, that all their Rights and Liberties may be by them enjoyed with as much freedom and security in their time, as in any age heretofore by their Ancestors, under the best of your Progenitors: For this so great a favour enlarged, by a comfortable intimation of your Majesties confidence in the Proceedings of this House, they do, by me their Speaker, make a full return of most humble thanks to your Majesty, with all dutiful acknowledgment of your Grace and Goodness herein extended unto them.

And whereas in one of those Messages delivered from your Majesty, there was an expression of your desire to know, whether this House would rest upon your Royal Word and Promise, assuring them, that if they would, it should be Royally and really performed: As they again present their humble thanks for the seconding and strengthening of your former Royal expressions, so in all humbleness they assure your Majesty, that their greatest confidence is, and ever must be, in your Grace and Goodness, without which, they well know, nothing that they can frame or desire, will be of safety and value to them: Therefore are all humble Suitors to your Majesty, that your Royal Heart will graciously accept and believe the truth of theirs, which they humbly present as full of truth and confidence in your Royal Word and Promise, as ever House of Commons reposed in any of their best Kings.

True it is, they cannot but remember the Publick Trust, for which they are accountable to present and future times; and their desires are, That your Majesties Goodness, might, in Fruit and Memory, be the Blessing and Joy of Posterity.

They say also, That of late there hath been publick violation of the Laws, and the Subjects Liberties, by some of your Majesties Ministers, and thence conceive, that no less than a publick remedy will raise the dejected hearts of your loving Subjects to a chearful supply of your Majesty, or make them receive content in the proceedings of this House.

From those considerations, they most humbly beg your Majesties leave to lay hold of that gracious offer of yours, which gave them assurance, that if they thought fit to secure themselves in their Rights and Liberties, by way of Bill, or otherwise, so it might be provided with due respect to God's Honour, and the publick Good, you you would be graciously pleased to give way unto it. Far from their intentions it is any way to incroach upon your Sovereignty or Prerogative; nor have they the least thought of stretching or enlarging the former Laws in any sort, by any new Interpretations or Additions; the bounds of their desires extend no further, than to some necessary explanation of that which is truly comprehended within the just sense and meaning of those Laws, with some moderate provision for execution and performance, as in times past upon like occasion hath been used.

The way how to accomplish these their humble desires, is now in serious consideration with them, wherein they humbly assure your Majesty, they will neither lose time, nor seek any thing of your Majesty, but that they hope may be fit for dutiful and loyal Subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just King to grant.

His Majesties Answer was delivered by the Lord Keeper.

His Majesties Answer to the Speaker's Speech.

MR. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, his Majesty hath commanded me to tell you, that he expected an Answer by your Actions, and not delay by Discourse: ye acknowledge this trust and confidence in your proceedings, but his Majesty sees not how you requite him by your confidence of his Word and Actions: For what need Explanations, if he doubted not the performance of the true meaning? For Explanations will hazard an incroachment upon his Prerogative. And it may well be said, What need a new Law to confirm an old, if you repose confidence in the Declaration his Majesty made by me to both Houses? and our selves acknowledge, that your greatest trust and confidence must be in his Majesties Grace and Goodness, without which nothing ye can frame will be of safety, or avail to you: Yet to shew clearly the sincerity of his Majesties intentions, he is content that a Bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes insisted upon for the Subjects Liberties, if ye shall chuse that as the best way, but so as it may be without Additions, Paraphrases, or Explanations.

Thus if you please you may be secured from your needless fears, and this Parliament may have a happy wished for end; whereas by the contrary, if you seek to tie your King by new, and indeed impossible Bonds, you must be accomptable to God and the Country for the ill success of this Meeting. His Majesty hath given his Royal Word, that ye shall have no cause to complain hereafter: less than which hath been enough to reconcile Great Princes, and therefore ought much more to prevail between a King and his Subjects.

Lastly, I am commanded to tell you that his Majesties pleasure is, That without further Replies or Messages, or other unnecessary delays, ye do what ye mean to do speedily, remembering the last Message that Secretary Cook brought you in point of time: his Majesty alwaies intending to perform his promise to his power, and therefore adviseth the House to that purpose, saying, 'That he had rather follow others than begin to enter into this business: loss of time hath been the greatest complaint; the matter fallen now into consideration, is what way to take, whether to rely on his Majesties Word, or on a Bill: If we will consider the advantage we have in taking his Majesties Word, it will be of the largest extent, and we shall chuse that that hath most Assurance; an Act of Parliament is by the consent of the King and Parliament, but this Assurance by Word, is that he will govern us by the Laws; the King promises that, and also that they shall be so executed, that we shall enjoy as much freedom as ever: this contains many Laws, and a grant of all good Laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of those very Laws, Assurance, which binds the King further than the Law can; First it binds his affection which is the greatest bond between King and Subject, and that binds his Judgment also, nay, his Honour, and that not at home but abroad; the Royal Word of a King is the Ground of all Treaty; nay, it binds his Conscience: this confirmation between both Houses is in nature of a Vow; for my part, I think it is the greatest advantage to rely on his Majesties Word. He further added, this Debate was fitter to be done before the House, and not before the Committee, and that it was a new Course to go to a Committee of the whole House.

Car. 4.

Whereunto Sir John Elliot replied, That the proceeding in a Committee, is more Honourable and advantageous to the King and the House, for that way leads most to Truth and it is a more open way, and where every man may add his reason, and make answer upon the hearing of other mens Reasons and Arguments.

Sir John Elliot.

This being the general Sense, the House was turned into a Committee to take into consideration what was delivered to the King by the Speaker, and what was delivered to them by the Lord Keeper, and all other Messages, and the Committee was not to be bounded with any former order: the Key was brought up, and none were to go out without leave first asked.

Sir Edward Cook argued as followeth,

WAs it ever known (said he) that general words were a sufficient satisfaction to particular Grievances? was ever a verbal Declaration of the King, Verbum Regni? When grievances be, the Parliament is to redress them. Did ever Parliament rely on Messages? They put up Petitions of their Grievances, and the King ever answered them: the King's Answer is very gracious, but what is the Law of the Realm, that is the Question. I put no diffidence in his Majesty, the King must speak by a Record, and in Particulars, and not in General. Did you ever know the King's Message come into a Bill of Subsidies? All succeeding Kings will say, Ye must trust me as well as ye did my Predecessors, and trust my Messages; but Messages of Love never came into a Parliament. Let us put up a Petition of Right: Not that I distrust the King, but that I cannot take his Trust, but in a Parliamentary way.

And on Thursday 8 Maii, the Petition of Right was finished, and the Clause of Martial Law was added unto it, and it was delivered to the Lords at a Conference for their Concurrence; the which Conference was managed by Sir Edward Cook, and the same day, as to the matter of Supply, ordered, that the two first Subsidies should be paid the 10 of July, one more the 12 of October, another on the 20 of December, and the last the 1 of March.

Anno
1628

AT the Conference, Sir Edward Cook thus expressed himself: 'My Lords, it is evident what necessity there is, both in respect of your selves, and your Posterities, to have good success in this business: We have acquainted your Lordships with the Reasons and Arguments, and after we have had some Conference, we have received from your Lordships Propositions; and it behoves me to give your Lordships some reasons, why you have not heard from us before now; for in the mean time, as we were consulting of this weighty business, we have received divers Messages from our great Sovereign the King, and they consisted of Five parts.

1. 'That his Majesty would maintain all his Subjects in their just freedom, both of their Persons and Estates.
2. 'That he will govern according to his Laws and Statutes.
3. 'That we should find much confidence in the Royal Word; I pray observe that.
4. 'That we shall enjoy all our Rights and Liberties, with as much freedom as ever any Subjects have done in former times.
5. 'That whether we shall think it fit, either by Bill or otherwise, to go on in this great business, his Majesty would be pleased to give way to it.

'These gracious Messages did so work upon our affections, that we have taken them into deep consideration. My Lords, when we had these Messages (I deal plainly, for so I am commanded by the House of Commons) we did consider what way we might go for our more secure way, nay yours; we did think it the safest way to go in a Parliamentary course, for we have a Maxim in the House of Commons, and written on the Walls of our House, That old waies are the safest and surest waies: And at last we did fall upon that, which we did think (if that your Lordships did consent with us) it is the most antient way of all, and that is, my Lords, via sancta, both to Majesty, to your Lordships, and to our selves: For, my Lords, this is the greatest Bond that any Subject can have in open Parliament, Verbum Regis, that is an high point of Honour, but this shall be done by the Lords and Commons, and assented to by the King in Parliament; this is the greatest obligation of all, and this is for the King's Honour, and our safety: Therefore, my Lords, we have drawn a form of a Petition, desiring your Lordships to concur with us therein; for we do come with an unanimous consent to all the House of Commons, and there is great reason your Lordships should do so, for your Lordships be involv'd in the same danger. And so I have done with the first part: And I shall now desire your Lordships leave, that I may read that which I have so agreed on.

Here the Petition of Right was read; but we forbear to insert it as yet, because there were Propositions for alteration; and it is not perfect, till the Royal assent be given to it.

On the 12 of May the Lords and Commons had a Conference, and the Lord Keeper spake as followeth,

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

MY Lords, having a most affectionate desire to maintain that good concurrence, that in this Parliament and others have been of late between both Houses, desired this Conference, to acquaint you, how, and in what manner, they have proceeded in the Petition of Right that came from this House; and to let you know, that as soon as they have received themselves to consider thereof; and after good time spent in Debate in the whole House, they made a Committee to consider, whether retaining of the substance of the Petition, there might not be some words altered or put in to make it more sweet, to procure it a passable way to his Majesty; we know this must be Crowned by the King, and good must come to all the Kingdom by this course now taken. The Committee hath met, and hath propounded some small matters to be altered in some few words, to make it passable, and not in substance. And the Lords having this reported from their Committee, and heard it read in their House, resolved of nothing till they have your consent, yet they think it fitter to have it propounded to you, to consider whether there should be any alteration or no, and how the propounded alterations may stand with your liking.

'Concerning the Commitment by the King and the Council, without expressing the cause, it was resolved by the Lords to Debate it this morning, and as soon as they should have debated it, they purposed to have your concurrence with them before they resolved it; but at that instant when they thought to have debated it, they received a Letter from his Majesty, which, they conceive, will give a satisfaction to both Houses in the main point. My Lords, desiring to keep that good concurrence begun, desired to communicate that Letter unto you, that you might take the same into your considerations, as they mean to do themselves: This Letter is to be read unto you.

To the Right Trusty and Right Well-beloved, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the Higher House of Parliament.

Carolus Rex.

WE being desirous of nothing more than the advancement of the Peace and Prosperity of our People, have given leave to free Debate upon the highest Points of our Prerogative Royal, which, in the time of our Predecessors, Kings and Queens of this Realm, were ever restrained as matters that they would not have discussed; and in other things we have been willing so far to descend to the desires of our good Subjects, as might fully satisfy all moderate minds, and free them from all just fears and jealousies, which those Messages which we have hitherto sent into the Commons House, will well demonstrate unto the World; yet we find it still insisted upon, that in no case whatsoever, should it never so nearly concern matters of State or Government, we, or our Privy-Council, have no power to commit any man without the cause shewed; whereas it often happens, that should the

Anno 1628. the cause be shewed, the service it self would thereby be destroyed and defeated, and the cause alledged must be such as may be determined by our Judges of our Courts of Westminster, in a legal and ordinary way of Justice, whereas the causes may be such, as those Judges have not capacity of Judicature, nor Rules of Law to direct and guide their Judgment in cases of that transcendent nature; which hapning so often, the very incroaching on that constant Rule of Government, for so many Ages, within this Kingdom practised, would soon dissolve the very Foundation and Frame of our Monarchy. Wherefore as to our Commons, we made fair Propositions, which might equally preserve the just Liberty of the Subject: so, my Lords, we have thought good to let you know, that without the overthrow of Sovereignty, we cannot suffer this Power to be impeached; notwithstanding, to clear our Conscience and just Intentions, this we publish, That it is not in our heart, nor will we ever extend our Royal Power, lent unto us from God, beyond the just Rule of Moderation, in any thing which shall be contrary to our Laws and Customs, wherein the safety of our People shall be our only Aim. And we do hereby declare our Royal pleasure and resolution to be, which, God willing, we shall ever constantly continue and maintain, That neither we, nor our Privy Council, shall or will, at any time hereafter, commit or command to Prison, or otherwise restrain the Person of any for not lending Money to us, nor for any just cause, which in our Conscience doth not concern the publick good and safety of us and our people, we will not be drawn to pretend any cause, wherein our Judgment and Conscience is not satisfied with; base thoughts, we hope, no man can imagine will fall into our Royal breast; and that in all cases of this nature, which shall hereafter happen, we shall, upon the humble petition of the party, or address of our Judges unto us, readily and really express the true cause of their Commitment or Restraint, so soon as with conveniency and safety the same is fit to be disclosed and expressed; and that in all Causes Criminal, of ordinary Jurisdiction, our Judges shall proceed to the Deliverance or Bailment of the Prisoner, according to the known and ordinary Rules of the Laws of this Land, and according to the Statutes of Magna Charta, and those other six Statutes insisted upon, which we do take knowledge stand in full force, and which we intend not to abrogate and weaken, against the true intention thereof. This we have thought fit to signify, the rather to shorten any long Debate upon this great question, the season of the year being so far advanced, and our great occasions of State not lending many more days for longer continuance of this Session of Parliament.

Given under our Signet at our Palace at Westminster 20 Maij, the Fourth year of our Reign.

The Letter was laid aside by the House of Commons, who go on in the Petition of Right, and the Lords at a Conference of both Houses, May 17. propose an Addition to that Petition by the Lord Keeper, who said,

The Lords Proposition at a Conference about an addition to the Petition of Right. That whereas at the last Conference of both Houses, there were some things propounded that came from their Lordships, out of a desire the Petition might have the easier passage with his Majesty, not Intending to violate in any manner the substance of the Petition, but it was then thought fit, that there was another part of the Petition, of as great importance and weight: My Lords, since the time of that Conference, have employ'd themselves wholly to reduce the Petition to such a frame and order, that may give both to you and them hope of acceptance.

And after many deliberations, and much advice taken, my Lords have resolved to represent to you something which they have thought upon, yet not as a thing conclusive to them or you; and according to their desires (having mentioned it in the beginning) have held it fit to conclude of nothing, till that you be made acquainted with it, and that there may be a mature advisement between you and them, so that there may be the happier conclusion in all their business.

This being the determination of the Lords, that nothing that is now offered unto you should be conclusive, yet they thought it convenient to present it unto you.

This alteration (and not alteration, but addition) which they shall propound unto you, to be advised and conferred upon, which is no breach of the frame, they think it meet, if it shall stand with your liking, to be put in the conclusion of the Petition, which I shall now read unto you.

We present this our humble Petition to your Majesty, with the care not only of preserving our own Liberties, but with due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power wherewith your Majesty is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the People.

The Lords addition to the Petition of Right.

This is the thing the Lords do present unto you, this Subject of this Conference concerning the adding of this in the Conclusion of the Petition, and that they know that this is new, and that you cannot presently give an Answer to it; therefore they desire that you do with some speed consider of it, and their Lordships will be ready this afternoon.

Concerning this Addition several Members of the Lower House spake thus;

Mr. Alford.

Let us look (said he) into the Records, and see what they are, what is Sovereign Power? Bodin saith, That it is free from any Condition: by this we shall acknowledge a Regal as well as a Legal Power: Let us give that to the King that the Law gives him, and no more.

Mr. Hackwell.

WE cannot admit of those words with safety, they are applicable to all the parts of our Petition: It is in the nature of a Saving, and by it we shall imply, as if we had incroached on his Prerogative; all the Laws we cite are without a Saving: and yet now after the violation of them, we must add a Saving: Also I have seen divers Petitions, and where the Subject claimed a Right, there I never saw a Saving of this nature.

Sir Edward Cook.

This is magnum in parvo, this is propounded to be a conclusion of our Petition: It is a matter of great weight; and, to speak plainly, it will overthrow all our Petition; it trenches to all parts of it: It flies at Loans, and at the Oath, and at Imprisonment, and Billeting of Soldiers; this turns all about again. Look into all the Petitions of former times, they never petitioned, wherein there was a Saving of the Kings Sovereignty: I know that Prerogative is part of the Law, but Sovereign power is no Parliamentary word: In my opinion it weakens Magna Charta, and all our Statutes; for they are absolute, without any Saving of Sovereign Power: And shall we now add it, we shall weaken the Foundation of Law, and then the Building must needs fall; take we heed what we yield unto, Magna Charta is such a Fellow, that he will have no Sovereign. I wonder this Sovereign was not in Magna Charta, or in the Confirmations of it: If we grant this, by implication we give a Sovereign Power above all these Laws: Power in Law, is taken for a Power with force: The Sheriff shall take the Power of the County, what it means here, God only knows: It is repugnant to our Petition, that is a Petition of Right, grounded on Acts of Parliament: Our Predecessors could never endure a Salvo jure suo, no more than the Kings of old could endure for the Church, Salvo honore Dei & Ecclesie: We must not admit of it, and to qualifie it is impossible: Let us hold our Privileges according to the Law; that Power that is above this, is not fit for the King and People to have it disputed further. I had rather, for my part, have the Prerogative acted, and I my self to lie under it, than to have it disputed.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

IF we do admit of this Addition, we shall leave the Subject worse than we found him, and we shall have little thanks for our labour when we come home: Let us leave all Power to his Majesty to punish Malefactors, but these Laws are not acquainted with Sovereign Power, we desire no new thing, nor do we offer to trench on his Majesty's Prerogative, we may not recede from this Petition, either in part or in whole.

Mr. Noy.

TO add a Saving is not safe, doubtful words may beget ill construction; and the words are not only doubtful words, but words unknown to us, and never used in any Act or Petition before.

Mr. Selden.

Let us not go too hastily to the Question, said Mr. Selden: If there be any Objections, let any propound them, and let others answer them as they think good: If it hath no reference to our Petition, what doth it here? I am sure all others will say it hath reference, and so must we: how far it doth exceed all examples of former times, no man can shew me the like: I have made that search that fully satisfies me, and I find no other besides 28 of Eliz. We have a great many Petitions and Bills of Parliament in all Ages, in all which we are sure no such thing is added: That Clause of the 28 of Edw. 1. it was not in the Petition, but in the King's Answer.

In Magna Charta there were no such Clauses, the Articles themselves are to be seen in a Library at Lambeth, in a Book of that time, upon which the Law was made. There was none in the Articles in King John's time, for these I have seen, there is no Saving. In the Statutes of Confirmatio Chartarum, is a Saving, les Antients Aids, that is, for file marier, & pur faire fize Chevalier, and for ransome. And in the Articles of King John in the Original Charter, which I can shew, there those three Aids were named therein, and they were all known: In the 25 of Edw. 3. there is a Petition against Loans, there is no Saving, and so in others: As for that Addition in the 28 of

Edw. 1. do but observe the Petitions after Magna Charta, as 5 Edw. 3. they put up a Petition, whereas in Magna Charta it is contained, That none be imprisoned, but by due process of Law; those words are not in Magna Charta, and yet there is no Saving; and so in the 28 of Edw. 3. and 36 and 37 and 42 of Edw. 3. all which pass by Petition, and yet there is no Saving in them: And there are in them other words that are not in Magna Charta, and yet no Saving.

For that that Mr. Speaker said, The King was our heart, and ever shall be; but we then spake of the King's Prerogative by it self, and we are bound to say so: But speaking of our Rights, shall we say we are not to be imprisoned, saving but by the King's Sovereign Power? Say my Lands (without any Title) be seized in the King's hand, and I bring a Petition of Right, and I go to the King and say, I do by no means seek your Majesty's Right and Title; and after that, I bring a Petition or Monstrance de droit, setting forth my own Right and Title, and withal set down a Saving, that I leave intire his Majesty's Right, it would be improper. It was objected, That in the 28 of Edw. 1. in the end of Articuli super Chartas, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, in the end there is a Clause, Savant le droit & Signiory; the words are extant in that Roll that is now extant, but the Original Roll is not extant.

In the 25 E. 3. there was a confirmation of the Charter in the 27 E. 3. The Parliament was called, and much stir there was about the Charter, and renewing the Articles; but then little was done. In 28 E. 1. the Commons, by Petition or Bill, did obtain the Liberties and Articles at the end of the Parliament, they were extracted out of the Roll, and proclaimed abroad; the addition was added in the Proclamation: in the Bill there was no savant, but afterwards it was put in: and to prove this, it is true, there is no Parliament Roll of that year, yet we have Histories of that time: In the Library at Oxford there is a Journal of a Parliament of that very year which mentions so much; also in the publick Library at Cambridge there is a Manuscript that belongeth to an Abby, it was of the same year 28 E. 1. and it mentions the Parliament and the Petitions, and Articulos quos petierunt sic confirmaveris Rex ut in fine adderet, Salvo jure Corona Regis, and they came by Proclamation in London. When the people heard this Clause added in the end, they fell into execration for that Addition; and the great Earls that went away satisfied from the Parliament hearing of this, went to the King, and after it was cleared at the next Parliament. Now there is no Parliament Roll of this of that time, only in one Roll in the end of E. 3. there is a Roll that recites it.

The Lords at a Conference gave in their Reasons for their Addition by the Lord Keeper.

That the Lords were all agreed to defend and maintain the just Liberties of the Subject, and of the Crown, and that the word (Leave) was debated amongst them; and thereby they meant to give no new, but what was before: for the words, Sovereign Power, as he is a King he is a Sovereign, and must have Power; and he said the words were easier than the Prerogative. As for the word (that) which is a Relative, and referred to that Power, that is for the safety of the People, and this, said he, can never grieve any man: being thus published, it is not Sovereign Power in general, but now in confutation of our Reasons, he saith,

Magna

1028.

Magna Charta was not with a Saving; but, said he, You pursue not the words in Magna Charta, and therefore it needs an Addition.

As for the 28 of E. 3. he said there was a Saving, and an ill exposition cannot be made of this, and both Houses have agreed it in substance already; the Commons did it in a Speech delivered by our Speaker, and that we say we have not a thought to incroach on the Kings Sovereignty; and why may you not add it in your Petition?

Upon the Report hereof to the House Mr. Mason spake thus:

IN our Petition of Right to the Kings Majesty, we mention the Laws and Statutes, by which it appeared, That no Tax, Loan, or the like, ought to be levied by the King, but by common assent in Parliament: That no Freeman ought to be imprisoned but by the Law of the Land; That no Freeman ought to be compelled to suffer Soldiers in his House. In the Petition we have expressed the breach of these Laws, and desire we may not suffer the like; all which we pray as our Rights and Liberties.

The Lords have proposed an addition to this Petition, in these words:

WE humbly present this Petition to your Majesty, not only with a care of our own Liberties, but with a due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power wherewith your Majesty is intrusted for the Protection, Safety and Happiness of your People.

And whether we shall consent unto this Addition, is the subject of this days discourse: and because my Lord Keeper at the Conference declared their Lordships had taken the words of the Petition apart, I shall do so too. The word (Leave) in a Petition, is of the same nature as (Saving) in a Grant, or Act of Parliament; when a man grants but part of a thing he Saves the rest; when he petitions to be restored but to part, he Leaveth the rest: Then in the end of our Petition the word [Leave] will imply, that something is to be left of that, or at least with a reference to what we desire.

The word [Intire] is very considerable, a Conquerour is bound by no Law, but hath power dare Leges, his Will is a Law; and although William the Conquerour, at first, to make his way to the Crown of England the more easie, and the possession of it more sure, claimed it by Title; but afterward, when there were no powerful Pretenders to the Crown, the Title of Conquest (to introduce that absolute power of a Conqueror) was claimed, and that Statute of Magna Charta, and other Statutes mentioned in our Petition, do principally limit that Power. I hope it is as lawful for me to cite a Jesuite, as it is for Dr. Mannering to falsifie him; Suares, in his first Book, de Legibus, cap. 17. delivered his opinion in these words, Amplius & restrictio potestatis Regum circa ea que per se mala vel injusta non sunt, pendet ex arbitrio hominum & ex ambigua conventionione vel pacto inter reges & regnum. And he farther expresseth his Opinion, That the King of Spain was so absolute a Monarch that he might impose Tribute without consent of his People; until about two hundred years since, when it was concluded between him and his People, that without consent of his People by Proxies, he should not impose any Tribute. And Suares opinion is, That by that agreement, the Kings of Spain are bound to impose no Tribute without content.

And this Agreement that Author calls a restraining of that Sovereign Power, the Statutes then mentioned in our Petition, restraining that absolute Power of Conqueror; if we recite those Statutes, and say, we leave the Sovereign Power entire, we do take away that restraint which is the vertue and strength of those Statutes, and set at liberty the claim of the Sovereign Power of a Conqueror, which is to be limited and restrained by no Laws: This may be the danger of the word [Intire].

The next word delivered by the Lords as observable, is the Particle [That] because it was said, That all Sovereign Power is not mentioned to be left, but only (That) with which the King is trusted for our protection, safety, and happiness: But I conceive this to be an exception of all Sovereign Power; for all Sovereign Power in a King, is for the protection, safety, and happiness of his People: If all Sovereign Power be excepted, you may easily judge the consequence, all Loans and Taxes being imposed by colour of that Sovereign Power.

The next word is [Trusted] which is very ambiguous, whether it be meant trusted by God only as a Conqueror, or by the People also, as King, which are to govern also according to Laws, ex pacto. In this point I will not presume to adventure further, only I like it not, by reason of the doubtful Exposition it admits. I have likewise considered the Proposition it self, and therein I have fallen upon the Dilemma, that this addition shall be construed either to refer unto the Petition, or not: If it do not refer unto the Petition, it is meerly useless and unnecessary, and unbefitting the judgment of this grave and great Assembly to add to a Petition of this weight. If it hath reference unto it, then it destroys not only the vertue and strength of our Petition of Right, but our Rights themselves; for the addition being referred to each part of the Petition, will necessarily receive this construction: That none ought to be compelled to make any Gift, Loan, or such like charge, without common consent or Act of Parliament, unless it be by the Sovereign Power, with which the King is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of his People.

That none ought to be compelled to sojourn or billet Soldiers, unless by the same Sovereign Power, and so of the rest of the Rights contained in the Petition: And then the most favourable construction will be, that the King hath an ordinary Prerogative, and by that he cannot impose Taxes, or Imprison; that is, he cannot impose Taxes at his will, to imploy them as he pleaseth; but that he hath an extraordinary and transcendent Sovereign Power for the protection and happiness of his people, and for such purpose he may impose Taxes, or billet Soldiers, as he pleaseth; and we may assure our selves, that hereafter all Loans, Taxes, and billeting of Soldiers, will be said to be for the protection, safety, and happiness of the People; certainly hereafter it will be conceived, that an House of Parliament would not have made an unnecessary addition to this Petition of Right, and therefore it will be resolved, That the Addition hath relation to the Petition, which will have such operation as I have formerly declared; and I the rather fear it, because the late Loan and Billeting have been declared

Anno 1628. declared to have been by Sovereign Power for the good of our selves; and if it be doubtful whether this Proposition hath reference to the Petition or not, I know who shall judge whether Loans or Imprisonments hereafter be by that Sovereign Power or not.

A Parliament, which is made a Body of several Writs, and may be dissolved by one Commission, cannot be certain to decide this Question. We cannot resolve that, that the Judges shall determine the words of the King's Letter read in this House, expressing the cause of Commitment may be such, that the Judges have not capacity of Judicature, no Rules of Law to direct and guide their Judgments in Cases of that transcendent nature, the Judges then, and the Judgments, are easily conjectured. It hath been confessed by the King's Counsel, that the Statute of Magna Charta binds the King, it binds his Sovereign Power; and here is an addition of Saving the Kings Sovereign Power: I shall endeavor to give some Answer to the Reasons given by the Lords.

The first is, That it is the intention of both Houses, to maintain the just Liberty of the Subject, and not to diminish the just Power of the King; and therefore the expression of that intention in this Petition, cannot prejudice us. To which I answer,

First, That our intention was, and is, as we then professed, and no man can assign any Particular in which we have done to the contrary; neither have we any way transgressed in that kind in this Petition: and if we make this Addition to the Petition, it would give some intimation, that we have given cause or colour of offence therein; which we deny, and which if any man conceive so, let him assign the Particular, that we may give answer thereunto.

By our Petition, we only desire our particular Rights and Liberties to be confirmed to us; and therefore it is not proper for us in it to mention Sovereign Power in general, being altogether impertinent to the matter in the Petition.

There is a great difference between the words of the Addition, and the words proposed therein, for reason, viz. between just Power which may be conceived to be limited by Laws, and Sovereign Power, which is supposed to be transcendent and boundless.

The second Reason delivered by their Lordships was, That the King is Sovereign; that as he is Sovereign, he hath Power, and that that Sovereign Power is to be left: for my part, I would leave it so, as not to mention it, but if it should be expressed to be left in this Petition, as it is proposed, it must admit something to be in the King of what we pray, or at least admit some Sovereign Power in his Majesty, in these Privileges which we claim to be our Right, which would frustrate our Petition, and destroy our Right, as I have formerly shewed.

The third Reason given for this Addition, was, That in the Statute of Articuli super Chartas, there is a saving of the Seigniorie of the Crown.

To which I give these Answers, That Magna Charta was confirmed above Thirty times, and a general Saving was in none of these Acts of Confirmation, but in this only; and I see no cause we should follow one ill, and not thirty good Precedents; and the rather, because that Saving produced ill effects, that are well known.

That Saving was by Act of Parliament; the conclusion of which Act is, That in all those Cases the King did well, and all those that were at the making of that Ordinance did intend, that the Right and Seigniorie of the Crown should be saved: By which it appears, that the Saving was not in the Petition of the Commons, but added by the King; for in the Petition the King's will is not expressed.

In that Act the King did grant; and depart with, to his People, divers Rights belonging to his Prerogative, as in the first Chapter he granted, That the People might chuse three men, which might have power to hear and determine Complaints made against those that offended in any point of Magna Charta; though they were the King's Officers, and to Fine and Ransome them: And in the eighth, twelfth, and nineteenth Chapter of that Statute, the King departed with other Prerogatives; and therefore there might be some reason of the adding of that Sovereignty by the King's Council: But in this Petition we desire nothing of the King's Prerogative, but pray the enjoying of our proper and undoubted Rights and Privileges; therefore there is no cause to add any words which may imply a Saving of that which concerns not the matter in the Petition.

The fourth Reason given by their Lordships, was, That by the mouth of our Speaker we have this Parliament declared, That it was far from our intention to incroach upon his Majesties Prerogative, and that therefore it could not prejudice us, to mention the same resolution in an Addition to this Petition.

To which I answer, That that Declaration was a general Answer to a Message from his Majesty to us, by which his Majesty expressed, that he would not have his Prerogative streightened by any new Explanation of Magna Charta, or the rest of the Statutes: and therefore that expression of our Speaker was then proper, to make it have reference to this Petition, there being nothing therein contained but particular Rights of the Subject, and nothing at all concerning his Majesties Prerogative.

Secondly, That Answer was to give his Majesty satisfaction of all our proceedings in general, and no man can assign any particular, in which we have broken it; and this Petition justifies it self, that in it we have not offended against the Protestation: And I know no reason but that this Declaration should be added to all our Laws we shall agree on this Parliament, as well as to this Petition.

The last Reason given, was, That we have varied in our Petition from the words of Magna Charta; and therefore it was very necessary, that a Saving should be added to the Petition.

I Answer, That in the Statute 5 E. 3. 25 E. 3. 28 E. 3. and other Statutes, with which Magna Charta is confirmed, the words of the Statute of Explanation differ from the words of Magna Charta it self, the words of some of the Statutes of Explanation being, that no man ought to be apprehended, unless by Indictment, or due process of Law; and the other Statutes differing from the words of Magna Charta, in many other particulars, and yet there is no Saving in those Statutes, much less should there be any in a Petition of Right. These are the Answers I have conceived to the Reasons of their Lordships, and the Exposition I apprehend must be made of the proposed words, being added to our Petition. And therefore I conclude, that in my opinion we may not consent to this Addition, which I submit to better Judgments.

Another Conference was had with the Lords about about the Addition, and it was managed by Mr. Glanville and Sir Henry Martin.

1628.

Mr. Glanville's Speech in a full Committee of both Houses of Parliament, 23 May, 1628. in the Painted-Chamber at Westminster.

Mr. Glanville's Speech at a Committee of both Houses, concerning Sovereign Power.

MY Lords, I have in charge, from the Commons House of Parliament, (whereof I am a Member) to express this day before your Lordships some part of their clear sense, touching one point that hath occurred in the great Debate, which hath so long depended in both Houses.

I shall not need many words to induce or state the question, which I am to handle in this free Conference. The subject matter of our meeting is well known to your Lordships, I will therefore only look so far back upon it, and so far recollect summarily the proceedings it hath had, as may be requisite to present clearly to your Lordships considerations, the nature and consequence of that particular wherein I must insist.

Your Lordships may be pleased to remember, how that the Commons in this Parliament have framed a Petition to be presented to his Majesty, a Petition of Right rightly composed, relating nothing but truth, desiring nothing but Justice; a Petition justly occasioned, a Petition necessary and fit for these times, a Petition founded upon solid and substantial grounds, the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, sure Rocks to build upon; a Petition bounded within due limits, and directed upon right ends, to vindicate some lawful and just Liberties of the free Subjects of this Kingdom, from the prejudice of violations past, and to secure them from future innovations.

And because my following Discourse must reflect chiefly, if not wholly upon the matter of this Petition, I shall hear crave leave shortly to open to your Lordships the distinct parts whereof it doth consist, and those are four.

The first concerns Levies of Moneys, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his Majesties supply; declaring, that no man ought, and praying that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any Gift, Loan, Benevolence, Tax, or such like Charge, without common consent by Act of Parliament.

2. The second is concerning that Liberty of Person which rightfully belongs to the free Subjects of this Realm, expressing it to be against the Tenure of the Laws and Statutes of the Land, that any Free-man should be imprisoned without cause shewed; and then reciting how this Liberty, amongst others, hath lately been infringed, it concludeth with a just and necessary desire, for the better clearing and allowance of this Priviledge for the future.

3. The third declareth the unlawfulness of Bill-letting or placing Soldiers or Marriners to sojourn in Free Subjects Houses against their wills, and prayeth remedy against that grievance.

4. The fourth and last aimeth at redress touching Commissions, to proceed to the Trial and Condemnation of Offenders, and causing them to be executed and put to death by the Law-Marshal, in times and places, when and where, if by the Laws and Statutes of the Land they had deserved death, by the same Laws and Statutes also they might, and by none other ought to be adjudged and executed.

This Petition the careful House of Commons, not willing to omit any thing pertaining to their duties, or might advance their moderate and just ends, did heretofore offer up unto your Lordships consideration, accompanied with an humble desire, That in your Nobleness and Justice you would be pleased to joyn with them in presenting it to his Majesty, that so coming from the whole Body of the Realm, the Peers and People, to him that is the Head of both, our gracious Sovereign, who must crown the Work, or else all our labour is in vain; it might by your Lordships concurrence and assistance, find the more easie passage, and obtain the better Answer.

Your Lordships, as your manner is in cases of so great importance, were pleased to debate and weigh it well, and thereupon you propounded to us some few amendments (as you termed them) by way of alteration, alledging, that they were only in matters of form, and not of substance; and that they were intended to none other end, but to sweeten the Petition, and make it the more passable with his Majesty.

In this the House of Commons cannot but observe that fair and good respect which your Lordships have used in your proceedings with them, by your concluding or voting nothing in your House, until you had imparted it unto them; whereby our meetings about this business have been justly stiled Free Conferences, either party repairing hither disengaged to hear and weigh the others Reasons, and both Houses coming with a full intention, upon due consideration of all that can be said on either side, to joyn at last in resolving and acting that which shall be found most just and necessary for the honour and safety of his Majesty and the whole Kingdom.

And touching those propounded alterations, which were not many, your Lordships cannot but remember, that the House of Commons have yielded to an accommodation, or change of their Petition in two particulars, whereby they hope your Lordships have observed, as well as ye may, they have not been affected unto words or phrases, nor overmuch abounding in their own sense; but rather willing to comply with your Lordships in all indifferent things.

For the rest of your proposed amendments, if we do not misconceive your Lordships, as we are confident we do not, your Lordships, of your selves, have been pleased to relinquish them with a new overture, for one only Clause to be added in the end or foot of the Petition, whereby the work of this day is reduced to one simple Head, whether that Clause shall be received or not?

This yielding of the Commons in part unto your Lordships, of other points by you somewhat insisted upon, giveth us great assurance, that our ends are one; and putteth us in hope, that, in conclusion, we shall concur, and proceed unanimously to seek the same ends, by the same means.

The Clause propounded by your Lordships to be added to the Petition, is this:

WE humbly present this Petition to your Majesty, not only with a care for preservation of Liberties, but with a due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power wherewith your Majesty is intrusted for the Protection, Safety and Happiness of your People.

Car. 4.

Anno 1628. A Clause specious in shew, and smooth in words, but in effect and consequence most dangerous, as I hope to make most evident; however, coming from your Lordships, the House of Commons took it into their considerations, as became them, and apprehending upon the first Debate, that it threatened ruin to the whole Petition, they did heretofore deliver some Reasons to your Lordships, for which they then desired to be spared from admitting it.

To these Reasons your Lordships offered some Answers at the last Meeting; which having been faithfully reported to our House, and there debated, as was requisite for a business of such weight and importance, I must say truly to your Lordships, yet with due reverence to your Opinions, the Commons are not satisfied with your Arguments; and therefore they have commanded me to recollect your Lordships Reasons for this Clause, and in a fair Reply to let you see the Causes why they differ from you in Opinion.

But before I come to handle the Particulars wherein we dissent from your Lordships, I will in the first place take notice yet a little further of that general wherein we all concur; which is, That we desire not (neither do your Lordships) to augment or dilate the Liberties and Privileges of the Subjects beyond the just and due Bounds; nor to incroach upon the Limits of his Majesties Prerogative Royal; and as in this your Lordships, at the last Meeting, expressed clearly your own senses, so were your Lordships not mistaken in collecting the concurrent sense and meaning of the House of Commons; they often have protested they do, and ever must protest, That these have been, and shall be the bounds of their desires, to demand and seek nothing, but that which may be fit for dutiful and loyal Subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just King to grant; for as they claim by Laws some Liberties for themselves, so do they acknowledge a Prerogative, a high and just Prerogative belonging to the King, which they intend not to diminish. And now, my Lords, being assured, not by strained inferences, or obscure collections, but by the express and clear Declarations of both Houses, that our ends are the same; it were a miserable unhappiness, if we should fail in finding out the means to accomplish our desires.

My Lords, the Heads of those particular Reasons which you insisted upon the last day, were only these:

First, You told us, that the word [Leave] was of such nature, that it could give no new thing to his Majesty.

2. That no just exception could be taken to the words [Sovereign Power] for that as his Majesty is a King, so he is a Sovereign; and as he is a Sovereign, so he hath Power.

3. That the Sovereign Power mentioned in this Clause, is not absolute, or indefinite, but limited and regulated by the Particle [That] and the word [Subsequent] which restrains it to be applied only for Protection, Safety, and Happiness of the People, whereby ye inferred, there could be no danger in the allowance of such Power.

4. That this Clause contained no more in substance, but the like expressions of our meanings in this Petition, which we had formerly signified unto his Majesty by the mouth of Mr. Speaker, that we no way intended to incroach upon his Majesties Sovereign Power or Prerogative.

5. That in our Petition we have used other words, and of larger extent touching our Liberties, than are contained in the Statutes whereon it is grounded: In respect of which Inlargement, it was fit to have some express, or implied Saving, or Narrative, Declaratory for the King's Sovereign Power, of which Narrative we alledge this Clause to be.

Lastly, Whereas the Commons, as a main Argument against the Clause, had much insisted upon this, that it was unprecedented, and unparalleled in a Petition from the Subject, to insert a Saving for the Crown: your Lordships brought for instance to the contrary the two Statutes of the 25 E. 1. commonly called Confirmatio Chartarum, and 28 E. 1. known by the name of Articuli super Chartas; in both which Statutes there are Savings for the Kings.

Having thus reduced to your Lordships memories, the effects of your own reasons; I will now, with your Lordships favour, come to the points of our Reply, wherein I most humbly beseech your Lordships to weigh the Reasons which I shall present, not as the sense of my self, the weakest Member of our House, but as the genuine and true sense of the whole House of Commons, conceived in a business there debated with the greatest gravity and solemnity, with the greatest concurrence of opinions and unanimity that ever was in any business maturely agitated in that House. I shall not peradventure follow the method of your Lordships recollected Reasons in my answering to them, nor labour to urge many Reasons. It is the desire of the Commons, that the weight of their Arguments should recompense (if need be) the smallness of their number. And, in conclusion, when you have heard me through, I hope your Lordships shall be enabled to collect clearly out of the frame of what I shall deliver, that in some part or other of my discourse there is a full and satisfactory Answer, given to every particular Reason or Objection of your Lordships.

The Reasons that are now appointed to be presented to your Lordships, are of two kinds, Legal and Rational, of which these of the former sort are allotted to my charge; and the first of them is thus.

The Clause now under question, if it be added to the Petition, then either it must refer, or relate unto it, or else not; if it have no such reference, is it not clear that it is needless and superfluous? and if it have such reference, is it not clear, that then it must needs have an operation upon the whole Petition, and upon all the parts of it?

We cannot think that your Lordships would offer us a vain thing, and therefore taking it for granted, that if it be added, it would refer to the Petition: let me beseech your Lordships to observe with me, and with the House of Commons, what alteration and qualification of the same it will introduce.

The Petition of it self, simply, and without this Clause, declareth absolutely the Rights and Privileges of the Subject, in divers points; and amongst the rest touching the Levies of Monies, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his Majesties Supply, That such Loans and other Charges of the like nature, by the Laws and Statutes of this Land, ought not to be made or laid without common consent by Act of Parliament: But admit this Clause to be annexed with reference (to the Petition) and it must necessarily conclude and have this Exposition, That Loans and the like like Charges (true it is ordinarily) are against Anno 1628. the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, unless they be warranted by Sovereign Power, and that they cannot be commanded or raised without assent of Parliament, unless it be by Sovereign Power:

 What were this but to admit a Sovereign power in the King above the Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom?

Another part of this Petition is, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not to be imprisoned without cause shewed: But by this Clause a Sovereign power will be admitted, and left entire to his Majesty, sufficient to controll the force of Law, and to bring in this new and dangerous Interpretation, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not by Law to be imprisoned without cause shewed, unless it be by Sove- reign Power.

In a word, This Clause, if it should be admitted, would take away the effect of every part of the Petition, and become destructive to the whole: for thence will be the Exposition touching the Billenting of Soldiers and Mariners in Free-mens Houses against their wills; and thence will be the Exposition touching the Times and Places for Execution of the Law-Marshal, contrary to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm.

The scope of this Petition, as I have before observed, is not to amend our Case, but to restore us to the same state we were in before; whereas, if this Clause be received, in stead of mending the condition of the poor Subjects, whose Liberties of late have been miserably violated by some Ministers, we shall leave them worse than we found them; in stead of curing their wounds, we shall make them deeper. We have set bounds to our desires in this great business, whereof one is not to diminish the Prerogative of the King, by mounting too high; and if we bound our selves on the other side with this limit, not to abridge the lawful privileges of the Subject, by descending beneath that which is meet, no man, we hope, can blame us.

My Lords, as there is mention made in the additional Clause of Sovereign Power, so is there likewise of a Trust reposed in his Majesty, touching the use of Sovereign power.

The word Trust is of great latitude and large extent, and therefore ought to be well and warily applied and restrained, especially in the Case of a King: there is a Trust inseparably reposed in the Persons of the Kings of England, but that Trust is regulated by Law; for example, when Statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in se, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties, to accrue to the King and to the Informers that shall sue for the breach of them: The Commons must, and ever will acknowledge a Royal and Sovereign Prerogative in the King, touching such Statutes, that it is in his Majesties absolute and undoubted power, to grant Dispensations to particular persons, with the Clauses of Non obstante, to do as they might have done before those Statutes, wherein his Majesty conferring grace and favour upon some, doth not do wrong to others; but there is a difference between those Statutes, and the Laws and Statutes whereon the Petition is grounded:
 by those Statutes the Subject hath no interest in the penalties, which are all the Fruit such Statutes can produce, until by Suit or Information commenced, he become intitled to the particular forfeitures, whereas the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our Petition, are of another nature;

there shall your Lordships find us to rely upon the good old Statute called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the ancient Common Laws of the Liberties of England: There shall your Lordships also find us to insist upon divers other most material Statutes made in the time of King Edward the Third and Edward the Fourth, and other famous Kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful Rights and Priviledges, belonging to the Subjects of this Realm: Laws not inflicting penalties upon Offenders, in malis prohibitis; but Laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming ipso facto, an inherent Right and Interest of Liberty and Freedom in the Subjects of this Realm, as their Birthrights and Inheritance descendable to their Heirs and Posterity; Statutes incorporate into the Body of the Common Law, over which (with reverence be it spoken) there is no Trust reposed in the Kings Sovereign Power, or Prerogative Royal to enable him to dispense with them, or to take from his Subjects that Birthright or Inheritance which they have in their Liberties, by virtue of the Common Law, and of these Statutes.

But if this Clause be added to our Petition, we shall then make a dangerous overture to confound this good destination touching what Statutes the King is trusted to controll by dispensations, and what not; and shall give an intimation to posterity, as it were the opinion both of the Lords and Commons assembled in this Parliament, that there is a Trust reposed in the King, to lay aside by his Sovereign Power in some emergent Cases, as well of the Common Law, and such Statutes as declare or ratifie the Subjects Liberty, or confer Interest upon their persons, as those other penal Statutes of such nature as I have mentioned before; which as we can by no means admit, so we believe assuredly, that it is far from the desire of our most Gracious Sovereign, to affect so vast a Trust, which being transmitted to a Successor of a different temper, might enable him to alter the whole frame and fabrick of the Commonwealth, and to dissolve that Government whereby this Kingdom hath flourished for so many years and ages, under his Majesties most Royal Ancestors and Predecessors.

Our next Reason is, that we hold it contrary to all course of Parliament, and absolutely repugnant to the very nature of a Petition of Right, consisting of particulars, as ours doth, to clog it with a general Saving or Declaration, to the weakening of the Right demanded; and we are bold to renew with some confidence our Allegation, that there can be no Precedent shewed of any such Clause in any such Petitions in times past.

I shall insist the longer upon this particular, and labour the more carefully to clear it, because your Lordships were pleased the last day to urge against us the Statutes of 25 and 28 of E. 1. as Arguments to prove the contrary, and seemed not to be satisfied with that which in this point we had affirmed. True it is, that in those Statutes there are such Savings as your Lordships have observed; but I shall offer you a clear Answer to them, and to all other Savings of like nature that can be found in any Statutes whatsoever.

First, In the general, and then I shall apply particular Answers to the particulars of those Statutes, whereby it will be most evident, that those examples can no ways suit with the matter now

Anno 1628. A Clause specious in shew, and smooth in words, but in effect and consequence most dangerous, as I hope to make most evident; however, coming from your Lordships, the House of Commons took it into their considerations, as became them, and apprehending upon the first Debate, that it threatened ruin to the whole Petition, they did heretofore deliver some Reasons to your Lordships, for which they then desired to be spared from admitting it.

To these Reasons your Lordships offered some Answers at the last Meeting; which having been faithfully reported to our House, and there debated, as was requisite for a business of such weight and importance, I must say truly to your Lordships, yet with due reverence to your Opinions, the Commons are not satisfied with your Arguments; and therefore they have commanded me to recollect your Lordships Reasons for this Clause, and in a fair Reply to let you see the Causes why they differ from you in Opinion.

But before I come to handle the Particulars wherein we dissent from your Lordships, I will in the first place take notice yet a little further of that general wherein we all concur; which is, That we desire not (neither do your Lordships) to augment or dilate the Liberties and Privileges of the Subjects beyond the just and due Bounds; nor to inroach upon the Limits of his Majesties Prerogative Royal; and as in this your Lordships, at the last Meeting, expressed clearly your own senses, so were your Lordships not mistaken in collecting the concurrent sense and meaning of the House of Commons; they often have protested they do, and ever must protest, That these have been, and shall be the bounds of their desires, to demand and seek nothing, but that which may be fit for dutiful and loyal Subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just King to grant; for as they claim by Laws some Liberties for themselves, so do they acknowledge a Prerogative, a high and just Prerogative belonging to the King, which they intend not to diminish. And now, my Lords, being assured, not by strained inferences, or obscure collections, but by the express and clear Declarations of both Houses, that our ends are the same; it were a miserable unhappiness, if we should fail in finding out the means to accomplish our desires.

My Lords, the Heads of those particular Reasons which you insisted upon the last day, were only these:

First, You told us, that the word [Leave] was of such nature, that it could give no new thing to his Majesty.

2. That no just exception could be taken to the words [Sovereign Power] for that as his Majesty is a King, so he is a Sovereign; and as he is a Sovereign, so he hath Power.

3. That the Sovereign Power mentioned in this Clause, is not absolute, or indefinite, but limited and regulated by the Particle [That] and the word [Subsequent] which restrains it to be applied only for Protection, Safety, and Happiness of the People, whereby ye inferred, there could be no danger in the allowance of such Power.

4. That this Clause contained no more in substance, but the like expressions of our meanings in this Petition, which we had formerly signified unto his Majesty by the mouth of Mr. Speaker, that we no way intended to inroach upon his Majesties Sovereign Power or Prerogative.

5. That in our Petition we have used other words, and of larger extent touching our Liberties, than are contained in the Statutes whereon it is grounded: In respect of which Inlargement, it was fit to have some express, or implied Saving, or Narrative, Declaratory for the King's Sovereign Power, of which Narrative we alledge this Clause to be.

Lastly, Whereas the Commons, as a main Argument against the Clause, had much insisted upon this, that it was unprecedented, and unparalleled in a Petition from the Subject, to insert a Saving for the Crown: your Lordships brought for instance to the contrary the two Statutes of the 25 E. 1. commonly called Confirmatio Chartarum, and 28 E. 1. known by the name of Articuli super Chartas; in both which Statutes there are Savings for the Kings.

Having thus reduced to your Lordships memories, the effects of your own reasons; I will now, with your Lordships favour, come to the points of our Reply, wherein I most humbly beseech your Lordships to weigh the Reasons which I shall present, not as the sense of my self, the weakest Member of our House, but as the genuine and true sense of the whole House of Commons, conceived in a business there debated with the greatest gravity and solemnity, with the greatest concurrence of opinions and unanimity that ever was in any business maturely agitated in that House. I shall not peradventure follow the method of your Lordships recollected Reasons in my answering to them, nor labour to urge many Reasons. It is the desire of the Commons, that the weight of their Arguments should recompense (if need be) the smallness of their number. And, in conclusion, when you have heard me through, I hope your Lordships shall be enabled to collect clearly out of the frame of what I shall deliver, that in some part or other of my discourse there is a full and satisfactory Answer, given to every particular Reason or Objection of your Lordships.

The Reasons that are now appointed to be presented to your Lordships, are of two kinds, Legal and Rational, of which these of the former sort are allotted to my charge; and the first of them is thus.

The Clause now under question, if it be added to the Petition, then either it must refer, or relate unto it, or else not; if it have no such reference, is it not clear that it is needless and superfluous? and if it have such reference, is it not clear, that then it must needs have an operation upon the whole Petition, and upon all the parts of it?

We cannot think that your Lordships would offer us a vain thing, and therefore taking it for granted, that if it be added, it would refer to the Petition: let me beseech your Lordships to observe with me, and with the House of Commons, what alteration and qualification of the same it will introduce.

The Petition of it self, simply, and without this Clause, declareth absolutely the Rights and Privileges of the Subject, in divers points; and amongst the rest touching the Levies of Monies, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his Majesties Supply, That such Loans and other Charges of the like nature, by the Laws and Statutes of this Land, ought not to be made or laid without common consent by Act of Parliament: But admit this Clause to be annexed with reference (to the Petition) and it must necessarily conclude and have this Exposition, That Loans and the like

1628. like Charges (true it is ordinarily) are against the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, unless they be warranted by Sovereign Power, and that they cannot be commanded or raised without assent of Parliament, unless it be by Sovereign Power: What were this but to admit a Sovereign power in the King above the Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom?

Another part of this Petition is, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not to be imprisoned without cause shewed: But by this Clause a Sovereign power will be admitted, and left entire to his Majesty, sufficient to controll the force of Law, and to bring in this new and dangerous Interpretation, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not by Law to be imprisoned without cause shewed, unless it be by Sovereign Power.

In a word, This Clause, if it should be admitted, would take away the effect of every part of the Petition, and become destructive to the whole: for thence will be the Exposition touching the Billeting of Soldiers and Mariners in Free-mens Houses against their wills; and thence will be the Exposition touching the Times and Places for Execution of the Law-Marshal, contrary to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm.

The scope of this Petition, as I have before observed, is not to amend our Case, but to restore us to the same state we were in before; whereas, if this Clause be received, in stead of mending the condition of the poor Subjects, whose Liberties of late have been miserably violated by some Ministers, we shall leave them worse than we found them; in stead of curing their wounds, we shall make them deeper. We have set bounds to our desires in this great business, whereof one is not to diminish the Prerogative of the King, by mounting too high; and if we bound our selves on the other side with this limit, not to abridge the lawful privileges of the Subject, by descending beneath that which is meet, no man, we hope, can blame us.

My Lords, as there is mention made in the additional Clause of Sovereign Power, so is there likewise of a Trust reposed in his Majesty, touching the use of Sovereign power.

The word Trust is of great latitude and large extent, and therefore ought to be well and warily applied and restrained, especially in the Case of a King: there is a Trust inseparably reposed in the Persons of the Kings of England, but that Trust is regulated by Law; for example, when Statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in se, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties, to accrue to the King and to the Informers that shall sue for the breach of them: The Commons must, and ever will acknowledge a Regal and Sovereign Prerogative in the King, touching such Statutes, that it is in his Majesties absolute and undoubted power, to grant Dispensations to particular persons, with the Clauses of Non obstante, to do as they might have done before those Statutes, wherein his Majesty conferring grace and favour upon some, doth not do wrong to others; but there is a difference between those Statutes, and the Laws and Statutes whereon the Petition is grounded: by those Statutes the Subject hath no interest in the penalties, which are all the Fruit such Statutes can produce, until by Suit or Information commenced, he become intitled to the particular forfeitures, whereas the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our Petition, are of another nature;

there shall your Lordships find us to rely upon the good old Statute called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the ancient Common Laws of the Liberties of England: There shall your Lordships also find us to insist upon divers other most material Statutes made in the time of King Edward the Third and Edward the Fourth, and other famous Kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful Rights and Privileges, belonging to the Subjects of this Realm: Laws not inflicting penalties upon Offenders, in malis prohibitis; but Laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming ipso facto, an inherent Right and Interest of Liberty and Freedom in the Subjects of this Realm, as their Birthrights and Inheritance descendable to their Heirs and Posterity; Statutes incorporate into the Body of the Common Law, over which (with reverence be it spoken) there is no Trust reposed in the Kings Sovereign Power, or Prerogative Royal to enable him to dispense with them, or to take from his Subjects that Birthright or Inheritance which they have in their Liberties, by virtue of the Common Law, and of these Statutes.

But if this Clause be added to our Petition, we shall then make a dangerous overture to confound this good destination touching what Statutes the King is trusted to controll by dispensations, and what not; and shall give an intimation to posterity, as it were the opinion both of the Lords and Commons assembled in this Parliament, that there is a Trust reposed in the King, to lay aside by his Sovereign Power in some emergent Cases, as well of the Common Law, and such Statutes as declare or ratify the Subjects Liberty, or confer Interest upon their persons, as those other penal Statutes of such nature as I have mentioned before; which as we can by no means admit, so we believe assuredly, that it is far from the desire of our most Gracious Sovereign, to affect so vast a Trust, which being transmitted to a Successor of a different temper, might enable him to alter the whole frame and fabrick of the Commonwealth, and to dissolve that Government whereby this Kingdom hath flourished for so many years and ages, under his Majesties most Royal Ancestors and Predecessors.

Our next Reason is, that we hold it contrary to all course of Parliament, and absolutely repugnant to the very nature of a Petition of Right, consisting of particulars, as ours doth, to clog it with a general Saving or Declaration, to the weakening of the Right demanded; and we are bold to renew with some confidence our Allegation, that there can be no Precedent shewed of any such Clause in any such Petitions in times past.

I shall insist the longer upon this particular, and labour the more carefully to clear it, because your Lordships were pleased the last day to urge against us the Statutes of 25 and 28 of E. 1. as Arguments to prove the contrary, and seemed not to be satisfied with that which in this point we had affirmed. True it is, that in those Statutes there are such Savings as your Lordships have observed; but I shall offer you a clear Answer to them, and to all other Savings of like nature that can be found in any Statutes whatsoever.

First, In the general, and then I shall apply particular Answers to the particulars of those 2 Statutes, whereby it will be most evident, that those examples can no ways suit with the matter now now in hand. To this end it will be necessary, Anno that we considerduly what that question is, which 1628. indeed concerneth a Petition, and not an Act of Parliament: This being well observed, by shewing unto your Lordships the difference between a Petition for the Law, and the Law ordained upon such a Petition, and opening truly and perspicuously the course that was holden in framing of Statutes before 2 H. 5. different from that which ever since then hath been used, and is still in use amongst us, and by noting the times wherein these Statutes were made, which was about one hundred years before 2 H. 5. besides the differences between these Savings and this Clause; I doubt not but I shall give ample satisfaction to your Lordships, that the Commons, as well in this, as in all their other Reasons, have been most careful to rely upon nothing but that which is most true and pertinent.

Before the second year of King Henry the Fifth, the course was thus: When the Commons were Suiters for a Law, either the Speaker of their House by word of mouth from them, the Lords House joining with them, or by some Bill in writing, which was usually called their Petition, moved the King, to ordain Laws for the redress of such mischiefs or inconveniences as were found grievous unto the people.

To these Petitions the King made answer as he pleased, sometimes to part, sometimes to the whole, sometimes by denial, sometimes by assent, sometimes absolutely, and sometimes by qualification. Upon these Motions and Petitions, and the King's Answers to them, was the Law drawn up and ingrossed in the Statute-Roll to bind the Kingdom; but this inconvenience was found in this course, that oftentimes the Statutes thus framed, were against the sense and meaning of the Commons, at whose desires they were ordained; and therefore in the 2 H. 5. finding that it tended to the violation of their Liberty and Freedom, whose Right it was, and ever had been, that no Law should be made without their assent; they then exhibited a Petition to the King, declaring their Right in this particular, praying, that from thenceforth no Law might be made or ingrossed as Statutes, by additions or diminutions to their Motions, or Petitions, that should change their sense, or intent, without their assent; which was accordingly established by Act of Parliament: ever since then the Right hath been as the use was before, that the King taketh the whole, or leaveth the whole of all Bills or Petitions, exhibited for the obtaining of Laws.

From this course, and from the time when first it became constant and settled, we conclude strongly, that it is no good Argument, because ye find Savings in Acts of Parliament before the second of H. 5. that before those Savings were in the Petitions that begat those Statutes; for if the Petitions for the two Loans so must insisted upon (which Petitions, for any thing we know, are not now extant) were never so absolute, yet might the King according to the usage of those times, insert the Savings in his Answers, which passing from thence into the Statute-Roll, do only give some little colour, but are not proof at all that the Petitions also were with Savings.

Thus much for the general; to come now to the particular Statute of 25 of Edw. 1. which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, with some provision for the better execution of it, as Common Law, which words are worth the noting.

It is true, that Statute hath also a Clause to this effect, That the King or his Heirs from thenceforth should take no Aids, Taxes, or Prices of his Subjects, but by common Assent of all the Realm, saving the ancient Aids and Prices due and accustomed.

This Saving, if it were granted (which is not, nor cannot be proved) that it was as well in the Petition as in the Act: yet can it no way imply, that it is either fit or safe, that the Clause now in question should be added to our Petition: for the nature or office of a Saving, or Exception, is to exempt particulars out of a general, and to ratify the Rule in things not exempted, but in no sort to weaken or destroy the general Rule it self.

The Body of that Law was against all Aids, and Taxes, and Prices in general, and was a confirmation of the Common Law, formerly declared by Magna Charta; the Saving was only of Aids and Prices in particular, so well described and restrained by the words, Ancient and Accustomed, that there could be no doubt what could be the clear meaning and extent of that Exception; for the King's Right to those ancient Aids, intended by that Statute to be saved to him, was well known in those days, and is not yet forgotten.

These Aids were three, from the Kings Tenants by Knights Service, due by the Common Law, or general Custom of the Realm; Aid to ransom the King's Royal Person, if unhappily he should be taken Prisoner in the Wars; Aid to make the King's eldest Son a Knight, and Aid to marry the King's eldest daughter once, but no more; and that those were the only Aids intended to be saved to the Crown by that Statute, appeareth in some clearness by the Charter of King John, dated the Runningmade the 15 of June, in the fifth year of his Reign, wherein they are enumerated with an exclusion of all other Aids whatsoever. Of this Charter I have here one of the Originals, whereon I beseech your Lordships to cast your eyes, and give me leave to read the very words which concern this point. These words (my Lords) are thus: Nullum scutagium vel auxilium ponatur in Regno nostro, nisi per Commune Consilium Regni nostri, nisi ad Corpus nostrum redimendum, & primogenitum filium nostrum militem faciendum, & ad filiam nostram primogenitam semel maritandam, & ad hoc non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium.

Touching Prices, the other thing excepted by this Statute, it is also of a particular Right to the Crown so well known, that it needeth no description, the King being in possession of it by every days usage.

It is to take one Tun of Wine before the Mast, and another behind the Mast, of every Ship bringing in above Twenty Tuns of Wine, and here discharge them by way of Merchandise.

But our Petition consisteth altogether of particulars, to which if any general Saving, or words amounting to one, should be annexed, it cannot work to confirm things not excepted which are none, but to confound things included, which are all the parts of the Petition; and it must needs beget this dangerous Exposition, that the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, declared and demanded by this Petition, are not theirs absolutely, but sub modo, not to continue alwaies, but only to take place when the King is pleased not to exercise that Sovereign Power, wherewith this Clause admitted

ted he is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people. And thus that Birth-right and Inheritance, which we have in our Liberties, shall by our own assents, be turned into a meer Tenancy at will and sufferance.

Touching the Statute of 28 Edw. 1. Articuli super chartas, the scope of that Statute, among other things, being to provide for the better observing and maintaining of Magna Charta, hath in it nevertheless two Savings for the King; the one particular, as I take it, to preserve the ancient Prices, due and accustomed, as of Wines, and other Goods; the other general, Seigniorie of the Crown in all things.

To these two Savings, besides the former Answers, which may be for the most part applied to this Statute as well as to the former, I add these further Answers: The first of these two Savings, is of the same Privilege of Wines which is excepted in the 25 Edw. 1. but in some more clearness; for that here the word (Wines) is expressly annexed to the word (Prices) which I take for so much to be in Exposition of the former Law: And albeit these words (and of other Goods) be added, yet do I take it to be but a particular Saving, or exception, which being qualified with the words (ancient, due, and accustomed) is not very dangerous, nor can be understood of Prices or Levies upon Goods of all sorts at the King's will and pleasure, but only of the old and certain Customs upon Wool, Woollfells, and Leather, which were due to the Crown long before the making of this Statute.

For the latter of the two Savings in this Act, which is of the more unusual nature, and subject to the more exception; it is indeed general, and if we may believe the concurrent Relations of the Histories of those times, as well as those that are now Printed, as those that remain only in Manuscripts, it gave distaste from the beginning, and wrought no good effect, but produced such distempers and troubles in the State, as we wish may be buried in perpetual Oblivion; and that the like Saving in these and future times may never breed the like disturbance: For from hence arose a Jealousie, that Magna Charta, which declared the ancient Right of the Subject, and was an absolute Law in it self, being now confirm'd by a latter Act, with this addition of a general Saving; for the King's Right in all things by the Saving was weakened, and that made doubtful, which was clear before. But not to depart from our main ground, which is; that Savings in old Acts of Parliament, before 2 H. 5. are no proof that there were the like Savings in the Petitions; for those Acts, let me observe unto your Lordships, and so leave this point, That albeit this Petition, whereon this Act of 28 Edw. 1. was grounded, be perished; yet hath it pleased God, that the very Frame and Context of the Act it self, as it is drawn up, and entered upon the Statute-Roll, and Printed in our Books, doth manifestly impart, that this Saving came in by the King's Answer, and was not in the original Petition of the Lords and Commons; for it cometh in at the end of the Act after the words (le Roy le veut) which commonly are the words of the Royal assent to an Act of Parliament. And though they be mixed and followed with other words, as though the King's Council, and the rest who were present at the making of this Ordinance, did intend the same Saving; yet is not that Conclusive, so long as by the form of those times, the King's Answer working upon the materials of the Petition, might be conceived by some to make the Law effectual, though varying from the frame of the Petition.

The next Reason which the Commons have commanded me to use, for which they still desire to be spared from adding this Clause to their Petition, is this: this offensive Law of 28 E. 1. which confirmed Magna Charta, with a Saving, rested not long in peace, for it gave not that satisfaction to the Lords or People, as was requisite they should have in a case so nearly concerning them: And therefore about thirty three, or thirty four of the same King's Reign, a latter Act of Parliament was made, whereby it was enacted, That all men should have their Laws, and Liberties, and free Customs, as largely and wholly as they had used to have at any time, when they had them best; and if any Statutes had been made, or any Customs brought in to the contrary, that all such Statutes and Customs should be void.

This was the first Law which I call now to mind, that restored Magna Charta to the original purity wherein it was first molded, albeit it hath since been confirmed above twenty times more by several Acts of Parliament, in the Reigns of divers most just and gracious Kings, who were most apprehensive of their Rights, and jealous of their Honours, and alwaies without Savings; so as if between 28 and 34 Edw. 1. Magna Charta stood blemished with many Savings of the King's Rights or Seigniorie, which might be conceived to be above the Law; that stain and blemish was long since taken away, and cleared by those many absolute Declarations and Confirmations of that excellent Law which followed in after Ages, and so it standeth at this day purged and exempted now from any such Saving whatsoever.

I beseech your Lordships therefore to observe the circumstance of time wherein we offer this Petition to be presented to your Lordships, and by us unto his Majesty: Do we offer it when Magna Charta stands clogged with Saving? No, my Lords, but at this day when latter and better confirmations have vindicated and set free that Law from all exceptions; and shall we now annex another and worse Saving to it, by an unnecessary Clause in that Petition, which we expect should have the fruits, and effects of a Law? Shall we our selves relinquish or adulterate that which cost our Ancestors such care and labour to purchase and refine? No, my Lords, but as we should hold our selves unhappy if we should not amend the wretched estate of the poor Subject, so let us hold it a wickedness to impair it.

Whereas it was further urged by your Lordships, That to insert this Clause into our Petition, would be no more than to do that again at your Lordships motion and request, which we had formerly done by the mouth of our Speaker; and that there is no cause why we should recede from that which so solemnly we have professed. To this I answer and confess, it was then in our hearts, and so it is now, and shall be ever, not to encroach on his Majesty's Sovereign Power. But I beseech your Lordships to observe the different occasion and reference of that Protestation, and of this Clause.

That was a general Answer to a general Message, which we received from his Majesty, warning us not to encroach upon his Prerogative; to which, like dutiful and loving Subjects, we answered at full, according to the integrity of our own hearts; nor was there any danger in making

Anno 1628. Such an Answer to such a Message, nor could we answer more truly or more properly: But did that Answer extend to acknowledge a Sovereign Power in the King, above the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our Petition, or controul the Liberties of the Subject therein declared and demanded? No, my Lords, it hath no reference to any such particulars; and the same words which in some cases may be fit to be used, and were unmannerly to be omitted, cannot in other Cases be spoken but with impertinency at the least, if not with danger; I have formerly opened my Reasons, proving the danger of this Clause, and am commanded to illustrate the impertinency of adding it to the Petition by a familiar Case, which was put into our House by a learned Gentleman, and of my own Robe: The Case is this, Two Mannors or Lordships lie adjoining together, and perchance intermixed, so as there is some difficulty to discern the true bounds of either; as it may be touching the Confines where the Liberty of the Subject, and the Prerogative of the Crown do border each upon the other; to the one of the Mannors the King hath clear right, and is in actual possession of it; but the other is the Subjects. The King being misinformed, that the Subject hath intruded upon his Majesties Mannor, asketh his Subject whether he doth enter upon his Majesties Mannor, or pretendeth any Title to it, or any part of it? The Subject being now justly occasioned, maketh answer truly to the King, That he hath not intruded, nor will intrude upon his Majesties Mannor, nor doth make any Claim or Title to it, or any part of it. This Answer is proper and fair; nay, it were unmannerly and ill done of the Subject not to answer upon this occasion. Afterwards the King, upon colour of some double or single matter of Record, seizeth into his Highness hands, upon a pretended Title, the Subjects Mannor: The Subject then exhibiteth his Petition of Right, to his Majesty, to attain Restitution of his own Mannor, and therein layeth down Title to his own Mannor only: Were it not improper and absurd in this Case for him to tell the King, that he did not intend to make any Claim or Title to his Majesties Mannors, which is not questioned? Doubtless it were. This Case rightly applied, will fit our purpose well, and notably explain the nature of our Petition.

Why should we speak of leaving entire the King's Sovereign Power, whereon we incroach not, while we only seek to recover our own Liberties and Priviledges, which have been seized upon by some of the King's Ministers? If our Petition did trench actually upon his Majesties Prerogative, would our saying that we intended it not, make the thing otherwise than the truth?

My Lords, there needeth no Protestation or Declaration to the contrary of that which we have not done; and to put in such a Clause, cannot argue less than a fear in us, as if we had invaded it; which we hold sacred, and are assured that we have not touched either in our words, or in our intentions. And touching your Lordships observation upon the word (Leave) if it be not a proper word to give any new thing to the King, sure we are, it is a word dangerous in another sense; for it may amount, without all question, to acknowledge an old Right of Sovereign Power in his Majesty, above these Laws and Statutes whereon only our Liberties are founded; a Doctrine which we most humbly crave your Lordships leaves freely to protest against. And for your Lordships proffering, that some Saving should be requisite for preservation of his Majesties Sovereign Power, in respect our Petition runneth in larger words than our Laws and Statutes whereon we ground it; what is this but a clear confession by your Lordships, that this Clause was intended by you to be that Saving? for other Saving than this, we find not tendred by you: And if it be such a Saving, how can it stand with your Lordships other Arguments, that it should be of no other effect than our former expression to his Majesty by the mouth of our Speaker? But I will not insist upon Collections of this kind; I will only shew you the Reasons of the Commons, why this Petition needeth no such saving, albeit the words of these Statutes be exceeded in the Declaratory part of our Petition: Those things that are within the equity, and true meaning of a Statute, are as good Laws as those which are contained in the express Letter, and therefore the Statutes of the 42 Edw. 3. 36 H. 3. Rot. Par. N. 12. and other the Statutes made in this time of King Edw. 3. for the Explanation of Magna Charta, which hath been so often vouched in this Parliament, though they differ in words from Magna Charta, had no Saving annexed to any of them, because they enacted nothing more than was contained in effect: In that good Law under the words, per legale iudicium parium suorum, aut per legem terra, which by these latter Laws are expounded to import, that none should be put to answer without Presentment, or matter of Record, or by due process, or Writ Original, and if otherwise, it should be void, and holden for error.

It hath not been yet shewn unto us from your Lordships, that we have in any of our Expressions or Applications strained or mis-applied any of the Laws or Statutes whereon we do insist, and we are very confident and well assured, that no such mistaking can be assigned in any point of our Petition now under question: if therefore it do not exceed the true sense and construction of Magna Charta in the subsequent Laws of Explanation whereon it is grounded, what reason is there to add a Saving to this Petition, more than to those Laws? since we desire to transmit the fruits of these our labours to Posterity, not only for the justification of our selves in right of our present, and their future Liberties; but also for a brave expression and perpetual testimony of that Grace and Justice, which we assure our selves we shall receive in his Majesties speedy and clear Answer. This is the thing we seek for, and this is the thing we hoped for, and this is the thing only will settle such an unity and confidence betwixt his Majesty and us, and raise such a cheerfulness in the hearts of all his loving Subjects, as will make us proceed unanimously, and with all expedition to supply him for his great occasions in such measure, and in such way as may make him safe at home, and feared abroad.

Sir Henry Martin proceeded in the rational part thereof.

It is necessary to state the question rightly, and to set down the true difference between your Lordships and us. Now indeed there is no difference or question between your Lordships and us, concerning this additional Clause in the nature and quality of a Proposition; For so considered, we say it is most true, and to be received and embraced by us, in toto & qualibet parte & qualibet syllaba, yea, and were that the question,

Sir Hen. Martin's Speech, as to the rational part of the matter of the Conference.

Anno 1628. question, we should add to the addition, and instead of due regard, say we have had, and ever will have a special and singular regard, where to leave entire Sovereign power: but this were to intimate, as if we had first cropt it, and then left; but our regard was to acknowledge and confess it sincerely, and to maintain it constantly, even to the hazard of our Goods and Lives, if need be.

'To which purpose your Lordships may be pleased to remember that strict Oath every Member of our House hath taken this very Session, in these words, I (A. B.) do utterly resist and declare in my conscience, That the Kings Highness is the Supreme or Sovereign Governour of this Realm in all Causes, &c. and to my utmost power will assist and defend all Jurisdictions, Priviledges, Preheminences and Authorities, granted or belonging to the King's Highness, or united, or annexed to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, &c.

'So that your Lordships need not to borrow from our Protestations any Exhortations to us, to entertain a Writing in assistance of the King's Sovereign power, since we stand obliged by the most sacred Bond of a solemn Oath, to assist and defend the same, if cause and occasion so required; So that the only question between your Lordships and us, is, whether this Clause should be added to our Petition, and received into it as part thereof, which to do, your Lordships reasons have not perswaded us, because so to admit it, were to overthrow the Fabrick and substance of our Petition of Right, and to annihilate the Right pretended by us and the Petition it self in effect: For these words being added to our Petition (viz.) we humbly present this Petition, &c. with due regard to leave entire your Sovereign power, &c. do include manifestly an exception to our Petition, and an Exception being of the nature of the thing whereunto it is an Exception, Exceptio est de regula, must of necessity destroy the Rule or Petition, so far as to the case excepted; Exceptio firmat regulam in casibus non exceptis, in casibus exceptis destruit regulam: Then this construction followeth upon our Petition thus enlarged, that after we have petitioned, that no freeman should be compelled by imprisonment to lend or contribute Money to his Majesty without his assent in Parliament, nor receive against his will, Souldiers into his House, or undergo a Commission of Marshal Law, for Life or Member in time of Peace, we should add, except his Majesty be pleased to require our Monies, and imprison us for not lending, and send Souldiers into our Houses, and execute us by Marshal Law in time of Peace, by vertue of his Sovereign power: which construction, as it followeth necessarily upon this enlargement, so it concludeth against our Right in the Premises, and utterly frustrateth all our Petition; neither may it seem strange, if this clause additional (which of it self in quality of a proposition we confess) being added to our Petition (which also is true) should overthrow the very frame and fabrick of it, seeing the Logicians take knowledge of such a fallacy called by them, Fallacia à bene divisio ad male conjuncta. Horace the Poet giveth an instance to this purpose, in a Painter, who when he had painted the head of a man according to Art, would then joyn to it the neck of a horse, and so mar the one and the other; whereas each by it self might have been a piece of right good workmanship.

'The second Branch of my Lord Keepers rational part, was enforced out of the last words of this addition, by which his Lordship said, that they did not leave intire all Sovereign power, but that wherewith his Majesty is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people; as if his Lordship would infer, that Sovereign power wherewith, &c. in this place to be Terminus diminuentem, a term of diminution or qualification, and in that consideration might induce us to accept it. But under his Lordships correction, we cannot so interpret it: For first we are assured, that there is no Sovereign power wherewith his Majesty is trusted, either by God, or man, but only that which is for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people; and therefore that limitation can make no impression upon us: but we conceive it rather in this place to have the force Termini adaugentis, to be a term of important advantage, against our Petition, a Term of restriction, and that wheresoever his Majesties Sovereign power should be exercised upon us; in all and every the particulars mentioned in the Petition, we should, without further enquiry, submit thereunto, as assuming and taking it pro concessio, it induced to our safety and happiness, &c. Since therefore (as the Petition is now conceived) it carrieth the form and face of a picture, which representeth to the life the pressures and grievances of the people, with the easie remedies; and therefore we hope that his Majesty, casting upon it a gracious eye, will compassionate his poor Loyal Subjects, and afford a comfortable Answer.

'I do humbly pray your Lordships not to mar or blemish the grace and face of this picture with this unnecessary Addition; and unnecessary I prove it to be, according to that Rule, Expressio ejus quod tacite inest nihil operatur. And Sovereign power, in cases where it hath place, ought to be used, is alwaies necessarily understood, and though not expressed, yet supplied by reasonable intendment, or by the opinion of all Learned men.

'And therefore, as it neither is, nor can be by us expressly included, especially in this Petition, where the Addition thereof would make such a confusion of the whole sense and substance.
